2. Your pious and venerable daughters, Eustochium and Paula, continue to w^alk worthy of their own birth and of your counsels, and they send special salutations to your Blessedness: in which they are joined by the whole brotherhood of those who with us labour to serve the Lord our Saviour. As for the holy presbyter Firmus, we sent him last year to go on business of Eustochium and Paula, first to Eavenna, and afterwards to Africa and Sicily, and we suppose that he is now detained somewhere in Africa. I beseech you to present my respectful salutations to the saints who are associated with you. I have also sent to your care a letter from me to the holy presbyter Eirmus; if it reaches you, I beg you to take the trouble of forwarding it to him. May Christ the Lord keep you in safety, and mindful of me, my truly pious lord and most blessed father.

(As a ]oostscript) We suffer in this province from a grievous scarcity of clerks acquainted with the Latin language; this is the reason why we are not able to comply with your instructions, especially in regard to that version of the Septuagint which is furnished with distinctive asterisks and obelisks; for we have lost, through some one's dishonesty, the most of the results of our earlier labour.

to destruction. For what did we order beyond this, that you should be arrested, brought before the authorities, and guarded, in order to prevent you from perishing? As to your having sustained bodily injury, you have yourself to blame for this, as you would not use the horse which was immediately brought to you, and then dashed yourself violently to the ground; for, as you well know, your companion, who was brought along with you, arrived uninjured, not having done any harm to himself as you did.

2. You think, however, that even what we have done to you should not have been done, because, in your opinion, no man should be compelled to that which is good. Mark, therefore, the words of the apostle: "If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work," and yet, in order to make the office of a bishop be accepted by many men, they are seized against their will, subjected to importunate persuasion, shut up and detained in custody, and made to suffer so many things which they dislike, until a willingness to undertake the good work is found in them. How much more, then, is it fitting that you should be drawn forcibly away from a pernicious error, in which you are enemies to your own souls, and brought to acquaint yourselves with the truth, or to choose it when known, not only in order to your holding in a safe and advantageous way the honour belonging to your office, but also in order to preserve you from perishing miserably! You say that God has given us free will, and that therefore no man should be compelled even to good. Why, then, are those whom I have above referred to compelled to that which is good? Take heed, therefore, to something which you do not wish to consider. The aim towards which a good will compassionately — devotes its efforts is to secure that a bad will be rightly directed. For who does not know that a man is not condemned on any other ground than because his bad will deserved it, and that no man is saved who has not a good will? Nevertheless, it does not follow from this that those who are loved should be cruelly left to yield themselves with imprumity to their bad will; but in so far as power is given, they ought to be both prevented from evil and compelled to good.

LET. CLXXIII.] TO DONATUS. 847

3. For if a bad will ought to be always left to its own freedom, why were the disobedient and murmuring Israelites restrained from evil by such severe chastisements, and compelled to come into the land of promise? If a bad will ought always to be left to its own freedom, why was Paul not left to the free use of that most perverted will with which he persecuted the Church? Why was he thrown to the ground that he might be blinded, and struck blind that he might be changed, and changed that he might be sent as an apostle, and sent that he might suffer for the truth's sake such wrongs as he had inflicted on others when he was in error? If a bad will ought always to be left to its own freedom, why is a father instructed in Holy Scripture not only to correct an obstinate son by words of rebuke, but also to beat his sides, in order that, being compelled and subdued, he may be guided to good conduct. For which reason Solomon also says: "Thou shalt beat him with the rod, and shalt deliver his soul from hell." If a bad will ought always to be left to its own freedom, why are negligent pastors reproved? and why is it said to them, "Ye have not brought back the wandering sheep, ye have not sought the perishing"? You also are sheep belonging to Christ, you bear the Lord's mark in the sacrament which you have received, but you are wandering and perishing. Let us not, therefore, incur your displeasure.

because we bring back the wandering and seek the perishing; for it is better for us to obey the will of the Lord, who charges us to compel you to return to His fold, than to yield consent to the will of the wandering sheep, so as to leave you to perish. Say not, therefore, what I hear that you are constantly saying, "I wish thus to wander, I wish thus to perish; for it is better that we should so far as is in our power absolutely refuse to allow you to wander and perish.

4. When you threw yourself the other day into a well, in order to bring death upon yourself, you did so no doubt with your free will. But how cruel the servants of God would have been if they had left you to the fruits of this bad will, and had not delivered you from that death! Who would not have justly blamed them? Who would not have justly denounced them as inhuman? And yet you, with your own free will, threw yourself into the water that you might be drowned. They took you against your will out of the water, that you might not be drowned. You acted according to your own will, but with a view to your destruction; they dealt with you against your will, but in order to your preservation.

If, therefore, mere bodily safety behoves to be so guarded that it is the duty of those who love their neighbour to preserve him even against his own will from harm, how much more is this duty binding in regard to that spiritual health in the loss of which the consequence to be dreaded is eternal death! At the same time let me remark, that in that death which you wished to bring upon yourself you would have died not for time only but for eternity, because even though force had been used to compel you not to accept salvation, not to enter into the peace of the Church, the unity of Christ's body, the holy indivisible charity, but to suffer some evil things, it would not have been lawful for you to take away your own life.

5. Consider the divine Scriptures, and examine them to the utmost of your ability, and see whether this was ever done by any one of the just and faithful, though subjected to the most grievous evils by persons who were endeavouring to drive them, not to eternal life, to which you are being compelled by us, but to eternal death. I have heard that you say that the Apostle Paul intimated the lawfulness of suicide when he said,

" Though I give my body to be burned,"^ supposing that because he was there enumerating all the good things which are of no avail without charity, such as the tongues of men and of angels, and all mysteries, and all knowledge, and all prophecy, and the distribution of one's goods to the poor, he intended to include among these good things the act of bringing death upon oneself. But observe carefully and learn in what sense Scripture says that any man may give his body to be burned. Certainly not that any man may throw himself into the fire when he is harassed by a pursuing enemy, but that, when he is compelled to choose between doing wrong and suffering, he should refuse to do wrong rather than to suffer wrong, and so give his body into the power of the executioner, as those three men did who were being compelled to worship the golden image, while he who was compelling them threatened them with the burning fiery furnace if they did not obey. They refused to worship the image: they did not cast themselves into the fire, and yet of them it is written that they " yielded their bodies, that they might not serve nor worship any god except their own God."^ This is the sense in which the apostle said. " If I give my body to be burned."

6. Mark also what follows: â€” "If I have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." To that charity you are called; by that charity you are prevented from perishing: and yet you think, forsooth, that to throw yourself headlong to destruction, by your own act, will profit you in some measure, although, even if you suffered death at the hands of another, while you remain an enemy to charity it would profit you nothing. Nay, more, being in a state of exclusion from the Church, and severed from the body of unity and the bond of charity, you would be punished with eternal misery even though you were burned alive for Christ's name; for this is the apostle's declaration, " Though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." Bring your mind back, therefore, to rational reflection and sober thought; consider carefully whether it is to error and to impiety that you are being called, and, if you still think so, submit patiently to any liardslip for the truth's sake. If, however, the fact rather be that you are living in error and in impiety, and that in the Church to which you are called truth and piety are found, because there is Christian unity and the love (cliaritas) of the Holy Spirit, why do you labour any longer to be an enemy to yourself?

1 1 Cor. xiii. 3. 2 D^n. iii. 28.

7. For this end the mercy of the Lord appointed that both we and your bishops met at Carthage in a conference which had repeated meetings, and was largely attended, and reasoned together in the most orderly manner in regard to the grounds of our separation from each other. The proceedings of that conference were written down; our signatures are attached to the record: read it, or allow others to read it to you, and then choose which party you prefer. I have heard that you have said that you could to some extent discuss the statements in that record with us if we would omit these words of your bishops: " No case forecloses the investigation of another case, and no person compromises the position of another person." You wish us to leave out these words, in which, although they knew it not, the truth itself spoke by them.

You will say, indeed, that here they made a mistake, and fell through want of consideration into a false opinion. But we affirm that here they said what was true, and we prove this very easily by a reference to yourself. For if in regard to these bishops of your own, chosen by the whole party of Donatus on the understanding that they should act as representatives, and that all the rest should regard whatever they did as acceptable and satisfactory, you nevertheless refuse to allow them to compromise your position by what you think to have been a rash and mistaken utterance on their part, in this refusal you confirm the truth of their saying: " No case forecloses the investigation of another case, and no person compromises the position of another person." And at the same time you ought to acknowledge, that if you refuse to allow the conjoint authority of so many of your bishops represented in these seven to compromise Donatus, presbyter in Mutugenna, it is incomparably less reasonable that one person, Coecilianus, even had some evil been found in him, should compromise the position of the whole unity of Christ, the Church, which is not shut up within the one village of Mutugenna, but spread abroad throughout the entire world.

8. But, behold, w^e do wliat you have desired; w^e treat with you as if your bishops had not said: " No case forecloses the investigation of another case, and no person compromises the position of another person." Discover, if you can, what they ought, rather than this, to have said in reply, when there was alleged against them the case and the person of Primianus,^ who, notwithstanding his joining the rest of the bishops in passing sentence of condemnation on those who had passed sentence of condemnation upon him, nevertheless received back into their former honours those w^hom he had condemned and denounced, and chose to acknowledge and accept rather than despise and repudiate the baptism administered by these men while they were " dead " (for of them it was said in the notable decree [of the Council of Bagai], that " the shores were full of dead men "), and by so doing swept away the argument which you are accustomed to rest on a perverse interpretation of the words: " Qui baptizatur a mortuo quid ei prodest lavacrum ejus? " ^
If, therefore, your bishops had not said: " ISTo case forecloses the investigation of another case, and no person compromises the position of another person," they would have been compelled to plead guilty in the case of Primianus; but, in saying this, they declared the Catholic Church to be, as we mentioned, not guilty in the case of Caecilianus.

9. However, read all the rest and examine it well. Mark whether they have succeeded in proving any charge of evil

* Primianus, Donatist bishop in Carthage, was in 393 deposed by a factious clique of bishops, who appointed ^Maximianus in his place. The other Donatist bishops, however, assembled in the following year at Bagai in Numidia, and, reversing the decision of their co-bishops, deposed them in turn, and passed a sentence to which, as stated in the text, they did not inexorably adhere. The matter is referred to in Letter XLIIL, vol. i. p. 160.

2 Ecclus. xxxiv. 25, translated, accurately enough, in our English version:
"He that washeth himself after touching a dead body, if he touch it again, what availeth his washing? " The Donatist, in quoting the passage to support their practice of re-baptizing Catholics, omitted the clause, "et iterum tangit mortuum," and translated the sentence thus: "He that is baptized by one who is dead, what availeth his baptism ? " It would be difficult to quote from the annals of controversy a more flagrant example of ignorant ingenuity in the wresting of words to serve a purpose.

brought against Caecilianus himself, through whose person they attempted to compromise the position of the Church.
Mark whether they have not rather brought forward much that was in his favour, and confirmed the evidence that his case was a good one, by a number of extracts which, to the prejudice of their own case, they produced and read. Eead these, or let them be read to you. Consider the whole matter, ponder it carefully, and choose which you should follow: whether you should, in the peace of Christ, in the unity of the Catholic Church, in the love of the brethren, be pârtâlcer of our joy, or, in the cause of wicked discord, the Donatist faction and impious schism, continue to suffer the annoyance caused to you by the measures which out of love to you we are compelled to take.

10. I hear that you have remarked and often quote the fact recorded in the gospels, that the seventy disciples went back from the Lord, and that they had been left to their own choice in this wicked and impious desertion, and that to the twelve who alone remained the Lord said, " Will ye also go away? " ^ But you have neglected to remark, that at that time the Church was only beginning to burst into life from the recently planted seed, and that there was not yet fulfilled in her the prophecy: " All kings shall fall down before Him; yea, all nations shall serve Him; " ^ and it is in proportion to the more enlarged accomplishment of this prophecy that the Church wields greater power, so that she may not only invite, but even compel men to embrace what is good. This our Lord intended then to illustrate, for although He had great power. He chose rather to manifest His humility. This also He taught, with sufficient plainness, in the parable of the Feast, in which the master of the house, after he had sent a message to the invited guests, and they had refused to come, said to his servants: "Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor, and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind. And the servant said. Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room. And the Lord said unto the servant, Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled."^ Mark, now, how it was said in regard to those who came first, "bring them in; " it was not said, "compel them to come in," â€” by which was signified the incipient condition of the Church, when it was only growing towards the position in which it would have strength to compel men to come in. Accordingly, because it was right that when the Church had been strengthened, both in power and in extent, men should be compelled to come in to the feast of everlasting salvation, it was afterwards added in the parable, "The servant said. Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room. And the Lord said unto the servants. Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in." Wherefore, if you were walking peaceably, absent from this feast of everlasting salvation and of the holy unity of the Church, we should find you, as it were, in the "highways; " but since, by multiplied injuries and cruelties, which you perpetrate on our people, you are, as it were, full of thorns and roughness, we find you as it were in the "hedges," and we compel you to come in. The sheep which is compelled is driven whither it would not wish to go, but after it has entered, it feeds of its own accord in the pastures to which it was brought. Wherefore restrain your perverse and rebellious spirit, that in the true Church of Christ you may find the feast of salvation.

TO OCEANUS, HIS DESERVEDLY BELOVED LORD AND BROTHER, HONOURED AMONG THE MEMBERS OF CHRIST, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING.

1. I RECEIVED two letters from you at the same time, in one of which you mention a third, and state that you had sent it before the others. This letter I do not remember having received, or, rather, I think I may say the testimony of my memory is, that I did not receive it; but in regard to those which I have received, I return you many thanks for your kindness to me. To these I would have returned an immediate answer, had I not been hurried away by a constant succession of other matters urgently demanding attention.

Having now found a moment's leisure from these, I have chosen rather to send some reply, however imperfect, than continue towards a friend so true and kind a protracted silence, and become more annoying to you by saying nothing than by saying too much.

2. I already knew the opinion of the holy Jerome as to the origin of souls, and had read the words which in your letter you have quoted from his book. The difficulty which perplexes some in regard to this question, "How God can justly bestow souls on the offspring of persons guilty of adultery?" does not embarrass me, seeing that not even their own sins, much less the sins of their parents, can prove prejudicial to persons of virtuous lives, converted to God, and living in faith and piety. The really difficult question is,

I if it be true that a new soul created out of nothing is imparted to each child at its birth, how can it be that the innumerable souls of those little ones, in regard to whom God knew with certainty that before attaining the age of reason, and before being able to know or understand what is right or wrong, they were to leave the body without being baptized, are justly given over to eternal death by Him with whom
"there is no unrighteousness!" ^ It is unnecessary to say more on this subject, since you know what I intend, or rather what I do not at present intend to say. I think what I have said is enough for a wise man. If, however, you have either read, or heard from the lips of Jerome, or received from the Lord when meditating on this difficult question, anything by which it can be solved, impart it to me, I beseech you, that I may acknowledge myself under yet greater obligation to you.

3. As to the question whether lying is in any case justifiable and expedient, it has appeared to you that it ought to be solved by the example of our Lord's saying, concerning the day and hour of the end of the world, "Neither doth the Son know it." ^
When I read this, I was charmed with it as an effort of your ingenuity; but I am by no means of opinion that a figurative mode of expression can be rightly termed a falsehood. For it is no falsehood to call a day joyous because it renders men joyous, or a lupine harsh because by its bitter flavour it imparts harshness to the countenance of him who tastes it, or to say that God knows something when He makes man know it (an instance quoted by yourself in these words of God to Abraham, "Now I know that thou fearest God").\(^1\) These are by no means false statements, as you yourself readily see. Accordingly, when the blessed Hilary explained this obscure statement of the Lord, by means of this obscure kind of figurative language, saying that we ought to understand Christ to affirm in these words that He knew not that day with no other meaning than that He, by concealing it, caused others not to know it, he did not by this explanation of the statement apologize for it as an excusable falsehood, but he showed that it was not a falsehood, as is proved by comparing it not only with these common figures of speech, but also with the metaphor, a mode of expression very familiar to all in daily conversation. For who will charge the man who says that harvest fields wave and children bloom with speaking falsely, because he sees not in these things the waves and the flowers to which these words are literally applied?

4. Moreover, a man of your talent and learning easily perceives how different from these metaphorical expressions is the statement of the apostle, "When I saw that they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?"\(^2\) Here there is no obscurity of figurative language; these are literal words of a plain statement. Surely, in addressing persons "of whom he travailed in birth till Christ should be formed in them," and to whom, in solemnly calling God to confirm his words, he said: "The things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not,"\(^*\) the great teacher of the Gentiles affirmed in the words above quoted either what was true or what was false; if he said what was false, which God forbid, you see the consequences which would follow; and Paul's own assertion of his veracity, together with the example of wondrous humility in the Apostle Peter, may warn you to recoil from such thoughts/

5. But why say more? This question the venerable Father Jerome and I have discussed fully in letters which we exchanged, and in his latest work, published under the name of Critdbulus, against Pelagius, he has maintained the same opinion concerning that transaction and the words of the apostle which, in accordance with the views of the blessed Cyprian, I myself have held. In regard to the question as to the origin of souls, I think there is reasonable ground for inquiry, not as to the giving of souls to the offspring of adulterous parents, but as to the condemnation (which God forbid) of those who are innocent. If you have learned anything from a man of such character and eminence as Jerome which might form a satisfactory answer to those in perplexity on this subject, I pray you not to refuse to communicate it to me. In your correspondence, you have approved yourself so learned and so affable that it is a privilege to hold intercourse with you by letter. I ask you not to delay to send a certain book by the same man of God, which the presbyter Orosius brought and gave to you to copy, in which the resurrection of the body is treated of by him in a manner said to merit distinguished praise. "We have not asked it earlier, because we knew that you had both to copy and to revise it; but for both of these we think we have now given you ample time.

Live to God, and be mindful of us.

LET. CLXXXVin.] TO JULIANA. 357

LETTEE CLXXXVIII.

(A.D. 416.)

TO THE LADY JULIANA, WORTHY TO BE HONOURED IN CHRIST WITH THE SERVICE DUE TO HER RANK, OUR DAUGHTER DESERVEDLY DISTINGUISHED, ALYPIUS AND AUGUSTINE SEND GREETING IN THE LORD.

Chap. i. 1. Lady, worthy to be honoured in Christ with the service due to your rank, and daughter deservedly distinguished, it was very pleasant and agreeable to us that your letter reached us when together at Hippo, so that we might send this joint reply to you, to express our joy in hearing of your welfare, and with sincere reciprocation of your love to let you know of our welfare, in which we are sure that you take an affectionate interest. We are well aware that you are not ignorant how great Christian affection we consider due to you, and how much, both before God and among men, we are interested in you. For though we knew you, at first by letter, afterwards by personal intercourse, to be pious and Catholic, that is, true members of the body of Christ, nevertheless, our humble ministry also was of use to you, for when you had received the word of God from us, “you received it,” as says the apostle, “not as the word of men, but as it is in truth the word of God.”^ Through the grace and mercy of the Saviour, so great was the fruit arising from this ministry of ours in your family, that when preparations for her marriage were already completed, the holy Demetrias preferred the spiritual embrace of that Husband who is fairer than the sons of men, and in espousing themselves to whom virgins retain their virginity, and gain more abundant spiritual fruitfulness. We should not, however, yet have known how this exhortation of ours had been received by the faithful and noble maiden, as we departed shortly before she took on her the vow of chastity, had we not learned from the joyful announcement and

^ In a letter of Jerome (the eighth) addressed to Demetrias, we have a very graphic narrative of the manner in which Demetrias foimed and carried into effect the vow for which she is here commended.

358 LETTERS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [LET. CLXXXVII

reliable testimony of your letter, that this great gift of God, planted and watered indeed by means of His servants, but owing its increase to Himself, had been granted to us as labourers in His vineyard.

2. Since these things are so, no one may charge us with presuming, if, on the ground of this closer spiritual relation, we manifest our solicitude for your welfare by warning you to avoid opinions opposed to the grace of God. For though the apostle commands us in preaching the word to be "instant in season and out of season," ^ yet we do not reckon you among the number of those to whom a word or a letter from us exhorting you carefully to avoid what is inconsistent with sound doctrine would seem " out of season." Hence it was that you received our admonition in so kindly a manner, that, in the letter to which we are now replying, you say, " I thank you heartily for the pious advice which your Everence gave me, not to lend an ear to those men who, by their mischievous writings, often corrupt our holy faith."

3. In this letter you go on to say, " But your Everence knows that I and my household are entirely separated from persons of this description; and all our family follow so strictly the Catholic faith as never at any time to have wandered from it, or fallen into any heresy, â€” I speak not of the heresy of sects who have erred in a measure hardly admitting of expiation, but of those whose errors seem to be trivial"

This statement renders it more and more necessary for us, in writing to you, not to pass over in silence the conduct of those who are attempting to corrupt even those who are sound in the faith. We consider your house to be no insignificant Church of Christ, nor indeed is the error of those men trivial who think that we of ourselves whatever righteousness, temperance, piety, chastity is in us, on the ground that God has so formed us, that beyond the revelation which He has given He imparts to us no further aid for performing by our own choice those things which by study we have ascertained to be our duty; declaring nature and knowledge to be the grace of God, and the only aid for living righteously and justly. For the possession, indeed, of a will inclined to what is good, whence proceed the life of uprightness and that love which so far excels all other gifts that God Himself is said to be love, and by which alone is fulfilled in us as far as we fulfil them, the divine law and counsel, â€” for the possession, I say, of such a will, they hold that we are not indebted to the aid of God, but affirm that we ourselves of our own will are sufficient for these things. Let it not appear to you a trifling error that men should wish to profess themselves Christians, and yet be unwilling to hear the apostle of Christ, who, having said, " The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts," lest any one should think that he had this love through his own free will, immediately subjoined, " by the Holy Spirit who is given unto us." ^ Understand, then, how greatly and how fatally that man errs who does not acknowledge that this is the "great gift of the Saviour,"^ who, when He ascended on high, " led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men.

Chap. ii. 4. How, then, could we so far conceal our true feelings as not to warn you, in whom we feel so deep an interest, to beware of such doctrines, after we had read a certain book addressed to the holy Demetrias ? Whether this book has reached you,* and who is its author, we are desirous to hear in your answer to this. In this book, were it lawful for such a one to read it, a virgin of Christ would read that her holiness and all her spiritual riches are to spring from no other source than herself, and thus, before she attains to the perfection of blessedness, she would learn, â€” which may God forbid ! â€” to be ungrateful to God. For the words addressed to her in the said book are these: â€” " You have here, then, those things on account of which you are deservedly, nay more, more especially to be preferred before others; for your earthly rank and wealth are understood to be derived from your relatives, not from yourself, but your spiritual riches no one can have conferred on you but yourself; for these, then, you are justly to be praised, for these you are deservedly to be preferred to others, for they can exist only from yourself, and in yourself." ^

5. You see, doubtless, how dangerous is the doctrine in these words, against which you must be on your guard. For the affirmation, indeed, that these spiritual riches can exist only in yourself, is very well and ti-uly said: that evidently is food; but the affirmation that they cannot exist except from you is unmixed poison. Far be it from any virgin of Christ willingly to listen to statements like these. Every virgin of Christ understands the innate poverty of the human heart, and therefore declines to have it adorned otherwise than by the gifts of her Spouse. Let her rather listen to the apostle when he says: " I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ." ^ And therefore in regard to these spiritual riches le^ her listen, not to him who says:
" No one can confer them on you except yourself, and they cannot exist except from you and in you; " but to him who says: " We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us." ^

6. In regard to that sacred virginal chastity, also, which does not belong to her from herself, but is the gift of God, bestowed, however, on her who is believing and willing, let her hear the same truthful and pious teacher, who when he treats of this subject says: " I would that all men were even as I myself: but every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that." ^* Let her hear also Him who is the only Spouse, not only of herself, but of the whole Church, thus speaking of this chastity and purity: "
All cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given; " * that she may understand that for her possession of this so great and excellent gift, she ought rather to render thanks to our God and Lord, than to listen to the words of any one who says that she possessed it from herself, â€” words which we may not designate as those of a flatterer, seeking to please, lest we seem to judge rashly concerning the hidden thoughts of men, but which are assuredly those of a misguided eulogist. For "every good gift and every perfect gift," as the Apostle James says, "is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights;" from this source, therefore, cometh this holy virginity, in which you who approve of it, and rejoice in it, have been excelled by your daughter, who, coming after you in birth, has gone before you in conduct; descended from you in lineage, has risen above you in honour; following you in age, has gone beyond you in holiness; in whom also that begins to be yours which could not be in your own person.

For she did not contract an earthly marriage, that she might be, not for herself only, but also for you, spiritually enriched in a higher degree than yourself, since you, even with this addition, are inferior to her, because you contracted the marriage of which she is the offspring. These things are gifts of God, and are yours indeed, but are not from yourselves; for you have this treasure in earthly bodies, which are still frail as the vessels of the potter, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of you. And be not surprised because we say that these things are yours, and not from you, for we speak of "daily bread " as ours, but yet add, "give it to us," lest it should be thought that it was from ourselves.

7. Wherefore obey the precept of Scripture, "Pray without ceasing. In everything give thanks;" for you pray in order that you may have constantly and increasingly these gifts, you render thanks because you have them not of yourself. For who separates you from that mass of death and perdition derived from Adam? Is it not He who came to seek and to save that which was lost?" * Was, then, a man, indeed, on hearing the apostle's question, "Who maketh thee to differ?" to reply, "My own good will, my faith, my righteousness," and to disregard what immediately follows?

"What hast thou that thou didst not receive? Now, if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received it?" We are unwilling, then, yea, utterly unwilling, that a consecrated virgin, when she hears or reads these words: "Your spiritual riches no one can have conferred on you; for these you are justly to be praised, for these you are deservedly to be preferred to others, for they can exist only from yourself, and in yourself," should thus boast of her riches as if she had not received them. Let her say, indeed, "In me are thy vows, God, I will render praises unto Thee;" but since they are in her, not from her, let her remember also to say, "Lord, by Thy will Thou hast furnished strength to my beauty," because, though it be from her, inasmuch as it is the acting of her own will, without which we cannot do what is good, yet we are not to say, as he said, that it is "only from her." For our own will, unless it be aided by the grace of God, cannot alone be even in name good will, for, says the apostle, "it is God who worketh in us, both to will, and to do according to good will," not, as these persons think, merely by revealing knowledge, that we may know what we ought to do, but also by inspiring Christian love, that we may also by choice perform the things which by study we have learned.

8. For doubtless the value of the gift of continence was known to him who said, "I perceived that no man can be continent unless God bestowed the gift." He not only knew then how great a benefit it was, and how eagerly it ought to be coveted, but also that, unless God gave it, it could not exist; for wisdom had taught him this, for he says, "This also was a point of wisdom, to know whose gift it was;" and the knowledge did not suffice him, but he says, "I went to the Lord and made my supplication to Him." * God then aids us in this matter, not only by making us know what is to be done, but also by making us do through love what we already know through learning. No one, therefore, can possess, not only knowledge, but also continence, unless God give it to him. Whence it was that when he had knowledge he prayed that he might have continence, that it might be in him, because he knew that it was not from him; or if on account of the freedom of his will it was in a certain sense from himself, yet it was not from himself alone, because no one can be continent unless God bestow on him the gift. But he whose opinions I am censuring, in speaking of spiritual riches, among which is doubtless that bright and beautiful gift of continence, does not say that they may exist in you, and from yourself, but says that they can exist only from you, and in you, in such a way that, as a virgin of Christ has these things nowhere else than in herself, so it can be believed possible for her to have them from no other source than from herself, and in this way (which may a merciful God avert from her heart !) she shall so boast as if she had not received them !

Chap, iil 9. We indeed hold such an opinion concerning the training of this holy virgin, and the Christian humility in which she was nourished and brought up, as to be assured that when she read these words, if she did read them, she would break out into lamentations, and humbly smite her breast, and perhaps burst into tears, and pray in faith to the Lord to whose service she was dedicated and by whom she was sanctified, pleading with Him that these were not her own words, but another's, and asking that her faith might not be such as to believe that she had anything whereof to glory in herself and not in the Lord. For her glory is in herself, not in the words of another, as the apostle says: "Let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have glory (rejoicing) in himself alone, and not in another." "But God forbid that her glory should be in herself, and not in Him to whom the Psalmist says, "Thou art my glory, and the lifter up of mine head." For her glory is then profitably in herself, when God, who is in her, is Himself her glory, from whom she has every good, by which she is good, and shall have all things by which she shall be made better, in as far as she may become better in this life, and by which she shall be made perfect when rendered so by divine grace, not by human praise. "For her soul shall be praised in the Lord," "who satisfieth her desire with good things," *because He Himself has inspired this desire, that His virgin should not boast of any good, as if she had not received it.

10. Inform us, then, in reply to this letter, whether we have judged truly in supposing these to be your daughter's sentiments. For we know well that you and all your family are, and have been, worshippers of the indivisible Trinity. But human error insinuates itself in other forms than in erroneous opinions concerning the indivisible Trinity. There are other subjects also, in regard to which men fall into very dangerous errors. As, for example, that of which we have spoken in this letter at greater length, perhaps, than might have sufficed to a person of your steadfast and pure wisdom. And yet we know not to whom, except to God, and therefore to the Trinity, wrong is done by the man who denies that the good that comes from God is from God; which evil may God avert from you, as we believe He does! May God altogether forbid that the book out of which we have thought it our duty to extract some words, that they might be more easily understood, should produce any such impression, we do not say on your mind, or on that of the holy virgin your daughter, but on the mind of the least deserving of your male or female servants.

11. But if you study more carefully even those words in which the writer appears to speak in favour of grace or the aid of God, you will find them so ambiguous that they may have reference either to nature or to knowledge, or to forgiveness of sins. For even in regard to that which they are forced to acknowledge, that we ought to pray that we may not enter into temptation, they may consider that the words mean that we are so far helped to it that, by our praying and knocking, the knowledge of the truth is so revealed to us that we may learn what it is our duty to do, not so far as that our will receives strength, whereby we may do that which we learn to be our duty; and as to their saying that it is by the grace or help of God that the Lord Christ has been set before us as an example of holy living, they interpret this so as to teach the same doctrine, affirming, namely, that we learn by His example how we ought to live, but denying that we are so aided as to do through love what we know by learning.
12. Find in this book, if you can, anything in which, excepting nature and the freedom of the will (which pertains to the same nature), and the remission of sin and the revealing of doctrine, any such aid of God is acknowledged as that which he acknowledges who said: "When I perceived that no man can be continent unless God bestow the gift, and that this also is a point of wisdom to know whose gift it is, I went to the Lord, and made my supplication to Him." ^ Tor he did not desire to receive, in answer to his prayer, the nature in which he was made; nor was he solicitous to obtain the natural freedom of the will with which he was made; nor did he crave the remission of sins, seeing that he prayed rather for continence, that he might not sin; nor did he desire to know what he ought to do, seeing that he already confessed that he knew whose gift this continence was; but he wished to receive from the Spirit of wisdom such strength of will, such ardour of love, as should suffice for fully practising the great virtue of continence. If, therefore, you succeed in finding any such statement in that book, we will heartily thank you if, in your answer, you deign to inform us of it.

13. It is impossible for us to tell how greatly we desire to find in the writings of these men, whose works are read by very many for their pungency and eloquence, the open confession of that grace which the apostle vehemently commends, who says that "God has given to every man the measure of faith," ^ "without which it is impossible to please God," ^ "by which the just live," ^ "which worketh by love," ^ before which and without which no works of any man are in any respect to be reckoned good, since "whatsoever is not of faith is sin." ^ He affirms that God distributes to every man, ^ and that we receive divine assistance to live piously and justly, not only by the revelation of that knowledge which without charity "puffeth up," ^ but by our being inspired with that "love which is the fulfilling of the law," ^ and which so edifies our heart that knowledge does not puff it up. But hitherto I have failed to find any such statements in the writings of these men.

14. But especially we should wish that these sentiments should be found in that book from which we have quoted the words in which the author, praising a virgin of Christ as if no one except herself could confer on her spiritual riches, and as if these could not exist except from herself, does not wish her to glory in the Lord, but to glory as if she had not received them. In this book, though it contain neither his name nor your own honoured name, he nevertheless mentions that a request had been made to him by the mother of the virgin to write to her. In a certain epistle of his, however, to which he openly attaches his name, and does not conceal the name of the sacred virgin, the same Pelagius says that he had written to her, and endeavours to prove, by appealing to the said work, that he most openly confessed the grace of God, which he is alleged to have passed over in silence, or denied. But we beg you to condescend to inform us, in your reply, whether that be the very book in which he has inserted these words about spiritual riches, and whether it has reached your Holiness.

TO BONIFACE,^ MY NOBLE LORD AND JUSTLY DISTINGUISHED AND HONOURABLE SON, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

1. I HAD already written a reply to your Charity, but while I was waiting for an opportunity of forwarding the letter, my beloved son Faustus arrived here on his way to your Excellency. After he had received the letter which I had intended to be carried by him to your Benevolence, he stated to me that you were very desirous that I should write you something which might build you up unto the eternal salvation of which you have hope in Christ Jesus our Lord. And, although I was busily occupied at the time, he insisted, with an earnestness corresponding to the love which, as you know, he bears to you, that I should do this without delay. To meet his convenience, therefore, as he was in haste to depart, I thought it better to write, though necessarily without much time for reflection, rather than put off the gratification of your pious desire, my noble lord and justly distinguished and honourable son.

* Count Boniface, to whom St. Augiistine also addressed Letters CLXXXV. and CCXX., was governor of the province of Africa under Placidia, who for twentyfive years ruled the empire in the name of her son Valentinian. By his peridious rival Aetias, Boniface was persuaded to disobey the order of Placidia, when, under the instigation of Aetius himself, she recalled him from the government of Africa. The necessity of powerful allies in order to maintain his position led him to invite the Vandals to pass from Spain into Africa. They came, under Genseric, and the fertile provinces of Northern Africa fell an easy prey to their invading armies. When the treachery of Aetius was discovered, Placidia received Boniface again into favour, and he devoted all his military talents to the task of expelling the barbarians whom his own invitation liad made masters of North Africa. But it was now too late to wrest this Roman province from the Vandals; defeated in a great battle, Boniface was compelled in 430 to retire into Hippo Kegius, where he succeeded in resisting the besieging army for fourteen months. It was during this siege, and after it had continued three months, that Augustine died. Reinforced by troops from Constantinople, Boniface fought one more desperate but unsuccessful battle, after which he left Hippo in the hands of Genseric, and returned by order of Placidia to Italy. For fuller particulars of his history, see Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire^ ch. xxxiii.

2. All is contained in these brief sentences: "Love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength: and love thy neighbour as thyself;"* for these are the words in which the Lord, when on earth, gave an epitome of religion, saying in the gospel, "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Daily advance, then, in this love, both by praying and by well-doing, that through the help of Him who enjoined it on you, and whose gift it is, it may be nourished and increased, until, being perfected, it render you perfect. "For this is the love which," as the apostle says, "is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us."* This is "the fulfilling of the law;"* this is the same love by which faith works, of which he says again, "Neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision; but faith, which worketh by love." *

3. In this love, then, all our holy fathers, patriarchs, prophets, and apostles pleased God. In this all true martyrs contended against the devil even to the shedding of blood, and because in them it neither waxed cold nor failed, they became conquerors. In this all true believers daily make progress, seeking to acquire not an earthly kingdom, but the kingdom of heaven; not a temporal, but an eternal inheritance; not gold and silver, but the incorruptible riches of the angels; not the good things of this life, which are enjoyed with trembling, and which no one can take with him when he dies, but the vision of God, whose grace and power of imparting felicity transcend all beauty of form in bodies not only on earth but also in heaven, transcend all spiritual loveliness in men, however just and holy, transcend all the glory of the angels and powers of the world above, transcend not only all that language can express, but all that thought can imagine concerning Him. And let us not despair of the fulfilment of such a great promise because it is exceeding great, but rather believe that we shall receive it because He who has promised it is exceeding great, as the blessed Apostle John says: "Now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is." ^

4. Do not think that it is impossible for any one to please God while engaged in active military service. Among such persons was the holy David, to whom God gave so great a testimony; among them also were many righteous men of that time; among them was also that centurion who said to the Lord: "I am not worthy that Thou shouldest come under my roof, but speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed: for I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me: and I say to this man. Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant. Do this, and he doeth it;" and concerning whom the Lord said: "Verily, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." ^ Among them was that Cornelius to whom an angel said: "Cornelius, thine alms are accepted, and thy prayers are heard," when he directed him to send to the blessed Apostle Peter, and to hear from him what he ought to do, to which apostle he sent a devout soldier, requesting him to come to him. Among them were also the soldiers who, when they had come to be baptized by John, "the sacred forerunner of the Lord, and the friend of the Bridegroom, of whom the Lord says: "Among them that are born of women there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist," *â€” and had inquired of him what they should do, received the answer, "Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely;

and be content with your wages." ^ Certainly he did not prohibit them to serve as soldiers when he commanded them to be content with their pay for the service.
5. They occupy indeed a higher place before God who, abandoning all these secular employments, serve Him with the strictest chastity; but "every one," as the apostle says, "hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that." Some, then, in praying for you, fight against your invisible enemies; you, in fighting for them, contend against the barbarians, their visible enemies. Would that one faith existed in all, for then there would be less weary struggling, and the devil with his angels would be more easily conquered; but since it is necessary in this life that the citizens of the kingdom of heaven should be subjected to temptations among erring and impious men, that they may be exercised, and "tried as gold in the furnace," we ought not before the appointed time to desire to live with those alone who are holy and righteous, so that, by patience, we may deserve to receive this blessedness in its proper time.

6. Think, then, of this first of all, when you are arming for the battle, that even your bodily strength is a gift of God; for, considering this, you will not employ the gift of God against God. For, when faith is pledged, it is to be kept even with the enemy against whom the war is waged, how much more with the friend for whom the battle is fought! Peace should be the object of your desire; war should be waged only as a necessity, and waged only that God may by it deliver men from the necessity and preserve them in peace. For peace is not sought in order to the kindling of war, but war is waged in order that peace may be obtained. Therefore, even in waging war, cherish the spirit of a peacemaker, that, by conquering those whom you attack, you may lead them back to the advantages of peace; for our Lord says: "Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God." If, however, peace among men be so sweet as procuring temporal safety, how much sweeter is that peace with God which procures for men the eternal felicity of the angels! Let necessity, therefore, and not your will, slay the enemy who fights against you. As violence is used towards him who rebels and resists, so mercy is due to the vanquished or the captive, especially in the case in which future troubling of the peace is not to be feared.

7. Let the manner of your life be adorned by chastity, sobriety, and moderation; for it is exceedingly disgraceful that lust should subdue him whom man finds invincible, and that wine should overpower him whom the sword assails in vain. As to worldly riches, if you do not possess them, let them not be sought after on earth by doing evil; and if you possess them, let them by good works be laid up in heaven. The manly and Christian spirit ought neither to be elated by the accession, nor crushed by the loss of this world's treasures.
Let us rather think of what the Lord says: "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."^ and certainly, when we hear the exhortation to lift up our hearts, it is our duty to give unfeignedly the response which you know that we are accustomed to give.^

8. In these things, indeed, I know that you are very careful, and the good report which I hear of you fills me with great delight, and moves me to congratulate you on account of it in the Lord. This letter, therefore, may serve rather as a mirror in which you may see what you are, than as a directory from which to learn what you ought to be: nevertheless, whatever you may discover, either from this letter or from the Holy Scriptures, to be still wanting to you in regard to a holy life, persevere in urgently seeking it both by effort and by prayer; and for the things which you have, give thanks to God as the Fountain of goodness, whence you have received them; in every good action let the glory be given to God, and humility be exercised by you, for, as it is written,

Cometh down from the Father of lights."^ But however much you may advance in the love of God and of your neighbour, and in true piety, do not imagine, as long as you are in this life, that you are without sin, for concerning this we read in Holy Scripture: " Is not the life of man upon earth a life of temptation? "^ Wherefore, since always, as long as you are in this body, it is necessary for you to say in prayer, as the Lord taught us: " Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors,"^ remember quickly to forgive, if any one shall do you wrong and shall ask pardon from you, that you may be able to pray sincerely, and may prevail in seeking pardon for your own sins.

These things, my beloved friend, I have written to you in haste, as the anxiety of the bearer to depart urged me not to detain him; but I thank God that I have in some measure complied with your pious wish. May the mercy of God ever protect you, my noble lord and justly distinguished son.

LETTEE CXCL

TO MY VENERABLE LORD AND PIOUS BROTHER AND CO-PRESBYTER SIXTUS,* WORTHY OF BEING RECEIVED IN THE LOVE OF CHRIST, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

1. Since the arrival of the letter which, in my absence, your Grace forwarded by our holy brother the presbyter Firmus, and which I read on my return to Hippo, but not until after the bearer had departed, the present is my first opportunity of sending to you any reply, and it is with great pleasure that I entrust it to our very dearly beloved son, the acolyte Albinus.

Your letter, addressed to Alypius and myself jointly, came at a time when we were not together, and this is the reason why

His name is the forty-third in the list of Popes, and he was in office from 432 to 440 a.d. The 194th letter of Augustine was addressed to the same Sixtus, and is a very elaborate dissertation on Pelagianism. It is omitted from this selection as being rather a theological treatise than a letter.

you will now receive a letter from each of us, instead of one from both, in reply. For the bearer of this letter has just gone, meanwhile, from me to visit my venerable brother and co-bishop Alypius, who will write a reply for himself to your Holiness, and he has carried with him your letter, which I had already perused. As to the great joy with which that letter filled my heart, why should a man attempt to say what it is impossible to express ? Indeed, I do not think that you yourself have any adequate idea of the amount of good done by your sending that letter to us; but take our word for it, for as you bear witness to your feelings, so do we bear witness to ours, declaring how profoundly we have been moved by the perfectly transparent soundness of the views declared in that letter. For if, when you sent a very short letter on the same subject to the most blessed aged Aurelius, by the acolyte Leo, we transcribed it with joyful alacrity, and read it with enthusiastic interest to all who were within our reach, as an exposition of your sentiments, both in regard to that most fatal dogma [of Pelagius], and in regard to the grace of God freely given by Him to small and great, to which that dogma is diametrically opposed; how great, think you, is the joy with which we have read this more extended statement in your writing, how great the zeal with which we take care that it be read by all to whom we have been able already or may yet be able to make it known ! For what could be read or heard with greater satisfaction than so clear a defence of the grace of God against its enemies, from the mouth of one who was before this proudly claimed by these enemies as a mighty supporter of their cause ? ^ Or is there anything for which we ought to give more abundant thanksgivings to God, than that His grace is so ably defended by those to whom it is given, against those to whom it is not given, or by whom, when given, it is not accepted, because in the secret and just judgment of God the disposition to accept it is not given to them ?

2. Wherefore, my venerable lord, and holy brother worthy of being received in the love of Christ, although you render a most excellent service when you thus write on this subject to brethren before whom the adversaries are wont to boast themselves of your being their friend, nevertheless, there remains upon you the yet greater duty of seeing not only that those be punished with wholesome severity who dare to prate more openly their declaration of that error, most dangerously hostile to the Christian name, but also that with pastoral vigilance, on behalf of the weaker and simpler sheep of the Lord, most strenuous precautions be used against those who more covertly, indeed, and timidly, but perseveringly, and in whispers, as it were, teach this error, " creeping into houses," as the apostle says, and doing with practised impiety all those other things which are mentioned immediately afterwards in that passage:^

'Nov ought those to be overlooked who under the restraint of fear hide their sentiments under the most profound silence, yet have not ceased to cherish the same perverse opinions as before. For some of their party might be known to you before that pestilence was denounced by the most explicit condemnation of the apostolic see, whom you perceive to have now become suddenly silent; nor can it be ascertained whether they have been really cured of it, otherwise than through their not only forbearing from the utterance of these false dogmas, but also defending the truths which are opposed to their former errors with the same zeal as they used to show on the other side. These are, however, to be more gently dealt with; for what need is there for causing further terror to those whom their silence itself proves to be sufficiently terrified already ? At the same time, though they should not be frightened, they should be taught; and in my opinion they may more easily, while their fear of severity assists the teacher of the truth, be so taught that by the Lord's help, after they have learned to understand and love His grace, they may speak out as antagonists of the error which meanwhile they dare not confess.

1 2 Tim. iii. 6.
1. I WAS at a considerable distance from home when the letter of your Holiness addressed to me at Hippo arrived by the hands of the clerk Projectus. When I had returned home, and, having read your letter, felt myself to be owing you a reply, I was still waiting for some means of communicating with you, when, lo! a most desirable opportunity presented itself in the departure of our very dear brother the acolyte Albinus, who leaves us immediately. Eejoying, therefore, in your health, which is most earnestly desired by me, I return to your Holiness the salutation which I was owing. But I always owe you love, the only debt which, even when it has been paid, holds him who has paid it a debtor still. For it is given when it is paid, but it is owing even after it has been given, for there is no time at which it ceases to be due. JSTor when it is given is it lost, but it is rather multiplied by giving it; for in possessing it, not in parting with it, it is given. And since it cannot be given unless it is possessed, so neither can it be possessed unless it is given; nay, at the very time when it is given by a man it increases in that man, and, according to the number of persons to whom it is given, the amount of it which is gained becomes greater. Moreover, how can that be denied to friends which is due even to enemies? To enemies, however, this debt is paid with caution, whereas to friends it is repaid with confidence. Nevertheless, it uses every effort to secure that it receives back what it gives, even in the case of those to whom it renders good for evil. For we wish to have as a friend the man whom, as an enemy, we truly love, for we do not sincerely love him unless we wish him to be good, which he cannot be until he be delivered from the sin of cherished enmities.

2. Love, therefore, is not paid away in the same manner as money; for, whereas money is diminished, love is increased by paying it away. They differ also in this, â€” that we give evidence of greater goodwill to the man to whom we may have given money if we do not seek to have it returned; but no one can be a true donor of love unless he lovingly insist on its repayment. For money, when it is received, accues to him to whom it is given, but forsakes him by whom it is given; love, on the contrary, even when it is not repaid, nevertheless increases with the man who insists on its repayment by the person whom he loves; and not only so, but the person by whom it is returned to him does not begin to possess it till he pays it back again.

Wherefore, my lord and brother, I willingly give to you, and joyfully receive from you, the love which we owe to each other. The love which I receive I still claim, and the love which I give I still owe. For we ought to obey with docility the precept of the One Master, whose disciples we both profess to be, when He says to us by His apostle: "Owe no man anything, but to love one another." ^ come forth alone, rather than linger behind with those who are doomed to perish. Your wisdom apprehends what I mean to say. Go on and prosper! You are renowned throughout the whole world; Catholics revere and look up to you as the restorer of the ancient faith, and all which is a token of yet more illustrious glory all heretics abhor you. They persecute me also with equal hatred, seeking by imprecation to take away the life which they cannot reach with the sword.

May the mercy of Christ the Lord preserve you in safety and mindful of me, my venerable lord and most blessed father.-^

THE EMPERORS HONORIUS AUGUSTUS AND THEodosius Augustus TO BISHOP AURELIUS SEND GREETING.
1. It had been indeed long ago decreed that Pelagius and Celestius, the authors of an execrable heresy, should, as pestilent corrupters of the Catholic truth, be expelled from the city of Kome, lest they should, by their baneful influence, pervert the minds of the ignorant. In this our clemency followed up the judgment of your Holiness, according to which it is beyond all question that they were unanimously condemned after an impartial examination of their opinions. Their obstinate persistence in the offence having, however, made it necessary to issue the decree a second time, we have enacted further by a recent edict, that if any one, knowing that they are concealing themselves in any part of the provinces, shall delay either to drive them out or to inform on them, he, as an accomplice, shall be liable to the punishment prescribed.

2. To secure, however, the combined efforts of the Christian

^ In two MSS. this letter has, as a postscript, the letter already translated as CXXIII.; see page 123. The reason for that letter being supposed to belong to the year 410 is the interpretation which some put upon one of its obscure sentences as alluding to the fall of Rome in that year. If, however, the sentence in question referred to the ecclesiastical difficulties disturbing Jerusalem and all the East in connection with the Pelagian controversy, there is nothing to forbid the conjecture which its place in the MSS. aforesaid suggests, namely, that it was sent at the same time as this letter, with which in them it stands connected.

zeal of all men for the destruction of this preposterous heresy, it will be proper, most dearly beloved father, that the authority of your Holiness be applied to the correction of certain bishops, who either support the evil reasonings of these men by their silent consent, or abstain from assailing them with open opposition. Let your Eeverence, then, by suitable writings, cause all bishops to be admonished (as soon as they shall know, by the order of your Holiness, that this order is laid upon them) that whoever shall, through impious obstinacy, neglect to vindicate the purity of their doctrine by subscribing the condemnation of the persons before mentioned, shall, after being punished by the loss of their episcopal office, be cut off by excommunication and banished for life from their sees.

For as, by a sincere confession of the truth, we ourselves, in obedience to the Council of Nce, worship God as the Creator of all things, and as the Fountain of our imperial sovereignty, your Holiness will not suffer the members of this odious sect, inventing, to the injury of religion, notions new and strange, to hide in writings privately circulated an error condemned by public authority. For, most beloved and loving father, the guilt of heresy is in no degree less grievous in those who either by dissimulation lend the error their secret support, or by abstaining from denouncing it extend to it a fatal approbation.

{In another hand.) May the Divinity preserve you in safety for many years !
Given at Eavenna, on the 9th day of June, in the Consulship of Monaxius and Plinta.

A letter, in the same terms, was also sent to the holy Bishop Augustine.

TO THE BISHOPS ALYPIUS AND AUGUSTINE, MY LORDS TRULY HOLY, AND DESERVEDLY LOVED AND REVERENCED, JEROME SENDS GREETING IN CHRIST.

Chap. i. 1. The holy presbyter Innocentius, who is the bearer of this letter, did not last year take with him a letter from me to your Eminences, as he had no expectation of returning to Africa. We thank God, however, that it so happened, as it afforded you an opportunity of overcoming [evil with good in requiting] our silence by your letter. Every opportunity of writing to you, revered fathers, is most acceptable to me. I call God to witness that, if it were possible, I would take the wings of a dove and fly to be folded in your embrace. Loving you, indeed, as I have always done, from a deep sense of your worth, but now especially because your co-operation and your leadership have succeeded in strangling the heresy of Celestius, a heresy which has so poisoned the hearts of many, that, though they felt they were vanquished and condemned, yet they did not lay aside their venomous sentiments, and, as the only thing that remained in their power, hated us by whom they imagined that they had lost the liberty of teaching heretical doctrines.

Chap. il 2. As to your inquiry whether I have written in opposition to the books of Annianus, this pretended deacon of Celedse, who is amply provided for in order that he may furnish frivolous accounts of the blasphemies of others, know that I received these books, sent in loose sheets by our holy brother, the presbyter Eusebius, not long ago. Since then I have suffered so much through the attacks of disease, and through the falling asleep of your distinguished and holy daughter Eustochium, that I almost thought of passing over these writings with silent contempt. For he flounders from beginning to end in the same mud, and, with the exception of some jingling phrases which are not original, says nothing he had not said before. Nevertheless, I have gained much in the fact, that xn attempting to answer my letter he has declared his opinions with less reserve, and has published to all men his blasphemies; for every error which he disowned in the wretched synod of Diospolis he in this treatise openly avows.
It is indeed no great thing to answer his superlatively silly puerilities, but if the Lord spare me, and I have a sufficient staff of amanuenses, I will in a few brief lucubrations answer him, not to refute a defunct heresy, but to silence his ignorance and blasphemy by arguments; and this your Holiness could do better than I, as you would relieve me from the necessity of praising my own works in writing to the heretic. Our holy daughters Albina and Melania, and our son Pinianus, salute you cordially. I give to our holy presbyter Innocentius this short letter to convey to you from the holy place Bethlehem.

Your niece Paula piteously entreats you to remember her, and salutes you warmly. May the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve you safe and mindful of me, my lords truly holy, and fathers deservedly loved and reverenced.

(A.D. 420.)

TO MY NOBLE LORD AND MOST EXCELLENT AND LOVING SON, LARGUS, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

I RECEIVED the letter of your Excellency, in which you ask me to write to you. This assuredly you would not have done unless you had esteemed acceptable and pleasant that which you supposed me capable of writing to you. In other words, I assume that, having desired the vanities of this life when you had not tried them, now, after the trial has been made, you despise them, because in them the pleasure is deceitful, the labour fruitless, the anxiety perpetual, the elevation dangerous. Men seek them at first through imprudence, and give them up at last with disappointment and remorse. This is true of all the things which, in the cares of this mortal life, are coveted with more eagerness than wisdom by the uneasy solicitude of the men of the world. But it is wholly otherwise with the hope of the pious: very different is the fruit of their labours, very different the reward of their dangers. Pear and grief, and labour and danger are unavoidable, so long as we live in this world; but the great question is, for what cause, with what expectation, with what aim a man endures these things. When, indeed, I contemplate the lovers of this world, I know not at what time wisdom can most opportunely attempt their moral improvement; for when they have apparent prosperity, they reject disdainfully her salutary admonitions, and regard them as old wives’ fables; when, again, they are in adversity, they think rather of escaping merely from present suffering than of obtaining the real remedy by which.
they may be made whole, and may arrive at that place where they shall be altogether exempt from suffering. Occasionally, however, some open their ears and hearts to the truth, â€” rarely in prosperity, more frequently in adversity. These are indeed the few, for such it is predicted that they shall be. Among these I desire you to be, because I love you truly, my noble lord and most excellent and loving son. Let this counsel be my answer to your letter, because though I am unwilling that you should henceforth suffer such things as you have endured, yet I would grieve still more if you were found to have suffered these things without any change for the better in your life.

LETTEE CCVII

TO THE LADY FELICIA, HIS DAUGHTER IN" THE FAITH, AND WORTHY OF HONOUR AMONG THE MEMBERS OF CHRIST, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

1. I DO not doubt, when I consider both your faith and the weakness or wickedness of others, that your mind has been disturbed, for even a holy apostle, full of compassionate love, confesses a similar experience, saying, " Who is weak, and I am not weak? who is offended, and I burn not V^ Wherefore, as I myself share your pain, and am solicitous for your welfare in Christ, I have thought it my duty to address this letter, partly consolatory, partly hortatory, to your Holiness, because in the body of our Lord Jesus Christ, in which all His members are one, you are very closely related to us, being loved as an honourable member in that body, and partaking with us of life in His Holy Spirit.

2. I exhort you, therefore, not to be too much troubled by those offences which for this very reason were foretold as destined to come, that when they came w^e might remember that they had been foretold, and not be greatly disconcerted by them. For the Lord Himself in His gospel foretold them, saying, " Woe unto the world because of offences ! for it must needs be that offences come; but woe unto that man by whom the offence cometh!"^ These are the men of whom the ^ 2 Cor. xi. 29. * Matt, xviii. 7.

LET. CCVIII.] TO FELICIA. 381
The apostle said, "They seek their own, not the things that are Jesus Christ's." There are, therefore, some who hold the honourable office of shepherds in order that they may provide for the flock of Christ; others occupy that position that they may enjoy the temporal honours and secular advantages connected with the office. It must needs happen that these two kinds of pastors, some dying, others succeeding them, should continue in the Catholic Church even to the end of time, and the judgment of the Lord. If, then, in the times of the apostles there were men such that Paul, grieved by their conduct, enumerates among his trials, "perils among false brethren," and yet he did not haughtily cast them out, but patiently bore with them, how much more must such arise in our times, since the Lord most plainly says concerning this age which is drawing to a close, "that because iniquity shall abound the love of many shall wax cold." The word which follows, however, ought to console and exhort us, for He adds, "He that shall endure to the end, the same shall be saved."

3. Moreover, as there are good shepherds and bad shepherds, so also in the flocks there are good and bad. The good are represented by the name of sheep, but the bad are called goats: they feed, nevertheless, side by side in the same pastures, until the Chief Shepherd, who is called the One Shepherd, shall come and separate them one from another according to His promise, "as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats." On us He has laid the duty of gathering the flock; to Himself He has reserved the work of final separation, because it pertains properly to Him who cannot err. For those presumptuous servants, who have lightly ventured to separate before the time which the Lord has reserved in His own hand, have, instead of separating others, only been separated themselves from Catholic unity; for how could those have a clean flock who have by schism become unclean?

4. In order, therefore, that we may remain in the unity of the faith, and not, stumbling at the offences occasioned by the chaff, desert the threshing-floor of the Lord, but rather remain as wheat till the final winnowing, and by the love which imparts stability to us bear with the beaten straw, our great Shepherd in the gospel admonishes us concerning the good shepherds, that we should not, on account of their good works, place our hope in them, but glorify our heavenly Father for making them such; and concerning the bad shepherds (whom He designed to point out under the name of Scribes and Pharisees), He reminds us that they teach that which is good, though they do that which is evil.

5. Concerning the good shepherds He thus speaks: "Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven." ^ Concerning the bad shepherds He admonishes the sheep in these words: " The Scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: all, therefore, whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say, and do not." ^ When these are listened to, the sheep of Christ, even through evil teachers, hear His voice, and do not forsake the unity of His flock, because the good which they hear them teach belongs not to the shepherds but to Him, and therefore the sheep are safely fed, since even under bad shepherds they are nourished in the Lord's pastures. They do not, however, imitate the actions of the bad shepherds, because such actions belong not to the world but to the shepherds themselves. In regard, however, to those whom they see to be good shepherds, they not only hear the good things which they teach, but also imitate the good actions which they perform. Of this number was the apostle, who said: " Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ." * He was a light kindled by the Eternal Light, the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, and was placed on a candlestick because He gloried in His cross, concerning which he said: " God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." ^ Moreover, since he sought not his own things, but the things which are Jesus Christ's, whilst he exhorts to the imitation of his own life those whom he had " begotten through the gospel," ^ he

yet severely reproved those who, by the names of apostles, introduced schisms, and he chides those who said, " I am of Paul; was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?"^

6. Hence we understand both that the good shepherds are those who seek not their own, but the things of Jesus Christ, and that the good sheep, though imitating the works of the good shepherds by whose ministry they have been gathered together, do not place their hope in them, but rather in the Lord, by whose blood they are redeemed; so that when they may happen to be placed under bad shepherds, preaching Christ's doctrine and doing their own evil works, they will do what they teach, but will not do what they do, and will not, on account of these sons of wickedness, forsake the pastures of the one true Church. For there are both good and bad in the Catholic Church, which, unlike the Donatist sect, is extended and spread abroad, not in Africa only, but through all nations; as the apostle expresses it, " bringing forth fruit, and increasing in the whole world." ^ But those who are separated from the Church, as long as they are opposed to it cannot be good; although an apparently praiseworthy conversation seems to prove some of them to be good, their separation from the Church itself renders them bad, according to the saying of the Lord: "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth."

7. Therefore, my daughter, worthy of all welcome and honour among the members of Christ, I exhort you to hold faithfully that which the Lord has committed to you, and love with all your heart Him and His Church who suffered you not, by joining yourself with the lost, to lose the recompense of your virginity, or perish with them. Por if you should depart out of this world separated from the unity of the body of Christ, it will avail you nothing to have preserved inviolate your virginity. But God, who is rich in mercy, has done in regard to you that which is written in the gospel: when the invited guests excused themselves to the master of the feast, he said to the servants, "Go ye, therefore, into the highways and hedges, and as many as ye shall find compel them to come in."

^ Although, however, you owe sincerest affection to those good servants of His through whose instrumentality you were compelled to come in, yet it is your duty, nevertheless, to place your hope on Him who prepared the banquet, by whom also you have been persuaded to come to eternal and blessed life. Committing to Him your heart, your vow, and your sacred virginity, and your faith, hope, and charity, you will not be moved by offences, which shall abound even to the end; but, by the unshaken strength of piety, shall be safe and shall triumph in the Lord, continuing in the unity of His body even to the end. Let me know, by your answer, with what sentiments you regard my anxiety for you, to which I have to the best of my ability given expression in this letter. May the grace and mercy of God ever protect you!

TO CIELESTINE,^ MY LORD |\MOST BLESSED, AND HOLY FATHER |\VENERATED WITH ALL DUE AFFECTION, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

1. First of all I congratulate you that our Lord God has, as we have heard, established you in the illustrious chair which you occupy without any division among His people. In the next place, I lay before your Holiness the state of affairs with us, that not only by your prayers, but with your counsel and aid you may help us. For I write to you at this time under deep affliction, because, while wishing to benefit certain members of Christ in our neighbourhood, I brought on them a great calamity by my want of prudence and caution.

2. Bordering on the district of Hippo, there is a small town: named Fussala: formerly there was no bishop there, but, along with the contiguous district, it was included in the parish of Hippo. That part of the country had few Catholics; the error of the Donatists held under its miserable influence all the other congregations located in the midst of a large population, so that in the town of Fussala itself there was not one Catholic. In the mercy of God, all these places were brought to attach themselves to the unity of the Church; with how much toil, and how many dangers it would take long to tell, â€” how the presbyters originally appointed by us to gather these people into the fold were robbed, beaten, maimed, deprived of their eyesight, and even put to death; whose sufferings, however, were not useless and unfruitful, seeing that by them the re-establishment of unity was achieved. But as Fussala is forty miles distant from Hippo, and I saw that in governing its people, and gathering together the remnant, however small, of persons of both sexes, who, not threatening others, but fleeing for their own safety, were scattered here and there, my work would be extended farther than it ought, and that I could not give the attention which I clearly perceived to be necessary, I arranged that a bishop should be ordained and appointed there.

3. With a view to the carrying out of this, I sought for a person who might be suitable to the locality and people, and at the same time acquainted with the Punic language; and I had in my mind a presbyter fitted for the office.
Having applied by letter to the holy senior bishop who was then Primate of Numidia, I obtained his consent to come from a great distance to ordain this presbyter. After his coming, when all our minds were intent on an affair of so great consequence, at the last moment, the person whom I believed to be ready to be ordained disappointed us by absolutely refusing to accept the office. Then I myself, who, as the event showed, ought rather to have postponed than precipitated a matter so perilous, being unwilling that the very venerable and holy old man, who had come with so much fatigue to us, should return home without accomplishing the business for which he had journeyed so far, offered to the people, without their seeking him, a young man, Antonius, who was then with me. He had been from childhood brought up in a monastery by us, but, beyond officiating as a reader, he had no experience of the labours pertaining to the various degrees of rank in the clerical office. The unhappy people, not knowing what was to follow, submissively trusting me, accepted him on my suggestion. What need I say more? The deed was done; he entered on his office as their bishop.

4. What shall I do? I am unwilling to accuse before your venerable Dignity one whom I brought into the fold, and nourished with care; and I am unwilling to forsake those in seeking whose ingathering to the Church I have travailed, amid fears and anxieties; and how to do justice to both I cannot discover. The matter has come to such a painful crisis, that those who, in compliance with my wishes, had, in the belief that they were consulting their own interests, chosen him for their bishop, are now bringing charges against him before me. When the most serious of these, namely, charges of gross immorality, which were brought forward not by those whose bishop he was, but by certain other individuals, were found to be utterly unsupported by evidence, and he seemed to us fully acquitted of the crimes laid most ungenerously to his charge, he was on this account regarded, both by ourselves and by others, with such sympathy that the things complained of by the people of Fussala and the surrounding district, such as intolerable tyranny and spoliation, and extortion, and oppression of various kinds, by no means seemed so grievous that for one, or for all of them taken together, we should deem it necessary to deprive him of the office of bishop; it seemed to us enough to insist that he should restore what might be proved to have been taken away unjustly.

5. In line, we so mixed clemency with severity in our sentence, that while reserving to him his office of bishop, we did not leave altogether unpunished offences which behoved neither to be repeated again by himself, nor held forth to the imitation of others. We therefore, in correcting him, reserved to the young man the rank of his office unimpaired, but at the same time, as a punishment, we took away his power, appointing that he should not any longer rule over those with whom he had dealt in such a manner, that with just resentment they, could not submit to his authority, and might perhaps manifest their impatient indignation by breakinj forth into some deeds of violence fraught with danger both to themselves and to him. That this was the state of feeling evidently appeared when the bishops dealt with them concerning Antoniiis, although at present that conspicuous man Celer, of whose powerful interference against him he complained, possesses no power, either in Africa or elsewhere.

G. But why should I detain you with further particulars? I beseech you to assist us in this laborious matter, blessed lord and holy father, venerated for your piety, and revered with due affection; and command all the documents which have been forwarded to be read aloud to you. Observe in what manner Antonius discharged his duties as bishop; how, when debarred from communion until full restitution should be made to the men of Fussala, he submitted to our sentence, and has now set apart a sum out of which to pay what may after inquiry be deemed just for compensation, in order that the privilege of communion might be restored to him; with what crafty reasoning he prevailed on our aged primate, a most venerable man, to believe all his statements, and to recommend him as altogether blameless to the venerable Pope Boniface. But why should I rehearse all the rest, seeing that the venerable old man aforesaid must have reported the entire matter to your Holiness?

7. In the numerous minutes of procedure in which our judgment regarding him is recorded, I should have feared that we might appear to you to have passed a sentence less severe than we ought to have done, did I not know that you are so prone to mercy that you will deem it your duty to spare not us only, because we spared him, but also the man himself. But what we did, whether in kindness or laxity, he attempts to turn to account, and use as a legal objection to our sentence. He boldly protests: "Either I ought to sit in my own episcopal chair, or ought not to be a bishop at all," as if he were now sitting in any seat but his own.

For, on this very account, those places were set apart and assigned to him in which he had previously been bishop, that he might not be said to be unlawfully translated to another see, contrary to the statutes of the Fathers; or is it to be maintained that one ought to be so rigid an advocate, either for severity or for lenity, as to insist, either that no punishment be inflicted on those who seem not to deserve deposition from the office of bishop, or that the sentence of deposition be pronounced on all who seem to deserve any punishment?

8. There are cases on record, in which the Apostolic See, either pronouncing judgment or confirming the judgment of others, sanctioned decisions by which persons, for certain offences, were neither deposed from their episcopal office nor left altogether unpunished. I shall not bring forward those which occurred at a period very remote from our own time; I shall mention recent instances. Let Priscus, a bishop of the province of Ctesarea, protest boldly: "Either the office of primate should be open to me, a\^ to other bishops, or I ought not to remain a bishop." Let Victor, another bishop of the same province, with whom, when involved in the same sentence as Priscus, no bishop beyond his own diocese holds communion, let him, I say, protest with similar confidence: "Either I ought to have communion everywhere, or I ought not to have it in my own district." Let Laurentius, a third bishop of the same province, speak, and in the precise words of this man he may exclaim: "Either I ought to sit in the chair to which I have been ordained, or I ought not to be a bishop." But who can find fault with these judgments, except one who does not consider that, neither on the one hand ought all offences to be left unpunished, nor on the other ought all to be punished in one way?

9. Since, then, the most blessed Pope Boniface, speaking of Bishop Antonius, has in his epistle, with the vigilant caution becoming a pastor, inserted in his judgment the additional clause, "if he has faithfully narrated the facts of the case to us," receive now the facts of the case, which in his statement to you he passed over in silence, and also the transactions which took place after the letter of that man of blessed memory had been read in Africa, and in the mercy of Christ extend your aid to men imploring it more earnestly than he does from whose turbulence they desire to be freed. For either from himself, or at least from very frequent rumours, threats are held out that the courts of justiciary, and the public authorities, and the violence of the military, are to carry into force the decision of the Apostolic See; the effect of which is that these unhappy men, being now Catholic Christians, dread greater evils from a Catholic bishop than those which, when they were heretics, they dreaded from the laws of Catholic emperors. Do not permit these things to be done, I implore you, by the blood of Christ, by the memory of the Apostle Peter, who has warned those placed over Christian people against violently "lording it over their brethren."^ I commend to the gracious love of your Holiness the Catholics of Fussala, my children in Christ, and also Bishop Antonius, my son in Christ, for I love both, and I commend both to you. I do not blame the people of Fussala for bringing to your ears their just complaint against me for imposing on them a man whom I had not proved, and who was in age at least not yet established, by whom they have been so afflicted; nor do I wish any wrong done to Antonius, whose evil covetousness I oppose with a determination proportioned to my sincere affection for him. Let your compassion be extended to both, "â€” to them, so that they may not suffer evil; to him, so that he may not do evil; to them, so that they may not hate the Catholic Church, if they find no aid in defence against a Catholic bishop extended to them by Catholic bishops, and especially by the Apostolic See itself; to him, on the other hand, so that he may not involve himself in such grievous wickedness as to alienate from Christ those whom against their will he endeavours to make his own.

10. As for myself, I must acknowledge to your Holiness, that in the danger which threatens both, I am so racked with anxiety and grief that I think of retiring from the responsibilities of the episcopal office, and abandoning myself to demonstrations of sorrow corresponding to the greatness of my error, if I shall see (through the conduct of him in favour of whose election to the bishopric I imprudently gave my vote) the Church of God laid waste, and (which may God forbid) I even perish, involving in its destruction the man by whom it was laid waste. Recollecting what the apostle says: "K we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged."^ I will judge myself, that He may spare me who is hereafter to judge the quick and the dead. If, however, you succeed in restoring the members of Christ in that district from their deadly fear and grief, and in comforting my old age by the administration of justice tempered with mercy. He who brings deliverance to us through you in this tribulation, and who has to the most beloved and most holy mother felicitas,* and brother rusticus, and to the sisters who are with them, augustine and those who are with him send greeting in the lord.

1. Good is the Lord, and to every place extends His mercy, which comforts us by your love to us in Him. How much He loves those who believe and hope in Him, and who both love Him and love one another, and what blessings He keeps in store for them hereafter. He proves most remarkably in this, that on the unbelieving, the abandoned, and the perverse, whom He threatens with eternal fire if they persevere in their evil disposition to the end. He does in this life bestow so many benefits, making "His sun to rise on the evil and on the good," "on the just and on the unjust," words in which, for the sake of brevity, some instances are mentioned that many more may be suggested to reflection; for who can reckon up how many gracious benefits the wicked receive in this life from Him whom they despise? Amongst tliese, this is one of great value, that by the experience of the occasional afflictions, which like a good physician He mingles with the pleasures of this life. He admonishes them, if only they will give heed, to flee from the wrath to come, and whilst they are in the way, that is, in this life, to agree with the word of God, which they have made an adversary to themselves by their wicked lives. What, then, is not bestowed in mercy on men by the Lord God, since even affliction sent by Him is a blessing? For prosperity is a gift of God when He comforts, adversity a gift of God when He warns; and if He bestows these things, as I have said, even on the wicked, what does He prepare for those who bear Avith one another? Into this number you rejoice that through His grace you have been gathered, "forbearing one another in love; endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." Â For there shall not be a wanting occasion for your bearing one with another till God shall have so purified you, that, death being "swallowed up in victory," ^ "God shall be all in all." ^

2. We ought never, indeed, to take pleasure in quarrels; but however averse we may be to them, they occasionally either arise from love, or put it to the test. For how difficult is it to find any one willing to be reproved; and where is the wise man of whom it is said, "Ee humane wise man, and he will love thee " ? * But are we on that account not to reprove and find fault with a brother, to prevent him from going down through false security to death ? For it is a common and frequent experience, that when a brother is found fault with he is mortified at the time, and resists and contradicts his friend, but afterwards reconsiders the matter in silence alone with God, where he is not afraid of giving offence to men by submitting to correction, but is afraid of offending God by refusing to be reformed, and thenceforward refrains from doing that for which he has been justly reproved; and in proportion as he hates his sin, he loves the brother whom he feels to have been the enemy of his sin. But if he belong to the number of those of whom it is said, " Eeprove not a scorner lest he hate thee," ^ the quarrel does not arise from love on the part of the reproved, but it exercises and tests the love of the reprover; for he does not return hatred for hatred, but the love which constrains him to find fault endures unmoved, even when he who is found fault with requites it with hatred. But if the reprover renders evil for evil to the man who takes offence at being reproved, he was not worthy to reprove another, but evidently deserves to be himself reproved. Act upon these principles, so that either quarrels may not arise, or, if they do arise, may quickly terminate in peace. Be more earnest to dwell in concord than to vanquish each other in controversy.

For as vinegar corrodes a vessel if it remain long in it, so anger corrodes the heart if it is cherished till the morrow.

These things, therefore, observe, and the God of peace shall be with you. Pray also unitedly for us, that we may cheerfully practise the good advices which we give to you.

LETTEII CCXI.

(A.D. 423.)

IN THIS LETTER AUGUSTINE REBUKES THE NUNS OF THE MONASTERY IN WHICH HIS SISTER HAD BEEN PRIORESS, FOR CERTAIN TURBULENT MANIFESTATIONS OF DISSATISFACTION WITH HER SUCCESSOR, AND LAYS DOWN GENERAL RULES FOR THEIR GUIDANCE.

1. As severity is ready to punish the faults which it may discover, so charity is reluctant to discover the faults which it must punish. This was the reason of my not acceding to your request for a visit from me, at a time when, if I had come, I must have come not to rejoice in your harmony, but to add more vehemence to your strife. For how could I have treated your behaviour with indifference, or have allowed it to pass unpunished, if so great a tumult had arisen among you in my presence, as that which, when I was absent, assailed my ears with the din of your voices, although my eyes did not witness your disorder? For perhaps your rising against authority would have been even more violent in my presence, since I must have refused the concessions which you demanded, "concessions involving, to your own disadvantage, some most dangerous precedents, subversive of sound discipline; and I must thus have found you such as I did not desire, and must have myself been found by you such as you did not desire.

2. The apostle, "vTiting to the Corinthians, says: "Moreover, I call God for a record upon my soul, that to spare you I came not as yet to Corinth. Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy." I also say the same to you; to spare you I have not come to you. I have also spared myself, that I might not have sorrow upon sorrow, and have chosen not to see you face to face, but to pour out my heart to God on your behalf, and to plead the cause of your great danger not in words before you, but in tears before God; entreating Him that He may not turn into grief the joy wherewith I am wont to rejoice in you, and that amid the great offences with which this world everywhere abounds, I may be comforted at times by thinking of your number, your pure affection, your holy conversation, and the abundant grace of God which is given to you, so that you not only have renounced matrimony, but have chosen to dwell with one accord in fellowship under the same roof, that you may have one soul and one heart in God.

3. When I reflect on these good things, these gifts of God in you, my heart, amid the many storms by which it is agitated through evils elsewhere, is wont to find perfect rest. "Ye did run well; who did hinder you, that ye should not obey the truth? This persuasion cometh not of Him that calleth you." "A little leaven " â€” I am unwilling to complete the sentence, for I rather desire, entreat, and exhort that the leaven itself be transformed into something better, lest it change the whole lump for the worse, as it has already almost done. If, therefore, you have begun to put forth again the budings of a sound discernment as to your duty, pray that you enter not into temptation, nor fall again into strifes, emulations, animosities, divisions, evil* speaking, seditions, whisperings. For we have not laboured as we have done in planting and watering the garden of the Lord among you, that we may reap these thorns from you. If, however, your weakness be still disturbed by turbulence, pray that you may be delivered from this temptation. As for the troublers of your peace, if such there be still among you, they shall, unless they amend their conduct, bear their judgment, whoever they be.

4. Consider how evil a thing it is, that at the very time when we rejoice in the return of the Donatists to our unity, we have to lament internal discord within our monastery. Be stedfast in observing your good vows, and you will not desire to change for another the prioress whose care of the monastery has been for so many years unwearied, under whom also you have both increased in numbers and advanced in age, and who has given you the place in her heart which a mother gives to her own children. All of you when you came to the monastery found her there, either discharging satisfactorily the duties of assistant to the late holy prioress, my sister, or, after her own accession to that office, giving you a welcome to the sisterhood. Under her you spent your noviciate, under her you took the veil, under her your number has been multiplied, and yet you are riotously demanding that she should be replaced by another, whereas, if the proposal to put another in her place had come from us, it would have been seemly for you to have mourned over such a proposal. For she is one whom you know well; to her you came at first, and under her you have for so many years advanced in age and in numbers. No official previously unknown to you has been appointed, excepting the prior; if it be on his account that you seek a change, and if through aversion to him you thus rebel against your mother, why do you not rather petition for his removal? If, however, you recoil from this suggestion, for I know how you reverence and love him in Christ, why do you not all the more for his sake reverence and love her? For the first measures of the recently appointed prior in presiding over you are so hindered by your disorderly behaviour, that he is himself disposed to leave you, rather than be subjected on your account to the dishonour and odium which must arise from the report going abroad, that you would not have sought another prioress unless you had begun to have him as your prior. May God therefore calm and compose your minds:
LET. CCXL] to the NUNS. 395

let not the work of the devil prevail in you, but may the peace of Christ gain the victory in your hearts; and do not rush headlong to death, either through vexation of spirit, because what you desire is refused, or through shame, because of having desired what you ought not to have desired, but rather by repentance resume the conscientious discharge of duty; and imitate not the repentance of Judas the traitor, but the tears of Peter the shepherd.

5. The rules which we lay down to be observed by you as persons settled in a monastery are these:â€”

First of all, in order to fulfil the end for which you have been gathered into one community, dwell in the house with oneness of spirit, and let your hearts and minds be one in God. Also call not anything the property of any one, but let all things be common property, and let distribution of food and raiment be made to each of you by the prioress, â€” not equally to all, because you are not all equally strong, but to every one according to her need. For you read in the Acts of the Apostles: "They had all things common: and distribution was made to every man according as he had need." ^ Let those who had any worldly goods when they entered the monastery cheerfully desire that these become common property.

Let those who had no worldly goods not ask within the monastery for luxuries which they could not have while they were outside of its walls; nevertheless, let the comforts which the infirmity of any of them may require be given to such, though their poverty before coming in to the monastery may have been such that they could not have procured for themselves the bare necessaries of life; and let them in such case be careful not to reckon it the chief happiness of their present lot that they have found within the monastery* food and raiment, such as was elsewhere beyond their reach.

G. Let them, moreover, not hold their heads high because they are associated on terms of equality with persons whom they durst not have approached in the outer world; but let them rather lift their hearts on high, and not seek after earthly possessions, lest, if the rich be made lowly but the poor puffed up with vanity in our monasteries, these institu-

96 LETTERS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [LET. CCXL
On the other hand, however, let not those who seemed to hold some position in the world regard with contempt their sisters, who in coming into this sacred fellowship have left a condition of poverty; let them be careful to glory rather in the fellowship of their poor sisters, than in the rank of their wealthy parents. And let them not lift themselves up above the rest because of their having, perchance, contributed somethings from their own resources to the maintenance of the community, lest they find in their riches more occasion for pride, because they divide them with others in a monastery, than they might have found if they had spent them in their own enjoyment in the world. For every other kind of sin finds scope in evil works, so that by it they are done, but pride lurks even in good works, so that by it they are undone; and what avails it to lavish money on the poor, and become poor oneself, if the unhappy soul is rendered more proud by despising riches than it had been by possessing them? Live, then, all of you, in unanimity and concord, and in each other give honour to that God whose temples you have been made.

7. Be regular (instate) in prayers at the appointed hours and times. In the oratory let no one do anything else than the duty for which the place was made, and from which it has received its name; so that if any of you, having leisure, wish to pray at other hours than those appointed, they may not be hindered by others using the place for any other purpose. In the psalms and hymns used in your prayers to God, let that be pondered in the heart which is uttered by the voice; chant nothing but what you find prescribed to be chanted; whatever is not so prescribed is not to be chanted.

8. Keep the flesh under by fastings and by abstinence from meat and drink, so far as health allows. When any one is not able to fast, let her not, unless she be ill, take any nourishment except at the customary hour of repast. From the time of your coming to table until you rise from it, listen without noise and wrangling to whatever may be in course read to you; let not your mouths alone be exercised in receiving food, let your ears be also occupied in receiving the word of God.

9. If those who are weak in consequence of their early training are treated somewhat differently in regard to food, this ought not to be vexatious or seem unjust to others whom a different training has made more robust. And let them not esteem these weaker ones more favoured than themselves, because they receive a fare somewhat less frugal than their own, but rather congratulate themselves on enjoying a vigour of constitution which the others do not possess. And if to those who have entered the monastery after a more delicate upbringing at home, there be given any food, clothing, couch, or covering which to others who are stronger, and in that respect more favourably circumstanced, is not given, the sisters to whom these indulgences are not given ought to consider how great a descent the others have made from their style of living in the world to that which they now have, although they may not have been able to come altogether down to the severe simplicity of others who have a more hardy constitution. And when those who were originally more wealthy see others receiving not as mark of higher honour, but out of consideration for infirmity more largely than they do themselves, they ought not to be disturbed by fear of any such detestable perversion of monastic discipline as this, that the poor are to be trained to luxury in a monastery in which the wealthy are, so far as they can bear it, trained to hardships. For, of course, as those who are ill must take less food, otherwise they would increase their disease, so after illness, those who are convalescent must, in order to their more rapid recovery, be so nursed even though they may have come from the lowest poverty to the monastery as if their recent illness had conferred on them the same claim for special treatment as their former style of living confers upon those who, before entering the monastery, were rich. So soon, however, as they regain their wonted health, let them return to their own happier mode of living, which, as involving fewer wants, is more suitable for those who are servants of God; and let not inclination detain them when they are strong in that amount of ease to which necessity had raised them when they were weak. Let those regard themselves as truly richer who are endowed with greater strength to bear hardships. For it is better to have fewer wants than to have larger resources.

10. Let your apparel be in no wise conspicuous; and aspire [

letters of St. Augustine. [IET. CCXI.

\to please others by your behaviour rather than by your attire.

, Let your head-dresses not be so thin as to let the nets below them be seen. Let your hair be worn wholly covered, and let it neither be carelessly dishevelled nor too scrupulously arranged.

' when you go beyond the monastery. "When you go anywhere, walk together; when you come to the place to which you were going, stand together. In walking, in standing, in deportment, and in all your movements let nothing be done which might attract the improper desires of any one, but rather let all be in keeping with your sacred character. Though a passing glance be directed towards any man, let your eyes look fixedly at none; for when you are walking you are not forbidden to see men, but you must neither let your desires go out to them, nor wish to be the objects of desire on their part. For it is not only by touch that a woman awakens in any man or cherishes towards him such desire, this may be done by inward feelings and by looks. And say not that you have chaste minds though you may have wanton eyes, for a wanton eye is the index of a wanton heart. And when wanton hearts exchange signals with each other in looks, the tongue is silent, and are, by the force of sensual passion, pleased by the reciprocation of inflamed desire, their purity of character is gone, though their bodies are not defiled by any act of uncleanness. Nor let her who fixes her eyes upon one of the other sex, and takes pleasure in his eye being fixed on her, imagine that the act is not observed by others; she is seen assuredly by those by whom she supposes herself not to be remarked. But even though she should elude notice, and be seen by no human eye, what shall she do with that Witness above us from whom nothing can be concealed? Is He to be regarded as not seeing because His eye rests on all things with a long-suffering proportioned to His wisdom?

Let every holy woman guard herself from desiring sinfully to please man by cherishing a fear of displeasing God; let her check the desire of sinfully looking upon man by remembering that God's eye is looking upon all things. For in this very matter we are exhorted to cherish fear of God by the words of Scripture: "He that looks with a fixed eye is an abomination to the Lord."^ AVhen, therefore, you are together in the church, or in any other place where men also are present, guard your chastity by watching over one another, and God, who dwelleth in you, will thus guard you by means of yourselves.

11. And if you perceive in any one of your number this frowardness of eye, warn her at once, so that the evil which has begun may not go on, but be checked immediately. But if, after this admonition, you see her repeat the offence, or do the same thing on any other subsequent day, whoever may have had the opportunity of seeing this must now report her as one who has been wounded and requires to be healed, but not without pointing her out to another, and perhaps a third sister, so that she may be convicted by the testimony of two or three witnesses,^ and may be reprimanded with necessary severity. And do not think that in thus informing upon one another you are guilty of malevolence. For the truth rather is, that you are not guiltless if by keeping silence you allow sisters to perish, whom you may correct by giving information of their faults. For if your sister had a wound on her person which she wished to conceal through fear of the surgeon's lance, would it not be cruel if you kept silence about it, and true compassion if you made it known? How much more, then, are you bound to make known her sin, that she may not suffer more fatally from a neglected spiritual wound. But before she is pointed out to others as witnesses by whom she may be convicted if she deny the charge, the offender ought to be brought before the prioress, if after admonition she has refused to be corrected, so that by her being in this way more privately rebuked, the fault which she has committed may not become known to all the others. If, however, she then deny the charge, then others must be employed to observe her conduct after the denial, so that now before the whole sisterhood she may not be accused by one witness, but convicted by two or three. When convicted of the fault, it is her duty to submit to the corrective discipline which may be appointed by the prioress or the prior.

If she refuse to submit to this, and does not go away from you of her own accord, let her be expelled from your society. For this is not done cruelly but mercifully, to protect very many from perishing through infection of the plague with which one has been stricken. Moreover, what I have now said in regard to abstaining from wanton looks should be carefully observed, with due love for the persons and hatred of the sin, in observing, forbidding, reporting, proving, and punishing of all other faults. But if any one among you has gone on into so great sin as to receive secretly from any man letters or gifts of any description, let her be pardoned and prayed for if she confess this of her own accord. If, however, she is found out and is convicted of such conduct, let her be more severely punished, according to the sentence of the prioressess, or of the prior, or even of the bishop.

12. Keep your clothes in one place, under the care of one or two, or as many as may be required to shake them so as to keep them from being injured by moths; and as your food is supplied from one storeroom, let your clothes be provided from one wardrobe. And whatever may be brought out to you as wearing apparel suitable for the season, regard it, if possible, as a matter of no importance whether each of you receives the very same article of clothing which she had formerly laid aside, or one receive what another formerly wore, provided only that what is necessary be denied to no one. But if contentions and murmurings are occasioned among you by this, and some one of you complains that she has received some article of dress inferior to that which she formerly wore, and thinks it beneath her to be so clothed as her other sister was, by this prove your own selves, and judge how far deficient you must be in the inner holy dress of the heart, when you quarrel with each other about the clothing of the body. Nevertheless, if your infirmity is indulged by the concession that you are to receive again the identical article which you had laid aside, let whatever you put past be, nevertheless, kept in one place, and in charge of the ordinary keepers of the wardrobe; it being, of course, understood that no one is to work in making any article for clothing or for the couch, or any girdle, veil, or head-dress, for her own private comfort, but that all your works be done for the common good of all, with greater zeal and more cheerful perseverance than if you were each working for your individual interest. For the love concerning which it is written, "Charity seeketh not her own" is to be understood as that which prefers the common good to personal advantage, not personal advantage to the common good. Therefore the more fully that you give to the common good a preference above your personal and private interests, the more fully will you be sensible of progress in securing that, in regard to all those things which supply wants destined soon to pass away, the charity which abides may hold a conspicuous and influential place. An obvious corollary from these rules is, that when persons of either sex bring to their own daughters in the monastery, or to inmates belonging to them by any other relationship, presents of clothing or of other articles which are to be regarded as necessary, such gifts are not to be received privately, but must be under the control of the prioress, that, being added to the common stock, they may be placed at the service of any inmate to whom they may be necessary. If any one conceal any gift bestowed on her, let sentence be passed on her as guilty of theft.

13. Let your clothes be washed, whether by yourselves or by washerwomen, at such intervals as are approved by the prioress, lest the indulgence of undue solicitude about spotless raiment produce inward stains upon your souls. Let the washing of the body and the use of baths be not constant, but at the usual interval assigned to it, i.e. once in a month. In the case, however, of illness rendering necessary the washing of the person, let it not be unduly delayed; let it be done on the physician's recommendation without complaint; and even though the patient be reluctant, she must do at the order of the prioress what health demands. If, however, a patient desires the bath, and it happen to be not for her good, her desire must not be yielded to, for sometimes it is supposed to be beneficial because it gives pleasure, although in reality it may be doing harm. Finally, if a handmaid of God suffers from any hidden pain of body, let her statement as to her suffering be believed without hesitation; but if there be any uncertainty whether that which she finds agreeable be really of use in curing her pain, let the physician be consulted. To the baths, or to any place whither it may be necessary to go,

* 1 Cor. xiii. 5.
LET. IL 2 C

402 LETTERS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [LET. CCXL

let no fewer than three go at any time. Moreover, the sister requiring to go anywhere is not to go with those whom she may choose herself, but with those whom the prioress may order. The care of the sick, and of those who require attention as convalescents, and of those who, without any feverish symptoms, are labouring under debility, ought to be committed to some one of your number, who shall procure for them from the storeroom what she shall see to be necessary for each. Moreover, let those who have charge, whether in the storeroom, or in the wardrobe, or in the library, render service to their sisters without murmuring. Let manuscripts be applied for at a fixed hour every day, and let none who ask them at other hours receive them. But at whatever time clothes and shoes may be required by one in need of these, let not those in charge of this department delay supplying the want.

14. Quarrels should be unknown among you, or at least, if they arise, they should as quickly as possible be ended, lest anger grow into hatred, and convert "a mote into a beam," and make the soul chargeable with murder. For the saying of Scripture: "He that hateth his brother is a murderer," does not concern men only, but women also are bound by this law through its being enjoined on the other sex, which was prior in the order of creation. Let her, whoever she be, that shall have injured another by taunt or abusive language, or false accusation, remember to remedy the wrong by apology as promptly as possible, and let her who was injured grant forgiveness without further disputation. If the injury has been mutual, the duty of both parties will be mutual forgiveness, because of your prayers, which, as they are more frequent, ought to be all the more sacred in your esteem. But the sister who is prompt in asking another whom she confesses that she has wronged to grant her forgiveness is, though she may be more frequently betrayed by a hasty temper, better than another who, though less irascible, is with more difficulty persuaded to ask forgiveness. Let not her who refuses to forgive her sister expect to receive answers to prayer: as for any sister who never will ask forgiveness, or does not do it from the heart, it is no advantage to such an one to be in a monastery, even though she may not be expelled.

Wherefore abstain from hard words; but if they have escaped your lips, be not slow to bring words of healing from the same lips by which the wounds were inflicted. When, however, the necessity of discipline compels you to use hard words in restraining the younger inmates, even though you feel that in these you have gone too far, it is not imperative on you to ask their forgiveness, lest while undue humility is observed by you towards those who ought to be subject to you, the authority necessary for governing them be impaired; but pardon must nevertheless be sought from the Lord of all, who knows with what goodwill you love even those whom you reprove it may be with undue severity. The love which you bear to each other must be not carnal, but spiritual: for those things which are practised by immodest women in shameful frolic and sporting with one another ought not even to be done by those of your sex who are married, or are intending to marry, and much more ought not to be done by widows or chaste virgins dedicated to be handmaids of Christ by a holy vow.

15. Obey the prioress as a mother, giving her all due honour, that God may not be offended by your forgetting what you owe to her: still more is it incumbent on you to obey the presbyter who has charge of you all. To the prioress most specially belongs the responsibility of seeing that all these rules be observed, and that if any rule has been neglected, the offence be not passed over, but carefully corrected and punished; it being, of course, open to her to refer to the presbyter any matter that goes beyond her province or power.
But let her count himself happy not in exercising the power which rules, but in practising the love which serves. In honour in the sight of men let her be raised above you, but in fear in the sight of God let her be as it were beneath your feet. Let her show herself before all a "pattern of good works." ^ Let her " warn the unruly, comfort the feebleminded, support the weak, be patient toward all." ^ Let her cheerfully observe and cautiously impose rules. And, though both are necessary, let her be more anxious to be loved than to be feared by you; always reflecting that for you she must 1 Titus ii. 7. 2 1 Tj^ess. v. 14.

give account to God. For this reason yield obedience to her out of compassion not for yourselves only but also for her, because, as she occupies a higher position among you, her danger is proportionately greater than your own.
16. The Lord grant that you may yield loving submission to all these rules, as persons enamoured of spiritual beauty, and diffusing a sweet savour of Christ by means of a good conversation, not as bondwomen under the law, but as established in freedom under grace. That you may, however, examine yourselves by this treatise as by a mirror, and may not through forgetfulness neglect anything, let it be read over by you once a week; and in so far as you find yourselves practising the things written here, give thanks for this to God, the Giver of all good; in so far, however, as any of you finds herself to be in some particular defective, let her lament the past and be on her guard in the time to come, praying both that her debt may be forgiven, and that she may not be led into temptation.

LETTEE CCXIL

(A.D. 423.)

TO QUINTILIANUS, MY LORD MOST BLESSED AND BROTHER AND FELLOW BISHOP DESERVEDLY VENERABLE, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING.

Venerable father, I commend to you in the love of Christ these honourable servants of God and precious members of Christ, Galla, a widow (who has taken on herself sacred vows), and her daughter Simplicia, a consecrated virgin, who is subject to her mother by reason of her age, but above her by reason of her holiness. We have nourished them as far as we have been able with the word of God; and by this epistle, as if it were with my own hand, I commit them to you, to be comforted and aided in every way which their interest or necessity requires. This duty your Holiness would doubtless have undertaken without any recommendation from me; for if it is our duty on account of the Jerusalem above, of which we all are citizens, and in which they desire to have a place of distinguished holiness, to cherish towards them not only the affection due to fellow-citizens, but even brotherly love, how much stronger is their claim on you, who reside in the same country in this earth in which these ladies, for the love of Christ, renounced the distinctions of this world! I also ask you to condescend to receive with the same love with which I have offered it my official salutation, and to remember me in your prayers. These ladies carry with them relics of the most blessed and glorious martyr Stephen: your Holiness knows how to give due honour to these, as we have done.-^ me if I were to speak of any other subject. We all are mortal, and the day which shall be the last of life on earth is to every man at all times uncertain; but in infancy there is hope of entering on boyhood, and so our hope goes on, looking forward from boyhood to youth, from youth to manhood, and from manhood to old age: whether these hopes may be realized or not is uncertain, but there is in each case something which may be hoped for. But old age has no other period of this life to look forward to with expectation: how long old age may in any case be prolonged is uncertain, but it is certain that no other age destined to take its place lies beyond. I came to this town â€” for such was the will of God â€” when I was in the prime of life. I was young then, but now I am old. I know that churches are wont to be disturbed after the decease of their bishops by ambitious or contentious parties, and I feel it to be my duty to take measures to prevent this community from suffering, in connection with my decease, that which I have often observed and lamented elsewhere. You are aware, my beloved, that I recently visited the Church of Milevi; for certain brethren, and especially the servants of God there, requested me to come, because some disturbance was apprehended after the death of my brother and fellow bishop Severus, of blessed memory. I went accordingly, and the Lord was in mercy pleased so to help us that they harmoniously accepted as bishop the person designated by their former bishop in his lifetime; for when this designation had become known to them, they willingly acquiesced in the choice which he had made. An omission, however, had occurred by which some were dissatisfied; for brother Severus, believing that it might be sufficient for him to mention to the clergy the name of his successor, did not speak of the matter to the people, which gave rise to dissatisfaction in the minds of some. But why should I say more? By the good pleasure of God, the dissatisfaction was removed, joy took its place in the minds of all, and he was ordained as bishop whom Severus had proposed. To obviate all such occasion of complaint in this case, I now intimate to all here my desire, which I believe to be also the will of God: I wish to have for my successor the presbyter Eraclius."

LET. CCXIII.] AUGUSTINE DESIGNATES HIS SUCCESSOR. 407

The people shouted, "To God he thanks! To Christ he praise!
(this was repeated twenty-three times). "Christ, hear us; may Augustine live long!"
(repeated sixteen times).
"We will have thee as our father, thee as our bishop" (repeated eight times).

2. Silence having been obtained, Bishop Augustine said: â€”
"It is unnecessary for me to say anything in praise of Eraclius; I esteem his wisdom and spare his modesty; it is enough that you know him: and I declare that I desire in regard to him what I know you also to desire, and if I had not known it before, I would have had proof of it to-day. This, therefore, I desire; this I ask from the Lord our God in prayers, the warmth of which is not abated by the chill of age; this I exhort, admonish, and entreat you also to pray for along with me, "that God may confirm that which He has wrought in us," by blending and fusing together the minds of all in the peace of Christ. May He who has sent him to me preserve him! preserve him safe, preserve him blameless, that as he gives me joy while I live, he may fill my place when I die.

"The notaries of the church are, as you observe, recording what I say, and recording what you say; both my address and your acclamations are not allowed to fall to the ground. To speak more plainly, we are making up an ecclesiastical record of this day's proceedings; for I wish them to be in this way confirmed so far as pertains to men."

The people shouted thirty-six times, "To God he thanks! To Christ he praise!" "Christ, hear us; may Augustine live long!" was said thirteen times. "Thee, our father! thee, our bishop!" was said eight times. "Ke is worthy and just," was said twenty times. "Well deserving, well worthy!" was said five times. "He is worthy and just!" was said six times.

3. Silence having been obtained. Bishop Augustine said: "It is my wish, as I was just now saying, that my desire and your desire be confirmed, so far as pertains to men, by being placed on an ecclesiastical record; but so far as pertains to the will of the Almighty, let us all pray, as I said before, that God would confirm that which He has wrought in us."

The people shouted, saying sixteen times, "We give thanks for your decision:" then twelve times, "Agreed! Agreed!" and then six times, "Thee, our father! Eraclius, our bishop!"

4. Silence having been obtained. Bishop Augustine said: â€”

"I approve of that of which you also express your approval; but I do not wish that to be done in regard to him which was done in my own case. What was done many of you know; in fact, all of you, excepting only those who at that time were not born, or had not attained to the years of understanding. When my father and bishop, the aged Valerius, of blessed memory, was still living, I was ordained bishop and occupied the episcopal see along with him, which I did not know to have been forbidden by the Council of Nice; and he was equally ignorant of the prohibition. I do not wish to have my son here exposed to the same censure as was incurred in my own case."

The people shouted, saying thirteen times, "To God be thanks! To Christ be praise!"

5. Silence having been obtained, Bishop Augustine said: â€”

"He shall be as he now is, a presbyter, meanwhile; but afterwards, at such time as may please God, your bishop. But now I will assuredly begin to do, as the compassion of Christ may enable me, what I have not hitherto done. You know what for several years I would have done, had you permitted me. It was agreed between you and me that no one should intrude on me for five days of each week, that I might discharge the duty in the study of Scripture which my brethren and fathers the co-bishops were pleased to assign to me in the two councils of Numidia and Carthage. The aOTcement was duly recorded, you gave your consent, you signified it by acclamations. The record of your consent and of your acclamations, was read aloud to you. For a short time the agree-ement was observed by you; afterwards, it was violated without consideration, and I am not permitted to have leisure for the work which I wish to do: forenoon and afternoon alike, I am involved in the affairs of other people demanding my attention. I now beseech you, and solemnly engage you, for Christ's sake, to suffer me to devolve the burden of this part of my labours on this young man, I mean on Eraclius, the presbyter, whom to-day I designate in the name of Christ as my successor in the office of bishop."

The people shouted saying twenty-six times, "We give thanks for your decision!"

6. Silence having been obtained, Bishop Augustine said: â€”

"I give thanks before the Lord our God for your love and your goodwill; yes, I give thanks to God for these. "Wherefore, henceforth, my brethren, let everything which was wont to be brought by you to me be brought to him. In any case in which he may think my advice necessary, I will not refuse it; far be it from me to withdraw this: nevertheless, let everything be brought to him which used to be brought to me. Let Eraclius himself, if in any case, perchance, he be at a loss as to what should be done, either consult me or claim an assistant in me, whom he has known as a father. By this arrangement you will, on the one hand, suffer no disadvantage, and I will at length, for the brief space during which God may prolong my life, devote the remainder of my days, be they few or many, not to idleness nor to the indulgence of a love of ease, but, so far as Eraclius kindly gives me leave, to the study of the sacred Scriptures: this also will be of service to him, and through him to you likewise. Let no one therefore grudge me this leisure, for I claim it only in order to do important work.

"I see that I have now transacted with you all the business necessary in the matter for which I called you together. The last thing I have to ask is, that as many of you as are able be pleased to subscribe your names to this record. At this point I require a response from you. Let me have it: show your assent by some acclamations."

The people shouted, saying twenty-five times, "Agreed! agreed!" then twenty-eight times, "It is worthy, it is just!"then fourteen times,"Agreed! agreed!"then twenty-five times,"He has long been worthy, he has long been deserving!"then thirteen times,"We give thanks for your decision!"then eighteen times,"Christ, hear us; preserve Uraclius!"

7. Silence having been obtained, Bishop Augustine said: â€”
"It is well that we are able to transact around His sacrifice those things which belong to God; and in this hour appointed for our supplications, I especially exhort you, beloved, to suspend all your occupations and business, and pour out before the Lord your petitions for this church, and for me, and for the presbyter Eraclius."

LETTEE CCXVIIL

to palatinus, my well-beloved lord and son, most tendeely longed for, augustine sends greeting.

1. Your life of eminent fortitude and fruitfulness towards the Lord our God has brought to us great joy. For "you have made choice of instruction from your youth upwards, that you may still find wisdom even to grey hairs;" ^ for "wisdom is the grey hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age;" ^ which may the Lord, who knoweth how to give good gifts unto His children, give to you asking, seeking, knocking.^ Although you have many counsellors and many counsels to direct you in the path which leads to eternal glory, and although, above all, you have the grace of Christ, which has so effectually spoken in saving power in your heart, nevertheless we also, as in duty bound by the love which we owe to you, offer to you, in hereby reciprocating your salutation, some words of counsel, designed not to awaken you as one hindered by sloth or sleep, but to stimulate and quicken you in the race which you are already running.

2. You require wisdom, my son, for stedfastness in this race, as it was under the influence of wisdom that you entered on it at first. Let this then be "a part of your wisdom, to know, whose gift it is." ^ Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in Him, and He shall bring it to pass: and He sliall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday." ^ He will make straight thy path, and guide thy steps in peace." ^ As you despised your prospects of greatness in this world, lest you should glory in the abundance of riches which you had begun to covet after the manner of the children of this world, so now, in taking up the yoke of the Lord and His burden, let not your confidence be in your own strength; so shall "His yoke be easy, and His burden light." *

For in the book of Psalms those are alike censured "who trust in their strength," and "who boast themselves in the multitude of their riches." * Therefore, as formerly you did not seek glory in riches, but most wisely despised that which you had begun to desire, so now be on your guard against insidious temptation to trust in your strength: for you are but man, and "cursed is every one that trusteth in man," ^ But by all means trust in God with your whole heart, and He will Himself be your strength, wherein you may trust with piety and thankfulness, and to Him you may say with humility and boldness, "I will love thee, Lord, my strength; "because even the love of God, which, when it is perfect, "casteth out fear," ^ is shed abroad in our hearts, not by our strength, that is, by any human power, but, as the apostle says, "by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us." ^

3. "Watch, therefore, and pray that you enter not into temptation." ^^ Such prayer is indeed in itself an admonition to you that you need the help of the Lord, and that you ought not to rest upon yourself your hope of living well. For now you pray, not that you may obtain the riches and honours of this present world, or any unsubstantial human possession, but that you may not enter into temptation, a thing which would not be asked in prayer if a man could accomplish it for himself by his own will. Wherefore we would not pray that we may not enter into temptation if our own will sufficed for our protection; and yet if the will to avoid temptation were wanting to us, we could not so pray. It may, therefore, be present with us to will, when we have through His own gift been made wise, but we must pray that we may be able to perform that which we have so willed. In the fact that you have begun to exercise this true wisdom, you have reason to give thanks. " For what have you which you have not received? But if you have received it, beware that you boast not as if you had not received it," that is, as if you could have had it of yourself. Knowing, however, whence you have received it, ask Him by whose gift it was begun to grant that it may be perfected. " Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling: for it is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do, of His good pleasure; "^ for " the will is prepared by God,"^ and " the steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and He delighteth in his way."^ Holy meditation on these things will preserve you, so that your wisdom shall be piety, that is, that by God's gift you shall be good, and not ungrateful for the grace of Christ.

4. Your parents, unfeignedly rejoicing with you in the better hope which in the Lord you have begun to cherish, are longing earnestly for your presence. But whether you be absent from us or present with us in the body, we desire to have you with us in the one Spirit by whom love is shed abroad in our hearts, so that, in whatever place our bodies may sojourn, our spirits may be in no degree sundered from each other.

We have most thankfully received the cloaks of goat's-hair cloth which you sent to us, in which gift you have yourself anticipated me in admonition as to the duty of being often engaged in prayer, and of practising humility in our supplications.

LET. CCXIX.] TO TROCLUS AND CYLINUS. 413

LETTER CCXIX.

TO PEOCUS AND CYLINUS, BRETHREN MOST BELOVED AND HONOURABLE, AND PARTNERS IN THE SACERDOTAL OFFICE, AUGUSTINE, FLORENTIUS, AND SECUNDINUS SEND GREETING IN THE LORD.
1. When our son Leporius, whom for his obstinacy in error you had justly and fitly rebuked, came to us after he had been expelled by you, we received him as one afflicted for his good, whom we should, if possible, deliver from error and restore to spiritual health. For, as you obeyed in regard to him the apostolic precept, "Warn the unruly," so it was our part to obey the precept immediately annexed, "Comfort the feeble-minded, and support the weak." ^ His error was indeed not unimportant, seeing that he neither approved what is right nor perceived what is true in some things relating to the only-begotten Son of God, of whom it is written that, "In the besfimage was the Word. and the Word was with God, and the Word was God," but that when the fulness of time had come, "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us;" ^ for he denied that God became man, regarding it as a doctrine from which it must follow necessarily that the divine substance in which He is equal to the Father suffered some unworthy change or corruption, and not seeing that he was thus introducing into the Trinity a fourth person, which is utterly contrary to the sound doctrine of the Creed and of Catholic truth. Since, however, dearly beloved and honourable brethren, he had as a fallible man "been overtaken " in this error, we did our utmost, the Lord helping us, to instruct him "in the spirit of meekness," especially remembering that when the "chosen vessel " gave this command to which we refer, he added, "Considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted," â€” lest some, perchance, should so rejoice in the measure of spiritual progress as to imagine that they could no longer be tempted like other men, â€” and joined with it the salutary and peace-promoting sentence, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ. For if a man think himself to be something, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself." ^

2. This restoration of Leporius we could perhaps in nowise have accomplished, had you not previously censured and punished those things in him which required correction. So then the same Lord, our Divine Physician, using His own instruments and servants, has by you wounded him when he was proud, and by us healed him when he was penitent, according to His own saying, " I wound, and I heal." ^ The same Divine Pailer and Overseer of His own house has by you thrown down what was defective in the building, and has by us replaced with a well-ordered structure what He had removed. The same Divine Husbandman has in His careful diligence by you rooted up what was barren and noxious in His field, and by us planted what is useful and fruitful. Let us not, therefore, ascribe glory to ourselves, but to the mercy of Him in whose hand both we and all our words are. And as we humbly praise the work which you have done as His ministers in the case of our son aforesaid, so do you rejoice with holy joy in the work performed by us. P tecceive, then, with the love of fathers and of brethren, him whom we have with merciful severity corrected. Tor although one part of the work was done by you and another part by us, both parts, being indispensable to our brother's salvation, were done by the same love. The same God was therefore working in both, for "God is love."

3. Wherefore, as he has been welcomed into fellowship by us on the ground of his repentance, let him be welcomed by you on the ground of his letter,* to which letter we have thought it right to adhibit our signatures attesting its genuineness. "We have not the least doubt that you, in the exercise of Christian love, will not only hear with pleasure of his amendment, but also make it known to those to whom his error was a stumbling-block. For those who came with him to us have also been corrected and restored along with him, as is declared by their signatures, which have been adhibited to the letter in our presence. It remains only that you, being made joyful by the salvation of a brother, condescend to make us joyful in our turn by sending a reply to our communication.

Farewell in the Lord, most beloved and honourable brethren; such is our desire on your behalf: remember us.

LETTTEE CCXX.

to my lord boniface,^ my son commended to the guardianship and guidance of divine mercy for present and eternal salvation, augustine sends greeting.

1. Never could I have found a more trustworthy man, nor one who could have more ready access to your ear when bearing a letter from me, than this servant and minister of Christ, the deacon Paulus, a man very dear to both of us, whom the Lord has now brought to me in order that I may have the opportunity of addressing you, not in reference to your power and the honour which you hold in this evil world, nor in reference to the preservation of your corruptible and mortal body, â€” because this also is destined to pass away, and how soon no one can tell, â€” but in reference to that salvation which has been promised to us by Christ, who was here on earth despised and crucified in order that He might teach us rather to despise than to desire the good things of this world, and to set our affections and our hope on that world which He has revealed by His resurrection. For He has risen from the dead, and now *' dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him."^
2. I know that you have no lack of friends, who love you so far as life in this world is concerned, and who in regard to it give you counsels, sometimes useful, sometimes the reverse; for they are men, and therefore, though they use their wisdom to the best of their ability in regard to what is present, they know not what may happen on the morrow. But it is not easy for any one to give you counsel in reference to God, to prevent the perdition of your soul, not because you lack friends who would do this, but because it is difficult for them to find an opportunity of speaking with you on these subjects.

For I myself have often longed for this, and never found place or time in which I might deal with you as I ought to deal with a man whom I ardently love in Christ. You know besides in what state you found me at Hippo, when you did me the honour to come to visit me, "how I was scarcely able to speak, being prostrated by bodily weakness. Now, then, my son, hear me when I have this opportunity of addressing you at least by a letter, "a rare opportunity, for it was not in my power to send such communication to you in the midst of your dangers, both because I apprehended danger to the bearer, and because I was afraid lest my letter should reach persons into whose hands I was unwilling that it should fall.

Wherefore I beg you to forgive me if you think that I have been more afraid than I should have been; however this may be, I have stated what I feared.

3. Hear me, therefore; nay, rather hear the Lord our God speaking by me. His feeble servant. Call to remembrance what manner of man you were while your former wife, of hallowed memory, still lived, and how under the stroke of her death, while that event was yet recent, the vanity of this world made you recoil from it, and how you earnestly desired to enter the service of God. We know and we can testify what you said as to your state of mind and your desires when you conversed with us at Tubunse. My brother Alypius and I were alone with you. [I beseech you, then, to call to remembrance that conversation], for I do not think that the worldly cares with which you are now engrossed can have such power over you as to have effaced this wholly from your memory. You were then desirous to abandon all the public business in which you were engaged, and to withdraw into sacred retirement, and live like the servants of God who have embraced a monastic life. And what was it that prevented you from acting according to these desires ? Was it not that you were influenced by considering, on our representation of the matter, how much service the work which then occupied you might render to the churches of Christ if you pursued it with this single aim, that they, protected from all disturbance...

LET. CCXX.] TO BONIFACE. 417
by barbarian hordes, might live " a quiet and peaceable life," as the apostle says, " in all godliness and honesty; " ^ resolving at the same time for your own part to seek no more from this world than would suffice for the support of yourself and those dependent on you, wearing as your girdle the cincture of a perfectly chaste self-restraint, and having underneath the accoutrements of the soldier the surer and stronger defence of spiritual armour.

4. At the very time when we were full of joy that you had formed this resolution, you embarked on a voyage and you married a second wife. Your embarkation was an act of the obedience due, as the apostle has taught us, to the " higher powers; " ^ but you would not have married again had you not, abandoning the continence to which you had devoted yourself, been overcome by concupiscence. When I learned this, I was, I must confess it, dumb with amazement; but, in my sorrow, I was in some degree comforted by hearing that you refused to marry her unless she became a Catholic before the marriage, and yet the heresy of those who refuse to believe in the true Son of God has so prevailed in your house, that by these heretics your daughter was baptized. Now, if the report be true (would to God that it were false !) that even some who were dedicated to God as His handmaids have been by these heretics re-baptized, with what floods of tears ought this great calamity to be bewailed by us ! Men are saying, moreover, — perhaps it is an unfounded slander, â€” that one wife does not satisfy your passions, and that you have been defiled by consorting with some other women as concubines.

5. What shall I say regarding these evils â€” so patent to all, and so great in magnitude as well as number â€” of which you have been, directly or indirectly, the cause since the time of your being married ? You are a Christian, you have a conscience, you fear God; consider, then, for yourself some things which I prefer to leave unsaid, and you will find for how great evils you ought to do penance; and I believe that it is to afford you an opportunity of doing this in the way in which it ought to be done, that the Lord is now sparing you and delivering you from all dangers. But if you will listen to the counsel of Scripture, I pray you, " make no tarrying to turn to the Lord, and put not off from day to day." ^ You allege, indeed, that you have good reason for what you have done, and that I cannot be a judge of the sufficiency of that reason, because I cannot hear both sides of the question; ^ but, whatever be your reason, the nature of which it is not necessary at present either to investigate or to discuss, can you, in the presence of God, affirm that you would ever have come into the embarrassments of your present position had you not loved the good things of this world, which, being a servant of God, such as we knew you to be formerly, it was your duty to have utterly despised and esteemed as of no value, â€” accepting, indeed, what was offered to you, that you might devote it to pious uses, but not so coveting that which was denied to you, or was entrusted to your care, as to be brought on its account into the difficulties of your present position, in which, while good is loved, evil things are perpetrated, â€” few, indeed, by you, but many because of you, and while things are dreaded which, if hurtful, are so only for a short time, things are done which are really hurtful for eternity?

6. To mention one of these things, â€” who can help seeing that many persons follow you for the purpose of defending your power or safety, who, although they may be all faithful to you, and no treachery is to be apprehended from any of them, are desirous of obtaining through you certain advantages which they also covet, not with a godly desire, but from worldly motives? And in this way you, whose duty it is to curb and check your own passions, are forced to satisfy those of others. To accomplish this, many things which are displeasing to God must be done; and yet, after all, these passions are not thus satisfied, for they are more easily mortified finally in those who love God, than satisfied, even for a time, in those who love the world. Therefore the Divine Scripture says: "Love not the world, nor the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth i Ecclus. V. 8. 2 See note on Letter CLXXXIX. p. 366.

the will of God abideth for ever, as God abideth for ever."^ Associated, therefore, as you are with such multitudes of armed men, whose passions must be humoured, and whose cruelty is dreaded, how can the desires of these men who love the world ever be, I do not say satiated, but even partially gratified by you, in your anxiety to prevent still greater wide-spread evils, unless you do that which God forbids, and in so doing become obnoxious to threatened judgment? So complete has been the havoc wrought in order to indulge their passions, that it would be difficult to find anything for the plunderer to carry away.

7. But what shall I say of the devastation of Africa at this hour by hordes of African barbarians, to whom no resistance is offered, while you are engrossed with such embarrassments in your own circumstances, and are taking no measures for averting this calamity? Who would ever have believed, who would have feared, after Boniface had become a Count of the Empire and of Africa, and had been placed in command in Africa with so large an army and so great authority, that the same man who formerly, as Tribune, kept all these barbarous tribes in peace, by storming their strongholds, and menacing them with his small band of brave confederates, should now have suffered the barbarians to be so bold, to encroach so far, to destroy and plunder so much, and to turn into deserts such vast regions once densely peopled? Where were any found who did not predict that, as soon as you obtained the authority of Count, the African hordes would be not only checked, but made tributaries to the Koman Empire? And now, how completely the event has disappointed men's hopes you yourself perceive; in fact, I need say nothing more on this subject, because your own reflection must suggest much more than I can put in words.

8. Perhaps you defend yourself by replying that the blame here ought rather to rest on persons who have injured you, and, instead of justly requiting the services rendered by you in your office, have returned evil for good. These matters I am not able to examine and judge. I beseech you rather to contemplate and inquire into the matter, in which you know that you have to do not with men at all, but with God; living in

Christ as a believer, you are bound to fear lest you offend Him. For my attention is more engaged by higher causes, believing that men ought to ascribe Africa's great calamities to their own sins. Nevertheless, I would not wish you to belong to the number of those wicked and unjust men whom God uses as instruments in inflicting temporal punishments on whom He pleases; for He who justly employs their malice to inflict temporal judgments on others, reserves eternal punishments for the unjust themselves if they be not reformed. Be it yours to fix your thoughts on God, and to look to Christ, who has conferred on you so great blessings and endured for you so great sufferings. Those who desire to belong to His kingdom, and to live for ever happily with Him and under Him, love even their enemies, do good to them that hate them, and pray for those from whom they suffer persecution;^ and if, at any time, in the way of discipline they use irksome severity, yet they never lay aside the sincerest love. If these benefits, though earthly and transitory, are conferred on you by the Eoman Empire, â€” for that empire itself is earthly, not heavenly, and cannot bestow what it has not in its power, â€” if, I say, benefits are conferred on you, return not evil for good; and if evil be inflicted on you, return not evil for evil. Which of these two has happened in your case I am unwilling to discuss, I am unable to judge. I speak to a Christian â€” return not either evil for good, nor evil for evil.

9. You say to me, perhaps: In circumstances so difficult, what do you wish me to do? If you ask counsel of me in a worldly point of view how your safety in this transitory life may be secured, and the power and wealth belonging to you at present may be preserved or even increased, I know not what to answer you, for any counsel regarding things so uncertain as these must partake of the uncertainty inherent in them.
But if you consult me regarding your relation to God and the salvation of your soul, and if you fear the word of truth which says: "What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"^ I have a plain answer to give. I am prepared with advice to which you may well give heed. But what need is there for my saying anything else than what I have already said. "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever."^ Here is counsel! Seize it and act on it. Show that you are a brave man. Vanquish the desires with which the world is loved. Do penance for the evils of your past life, when, vanquished by your passions, you were drawn away by sinful desires. If you receive this counsel, and hold it fast, and act on it, you will both attain to those blessings which are certain, and occupy yourself in the midst of these uncertain things without forfeiting the salvation of your soul.

10. But perhaps you again ask of me how you can do these things, entangled as you are with so great worldly difficulties. Pray earnestly, and say to God, in the words of the Psalm: "Bring Thou me out of my distresses,"^ for these distresses terminate when the passions in which they originate are vanquished. He who has heard your prayer and ours on your behalf, that you might be delivered from the numerous and great dangers of visible wars in which the body is exposed to the danger of losing the life which sooner or later must end, but in which the soul perishes not unless it be held captive by evil passions, â€” He, I say, will hear your prayer that you may, in an invisible and spiritual conflict, overcome your inward and invisible enemies, that is to say, your passions themselves, and may so use the world, as not abusing it, so that with its good things you may do good, not become bad through possessing them. Because these things are in themselves good, and are not given to men except by Him who has power over all things in heaven and earth. Lest these gifts of His should be reckoned bad, they are given also to the good; at the same time, lest they should be reckoned great, or the supreme good, they are given also to the bad. Further, these things are taken away from the good for their trial, and from the bad for their punishment.

422 LETTERS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [LET. CCXX.
11. For who is so ignorant, who so foolish, as not to see that the health of this mortal body, and the strength of its corruptible members, and victory over men who are our enemies, and temporal honours and power, and all other mere earthly advantages are given both to the good and to the bad, and are taken away both from the good and from the bad alike? But the salvation of the soul, along with immortality of the body, and the power of righteousness, and victory over hostile passions, and glory, and honour, and everlasting peace, are not given except to the good. Therefore love these things, covet these things, and seek them by every means in your power.

With a view to acquire and retain these things, give alms, pour forth prayers, practise fasting as far as you can without injury to your body. But do not love these earthly goods, how much soever they may abound to you. So use them as to do many good things by them, but not one evil thing for their sake. For all such things will perish: but good works, yea, even those good works which are performed by means of the perishable good things of this world, shall never perish.

12. If you had not now a wife, I would say to you what we said at Tubunse, that you should live in the holy state of continence, and would add that you should now do what we prevented you from doing at that time, namely, withdraw yourself so far as might be possible without prejudice to the public welfare from the labours of military service, and take to yourself the leisure which you then desired for that life in the society of the saints in which the soldiers of Christ fight in silence, not to kill men, but to "wrestle against principalities and powers, and spiritual wickedness," that is, the devil and his angels. For the saints gain their victories over enemies whom they cannot see, and yet they gain the victory over these unseen enemies by gaining the victory over things which are the objects of sense. I am, however, prevented from exhorting you to that mode of life by your having a wife, since without her consent it is not lawful for you to live under a vow of continence; because, although you did wrong in marrying again after the declaration which you made at Tubuna?, she, being not aware of this, became your wife innocently and without restrictions. Would that you could persuade her to agree to a vow of continence, that you might without hindrance render to God what you know to be due to Him! If, however, you cannot make this agreement with her, guard carefully by all means conjugal chastity, and pray to God, who will deliver you out of difficulties, that you may at some future time be able to do what is meanwhile impossible. This, however, does not affect your obligation to love God and not to love the world, to hold the faith stedfastly even in the cares of war, if you must still be engaged in them, and to seek peace; to make the good things of this world serviceable in good works, and not to do what is evil in labouring to obtain these earthly good things, â€” in all these duties your wife is not, or, if she is, ought not to be, a hindrance to you.

These things I have written, my dearly beloved son, at the bidding of the love with which I love you with regard not to this world, but to God; and because, mindful of the words of Scripture, "Eprove a wise man, and he will love thee; reprove a fool, and he will hate thee more," I was bound to think of you as certainly not a fool but a wise man.

TO THE AGED ALYPIUS, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING.

Brother Paulus has arrived here safely: he reports that the pains devoted to the business which engaged him have been rewarded with success; the Lord will grant that with these his trouble in that matter may terminate. He salutes you warmly, and tells us tidings concerning Gabinianus which give us joy, namely, that having by God's mercy obtained a prosperous issue in his case, he is now not only in name a Christian, but in sincerity a very excellent convert to the faith, and was baptized recently at Easter, having both in his heart and on his lips the grace which he received. How much I long for him I can never express; but you know that I love him.

'Prov. ix. 8.'

The president of the medical faculty/ Dioscorus, has also professed the Christian faith, having obtained grace at the same time. Hear the manner of his conversion, for his stubborn neck and his bold tongue could not be subdued without some miracle. His daughter, the only comfort of his life, was sick, and her sickness became so serious that her life was, according even to her father's own admission, despaired of. It is reported, and the truth of the report is beyond question, for even before brother Paul's return the fact was mentioned to me by Count Peregrinus, a most respectable and truly Christian man, who was baptized at the same time with Dioscorus and Gabinianus, â€” it is reported, I say, that the old man, feeling himself at last constrained to implore the compassion of Christ, bound himself by a vow that he would become a Christian if he saw her restored to health. She recovered, but he perfidiously drew back from fulfilling his vow. Nevertheless the hand of the Lord was still stretched forth, for suddenly he is smitten with blindness, and immediately the cause of this calamity was impressed upon his mind. He confessed his fault aloud, and vowed again that if his sight were given back he would perform what he had vowed. He recovered his sight, fulfilled his vow, and still the hand of God was stretched forth. He had not committed the Creed to memory, or perhaps had refused to commit it, and had excused himself on the plea of inability. God had seen this. Immediately after all the ceremonies of his reception he is seized with paralysis, affecting many, indeed almost all his members, and even his tongue. Then, being warned by a dream, he confesses in writing that it had been told to him that this had happened because he had not repeated the Creed. After that confession the use of all his members was restored to him, except the tongue alone; nevertheless he, being still under this affliction, made manifest by writing that he had, notwithstanding, learned the Creed, and still retained it in his memory; and so that frivolous loquacity which, as you know, blemished his natural kindliness, and made him, when he mocked Christians, exceedingly profane, was altogether destroyed in him. What shall I say, but,

LET. CCXXVIII.] TO HONORATUS. 425

" Let us sing a hymn to the Lord, and highly exalt Him for ever ! Amen."

LETTEE CCXXVIII

TO HIS HOLY BROTHER AND CO-BISHOP HONORATUS/ AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

I THOUGHT that by sending to your Grace a copy of the letter which I wrote to our brother and co-bishop Quodvultdeus/
I had earned exemption from the burden which you have imposed upon me, by asking my advice as to what you ought to do in the midst of the dangers which have befallen us in these times. For although I wrote briefly, I think that I did not pass over anything that was necessary either to be said by me or heard by my questioner in correspondence on the subject: for I said that, on the one hand, those who desire to remove, if they can, to fortified places are not to be forbidden to do so; and, on the other hand, we ought not to break the ties by which the love of Christ has bound us as ministers not to forsake the churches which it is our duty to serve. The words which I used in the letter referred to were:
" Therefore, however small may be the congregation of God's people among whom we are, if our ministry is so necessary to them that it is a clear duty not to withdraw it from them, it remains for us to say to the Lord, ' Be Thou to us a God of defence, and a strong fortress.' " ^

2. But this counsel does not commend itself to you, because, as you say in your letter, it does not become us to endeavour to act in opposition to the precept or example of the Lord, admonishing us that we should flee from one city to another. We remember, indeed, the words of the Lord, " When they persecute you in one city, flee to another; " ^ but who can believe that the Lord wished this to be done in cases in which the flocks which He purchased with His own blood are by the desertion of their pastors left without that necessary ministry which is indispensable to their life? Did Christ do this Himself, when, carried by His parents, He fled into Egypt in His infancy? No; for He had not then gathered churches which we could affirm to have been deserted by Him. Or, when the Apostle Paul was "let down in a basket through a window," to prevent his enemies from seizing him, and so escaped their hands," was the church in Damascus deprived of the necessary labours of Christ's servants? Was not all the service that was requisite supplied after his departure by other brethren settled in that city? For the apostle had done this at their request, in order that he might preserve for the Church's good his life, which the persecutor on that occasion specially sought to destroy. Let those, therefore, who are servants of Christ, His ministers in word and sacrament, do what He has commanded or permitted.

When any of them is specially sought for by persecutors, let him by all means flee from one city to another, provided that the Church is not hereby deserted, but that others who are not specially sought after remain to supply spiritual food to their fellow-servants, whom they know to be unable otherwise to maintain spiritual life. When, however, the danger of all, bishops, clergy, and laity, is alike, let not those who depend upon the aid of others be deserted by those on whom they depend. In that case, either let all remove together to fortified places, or let those who must remain be not deserted by those through whom in things pertaining to the Church their necessities must be provided for; and so let them share life in common, or share in common that which the Father of their family appoints them to suffer.

3. But if it shall happen that all suffer, whether some suffer less, and others more, or all suffer equally, it is easy to see who among them are suffering for the sake of others: they are obviously those who, although they might have freed themselves from such evils by flight, have chosen to remain rather than abandon others to whom they are necessary. By such conduct especially is proved the love commended by the Apostle John in the words: "Christ laid down His life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." ^

For those who betake themselves to flight, or are prevented from doing so only by circumstances thwarting their design, if they be seized and made to suffer, endure this suffering only for themselves, not for their brethren; but those who are involved in suffering because of their resolving not to abandon others, whose Christian welfare depended on them, are unquestionably "laying down their lives for the brethren."

4. For this reason, the saying which we have heard attributed to a certain bishop, namely: "If the Lord has commanded us to flee, in those persecutions in which we may reap the fruit of martyrdom, how much more ought we to escape by flight, if we can, from barren sufferings inflicted by the hostile incursions of barbarians!" is a saying true and worthy of acceptation, but applicable only to those who are not confined by the obligations of ecclesiastical office. For the man who, having it in his power to escape from the violence of the enemy, chooses not to flee from it, lest in so doing he should abandon the ministry of Christ, without which men can neither become Christians nor live as such, assuredly finds a greater reward of his love, than the man who, fleeing not for his brethren's sake but for his own, is seized by persecutors, and, refusing to deny Christ, suffers martyrdom.

5. What, then, shall we say to the position which you thus state in your former epistle: "I do not see what good we can do to ourselves or to the people by continuing to remain in the churches, except to see before our eyes men slain, women outraged, churches burned, ourselves expiring amid torments applied in order to extort from us what we do not possess"?

God is powerful to hear the prayers of His children, and to avert those things which they fear; and we ought not, on account of evils that are uncertain, to make up our minds absolutely to the desertion of that ministry, without which the people must certainly suffer ruia, not in the affairs of this life, but of that other life which ought to be cared for with incomparably greater diligence and solicitude. For if those evils which are apprehended, as possibly visiting the places in which we are, were certain, all those for whose sake it was our duty to remain would take flight before us, and would thus exempt us from the necessity of remaining; for no one says that ministers are under obligation to remain in any place where none remain to whom their ministry is necessary. In this way some holy bishops fled from Spain when their congregations had, before their flight, been annihilated, the members having either fled, or died by the sword, or perished in the siege of their towns, or gone into captivity; but many more of the bishops of that country remained in the midst of these abounding dangers, because those for whose sakes they remained were still remaining there. And if some have abandoned their flocks, this is what we say ought not to be done, for they were not taught to do so by divine authority, but were, through human infirmity, either deceived by an error or overcome by fear.

6. [We maintain, as one alternative, that they were deceived by an error.] for why do they think that indiscriminate compliance must be given to the precept in which they read of fleeing from one city to another, and not shrink with abhorrence from the character of the "hireling," who "seeth the wolf coming, and fleeth, because he careth not for the sheep"?^ Why do they not honour equally both of these true sayings of the Lord, the one in which flight is permitted or enjoined, the other in which it is rebuked and censured, by taking pains so to understand them as to find that they are, as is indeed the case, not opposed to each other? And how is their reconciliation to be found, unless that which I have above proved be borne in mind, that under pressure of persecution we who are ministers of Christ ought to flee from the places in which we are only in one or other of two cases, namely, either that there is no congregation to which we may minister, or that there is a congregation, but that the ministry necessary for it can be supplied by others who have not the same reason for flight as makes it imperative on us? Of which we have one example, as already mentioned, in the Apostle Paul escaping by being let down from the wall in a basket, when he was personally sought by the persecutor, there being others on the spot who had not the same necessity for flight, whose remain-

LET. CCXXVII] TO HONOR ATUS. 429

ing would prevent the Church from being destitute of the service of ministers. Another example we have in the holy Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria, who fled when the Emperor Constant ius wished to seize him specially, the Catholic people who remained in Alexandria not being abandoned by the other servants of God. But when the people remain and the servants of God flee, and their service is withdrawn, what is this but the guilty flight of the "hireling" who careth not for the sheep? For the wolf will come, â€” not man, but the devil, who has very often perverted to apostasy believers to whom the daily ministry of the Lord's body was wanting; and so, not "through thy knowledge," but through thine ignorance, "shall the weak brother perish for whom Christ died." â€”

7. As for those, however, who flee not because they are deceived by an error, but because they have been overcome by fear, why do they not rather, by the compassion and help of the Lord bestowed on them, bravely fight against their fear, lest evils incomparably heavier and much more to be dreaded befall them? This victory over fear is won wherever the flame of the love of God, without the smoke of worldliness, burns in the heart. For love says, "Who is weak, and I am not weak? who is offended, and I burn not?" ^ But love is from God. Let us, therefore, beseech Him who requires it of us to bestow it on us, and under its influence let us fear more lest the sheep of Christ should be slaughtered by the sword of spiritual malediction reaching the heart, than lest they should fall under the sword that can only harm that body in which men are destined at any rate, at some time, and in some way or other, to die. Let us fear more lest the purity of faith should perish through the taint of corruption in the inner man, than lest our women should be subjected by violence to outrage; for if chastity is preserved in the spirit, it is not destroyed by such violence, since it is not destroyed even in the body when there is no base consent of the sufferer to the sin, but only a submission without the consent of the will to that which another does.
Let us fear more lest the spark of life in "living stones" be quenched through our absence, than lest the stones and timbers of our earthly buildings be burned in our presence.

> 1 Cor, viii. 9, 11. 22 Cor. xi. 29.

430 LETTERS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [LET. CCXXVIII

Let us fear more lest the members of Christ's body should die for want of spiritual food, than lest the members of our own bodies, being overpowered by the violence of enemies, should be racked with torture. Not because these are things which we ought not to avoid when this is in our power, but because we ought to prefer to suffer them when they cannot be avoided without impiety, unless, perchance, any one be found to maintain that that servant is not guilty of impiety who withdraws the service necessary to piety at the very time when it is peculiarly necessary.

8. Do we forget how, when these dangers have reached their extremity, and there is no possibility of escaping from them by flight, an extraordinary crowd of persons, of both sexes and of all ages, is wont to assemble in the church, â€” some urgently asking baptism, others reconciliation, others even the doing of penance, and all calling for consolation and strengthening through the administration of sacraments? If the ministers of God be not at their posts at such a time, how great perdition overtakes those who depart from this life either not regenerated or not loosed from their sins! How deep also is the sorrow of their believing kindred, who shall not have these lost ones with them in the blissful rest of eternal life! In fine, how loud are the cries of all, and the indignant imprecations of not a few, because of the want of ordinances and the absence of those who should have dispensed them! See what the fear of temporal calamities may effect, and of how great a multitude of eternal calamities it may be the procuring cause. But if the ministers be at their posts, through the strength which God bestows upon them, all are aided, â€” some are baptized, others reconciled to the Church. None are defrauded of the communion of the Lord's body; all are consoled, edified, and exhorted to ask of God, who is able to do so, to avert all things which are feared, â€” prepared for both alternatives, so that "if the cup may not pass" from them. His will may be done â€” who cannot will anything that is evil.

9. Assuredly you now see (what, according to your letter, you did not see before) how great advantage the Christian people may obtain if, in the presence of calamity, the presence
LET. CCXXYIII.] TO IIOXORATUS. 431

of the servants of Christ be not withdrawn from them. You see, also, how much harm is done by their absence, when "they seek their own, not the things that are Jesus Christ's/^ and are destitute of that charity of which it is said, " it seeketh not her own, " ^ and fail to imitate him who said, " I seek not mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved," ^ and who, moreover, would not have fled from the insidious attacks of the imperial persecutor, had he not wished to save himself for the sake of others to whom he was necessary; on which account he says, " I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better: nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you."*

10. Here, perhaps, some one may say that the servants of God ought to save their lives by flight when such evils are impending, in order that they may reserve themselves for the benefit of the Church in more peaceful times. This is rightly done by some, when others are not wanting by whom the service of the Church may be supplied, and the work is not deserted by all, as we have stated above that Athanasius did; for the whole Catholic world knows how necessary it was to the Church that he should do so, and how useful was the prolonged life of the man who by his word and loving service defended her against the Arian heretics. But this ought by no means to be done when the danger is common to all; and the thing to be dreaded above all is, lest any one should be supposed to do this not from a desire to secure the welfare of others, but from fear of losing his own life, and should therefore do more harm by the example of deserting the post of duty than all the good that he could do by the preservation of his life for future service. Finally, observe how the holy David acquiesced in the urgent petition of his people, that he should not expose himself to the dangers of battle, and, as it is said in the narrative, "quench the light of Israel,"^ but was not himself the first to propose it; for had he been so, he would have made many imitate the cowardice which they might have attributed to him, supposing that he had been

prompted to this not through regard to the advantage of others, but under the agitation of fear as to his own life.
11. Another question which we must not regard as unworthy of notice is suggested here. For if the interests of the Church are not to be lost sight of, and if these make it necessary that when any great calamity is impeding some ministers should flee, in order that they may survive to minister to those whom they may find remaining after the calamity is passed, â€” the question arises, what is to be done when it appears that, unless some flee, all must perish together? what if the fury of the destroyer were so restricted as to attack none but the ministers of the Church? What shall we reply? Is the Church to be deprived of the service of her ministers because of fleeing from their work through fear lest she should be more unhappily deprived of their service because of their dying in the midst of their work? Of course, if the laity are exempted from the persecution, it is in their power to shelter and conceal their bishops and clergy in some way, as He shall help them under whose dominion all things are, and who, by His wondrous power, can preserve even one who does not flee from danger. But the reason for our inquiring what is the path of our duty in such circumstances is, that we may not be chargeable with tempting the Lord by expecting divine miraculous interposition on every occasion.

There is, indeed, a difference in the severity of the tempest of calamity when the danger is common to both laity and clergy, as the perils of stormy weather are common to both merchants and sailors on board of the same ship. But far be it from us to esteem this ship of ours so lightly as to admit that it would be right for the crew, and especially for the pilot, to abandon her in the hour of peril, although they might have it in their power to escape by leaping into a small boat, or even swimming ashore. For in the case of those in regard to whom we fear lest through our deserting our work they should perish, the evil which we fear is not temporal death, which is sure to come at one time or other, but eternal death, which may come or may not come, according as we neglect or adopt measures whereby it may be averted. Moreover, when the lives of both laity and clergy are exposed to common danger, what reason have we for thinking in every place which the enemy may invade all the clergy are likely to be put to death, and not that all the laity shall also die, in which event the clergy, and those to whom they are necessary, would pass from this life at the same time? Or why may we not hope that, as some of the laity are likely to survive, some of the clergy may also be spared, by whom the necessary ordinances may be dispensed to them?

12. Oh that in such circumstances the question debated among the servants of God were which of their number should remain, that the Church might not be left destitute by all fleeing from danger, and which of their number should flee, that the Church might not be left destitute by all perishing in the danger. Such a contest will arise among the brethren who are all alike glowing with love and satisfying the claims of love. And if it were in any case impossible otherwise to terminate the debate, it appears to me that the persons who are to remain and who are to flee should be chosen by lot.
For those who say that they, in preference to others, ought to flee, will appear to be chargeable either with cowardice, as persons unwilling to face impending danger, or with arrogance, as esteeming their own lives more necessary to be preserved for the good of the Church than those of other men. Again, perhaps, those who are better will be the first to choose to lay down their lives for the brethren; and so preservation by flight will be given to men whose life is less valuable because their skill in counselling and ruling the Church is less; yet these, if they be pious and wise, will resist the desires of men in regard to whom they see, on the one hand, that it is more important for the Church that they should live, and on the other hand, that they would rather lose their lives than flee from danger. In this case, as it is written, "the lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty;" for, in difficulties of this kind, God judges better than men, whether it please Him to call the better among His servants to the reward of suffering, and to spare the weak, or to make the weak stronger to endure trials, and then to withdraw them.

' Prov. xviii. 18.
LETT. IL 2 E

434 LETTERS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [LET. CCXXVII

from this life, as persons whose lives could not be so serviceable to the Church as the lives of the others who are stronger than they. If such an appeal to the lot be made, it will be, I admit, an unusual proceeding, but if it is done in any case, who will claI3 to find fault with it? Who but the ignorant or the prejudiced will hesitate to praise it with the approbation which it deserves? If, however, the use of the lot is not adopted because there is no precedent for such an appeal, let it by all means be secured that the Church be not, through the flight of any one, left destitute of that ministry which is more especially necessary and due to her in the midst of such great dangers. Let no one hold himself in such esteem because of apparent superiority in any grace as to say that he is more worthy of life than others, and therefore more entitled to seek safety in flight. For whoever thinks this is too self-satisfied, and whoever utters this must make all dissatisfied with him.

13. There are some who think that bishops and clergy may, by not fleeing but remaining in such dangers, cause the people to be misled, because, when they see those who are set over them remaining, this makes them not flee from danger. It is easy for them, however, to obviate this objection, and the reproach of misleading others, by addressing their congregations, and saying: "Let not the fact that we are not fleeing from this place be the occasion of misleading you, for we remain here not for our own sakes but for yours, that we may continue to minister to you whatever we know to be necessary to your salvation, which is in Christ; therefore, if you choose to flee, you thereby set us also at liberty from the obligations by which we are bound to remain." This, I think, ought to be said, when it seems to be truly advantageous to remove to ^ places of greater security. If, after such words have been spoken in their hearing, either all or some shall say: "We are at His disposal from whose anger none can escape whithersoever they may go, and whose mercy may be found wherever their lot is cast by those who, whether hindered by known insuperable difficulties, or unwilling to toQ after unknown refuges, in which perils may be only changed not finished, refer not to go away elsewhere," most assuredly those who thus resolve to remain ought not to be left destitute of the service of Christian ministers. If, on the other hand, after hearing their bishops and clergy speak as above, the people prefer to leave the place, to remain behind them is not now the duty of those who were only remaining for their sakes, because none are left there on whose account it would still be their duty to remain.

14. "Whoever, therefore, flees from danger in circumstances in which the Church is not deprived, through his flight, of necessary service, is doing that which the Lord has commanded or permitted. But the minister who flees when the consequence of his flight is the withdrawal from Christ's flock of that nourishment by which its spiritual life is sustained, is an "hireling who seeth the wolf coming, and fleetli because he careth not for the sheep."

"With love, which I know to be sincere, I have now written what I believe to be true on this question, because you asked my opinion, my dearly beloved brother; but I have not enjoined you to follow my advice, if you can find any better than mine. Be that as it may, we cannot find anything better for us to do in these dangers than continually to beseech the Lord our God to have compassion on us. And as to the matter about which I have written, namely, that ministers should not desert the churches of God, some wise and holy men have by the gift of God been enabled both to will and to do this thing, and have not in the least degree faltered in the determined prosecution of their purpose, even though exposed to the attacks of slanderers.

TO DARIUS,^ IIIIS DESERVEDLY ILLUSTRIOUS AND VERY POWERFUL LORD AND DEAR SON IN CHRIST, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

1. Your character and rank I have learned from my holy brothers and co-bishops, Urbanus and Novatus. The former
This Darius was an officer of distinction in the service of the Empress Placidia, and was the instrument of effecting a reconciliation between her and of these became acquainted with you near Carthage, in the town of Hilari, and more recently in the town of Sicca; the latter at Sitifis. Through them it has come to pass that I cannot regard you as unknown to me. For though my bodily weakness and the chill of age do not permit me to converse with you personally, it cannot on this account be said that I have not seen you; for the conversation of Urbanus, when he kindly visited me, and the letters of Novatus, so described to me the features, not of your face but of your mind, that I have seen you, and have seen you with all the more pleasure, because I have seen not the outward appearance but the inner man. These features of your character are joyfully seen both by us, and through the mercy of God by yourself also, as in a mirror in the holy Gospel, in which it is written in words uttered by Him who is truth: "Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God."

2. Those warriors are indeed great and worthy of singular honour, not only for their consummate bravery, but also (which is a higher praise) for their eminent fidelity, by whose labours and dangers, along with the blessing of divine protection and aid, enemies previously unsubdued are conquered, and peace obtained for the State, and the provinces reduced to subjection. But it is a higher glory still to stay war itself with a word, than to slay men with the sword, and to procure or maintain peace by peace, not by war.

For those who fight, if they are good men, doubtless seek for peace; nevertheless it is through blood. Your mission, however, is to prevent the shedding of blood. Yours, therefore, is the privilege of averting that calamity which others are under the necessity of producing. Therefore, my deservedly illustrious and very powerful lord and very dear son in Christ, rejoice in this singularly great and real blessing vouchsafed to you, and enjoy it in God, to whom you owe that you are what you are, and that you undertook the accomplishment of such a work. May God " strengthen that which He hath wrought for us through you." Accept this our salutation, and deign to reply. From the letter of my brother Novatus, I see that he has taken pains that your learned Excellency should become acquainted with me also through my works. If, then, you have read what he has given you, I also shall have become known to your inward perception. As far as I can judge, they will not greatly displease you if you have read them in a loving rather than a critical spirit. It is not much to ask, but it will be a great favour, if for this letter and my works you send us one letter in reply. I salute with due affection the pledge of peace, which through the favour of our Lord and God you have happily received.

TO DARIUS, HIS SON, AND A MEMBER OF CHRIST, AUGUSTINE, A SERVANT OF CHRIST AND OF THE MEMBERS OF CHRIST, SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

1. You requested an answer from me as a proof that I had gladly received your letter. Behold, then, I write again; and yet I cannot express the pleasure I felt, either by this answer or by any other, whether I write briefly or at the utmost length, for neither by few words nor by many is it possible for me to express to you what words can never express. I, indeed, am not eloquent, though ready in speech; but I could by no means allow any man, however eloquent, even though he could see as well into my mind as I do myself, to do that which is beyond my own power, viz. to describe in a letter, however able and however long, the effect which your epistle had on my mind. It remains, then, for me so to express to ^ Ps. Ixviii. 29. 2 Verimodus, the son of Darius.

'Refering to Darius' reply (Letter CCXXX. ) to the foregoing Letter (CCXXIX) In it, Darius, after reciprocating in the warmest manner every expression of admiration and esteem, expresses his hope that the peace concluded with the Vandals may be permanent, entreats Augustine to pray for him (alluding to the letter said to have been written by Abgaris, king of Edessa, to our Saviour), and asks him to send a copy of his Confessions along with his reply to this communication.

you what you wished to know, that you may understand as being in my words that which they do not express. What, then, shall I say? That I was delighted with your letter, exceedingly delighted; â€“ the repetition of this word is not a mere repetition, but, as it were, a perpetual affirmation; because it was impossible to be always saying it, therefore it has been at least once repeated, for in this way perhaps my feelings may be expressed.

2. If some one inquire here what after all delighted me so exceedingly in your letter, â€“ " Was it its eloquence? " I will answer, No; and he, perhaps, will reply, " Was it, then, the praises bestowed on yourself? " but again I will reply, No; and I shall reply thus not because these things are not in that letter, for the eloquence in it is so great that it is very clearly evident that you are naturally endowed with the highest talents, and that you have been most carefully educated; and your letter is undeniably full of my praises. Some one then may say, " Do not these things delight you? " Yes, truly, for " my heart is not," as the poet says, " of horn," ^ so that I should either not observe these things or observe them without delight. These things do delight; but what have these things to do with that with which I said I was highly delighted?

Your eloquence delights me since it is at once genial in sentiment and dignified in expression; and though assuredly I am not delighted with all sorts of praise from all sorts of persons, but only with such praises as you have thought me worthy of, and only coming from those who are such as you are â€” that is, from persons who, for Christ's sake, love His servants, I cannot deny that I am delighted with the praises bestowed upon me in your letter.

3. Thoughtful and experienced men will be at no loss as to the opinion which they should form of Theniistocles (if I remember the name rightly), who, having refused at a banquet to play on the lyre, a thing which the distinguished and learned men of Greece were accustomed to do, and having been on that account regarded as uneducated, was asked, when he expressed his contempt for that sort of amusement, " What, then, does it delight you to hear? " and is reported to have answered: " My own praises. " Thoughtful and experienced men will readily see "svith what design and in what sense these words must have been used by him, or must be understood by them, if they are to believe that he uttered them; for he was in the affairs of this w^orld a most remarkable man, as may be illustrated by the answer which he gave when he was further pressed with the question: " What, then, do you know? " "I know," he replied, " how to make a small republic great." As to the thirst for praise spoken of by Ennius in the words: " All men greatly desire to be praised," I am of opinion that it is partly to be approved of, partly guarded against. For as, on the one hand, we should vehemently desire the truth, which is undoubtedly to be eagerly sought after as alone worthy of praise, even though it be not praised; so, on the other hand, we must carefully shun the vanity which readily insinuates itself along with praise from men:

and this vanity is present in the mind when either the things which are worthy of praise are not reckoned worth having unless the man be praised for them by his fellow-men, or the things on account of possessing which any man wishes to be much praised are deserving either of small praise, or it may be of severe censure. Hence Horace, a more careful observer than Ennius, says: "Is fame your passion? Wisdom's powerful charm if thrice read over shall its power disarm."

4. Thus the poet thought that the malady arising from the love of human praise, which was thoroughly attacked with his satire, was to be charmed away by words of healing power. The great Teacher has accordingly taught us by His apostle, that we ought not to do good with a view to be praised by men, that is, we ought not to make the praises of men the motive for our well-doing; and yet, for the sake of men themselves. He teaches us to seek their approbation. For when good men are praised, the praise does not benefit those on whom it is bestowed, but those who bestowed it. For to the good, so far as they are themselves concerned, it is enough that they are good; but those are to be congratulated whose interest it is to imitate the good when the good are praised by them, since they thus show that the persons whom they sincerely praise are persons whose conduct they appreciate.

440 LETTERS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [LET. CCXXXI.

The apostle says in a certain place, "If I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ;" and the same apostle says in another place, "I please all men in all things," and adds the reason, "Not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved." Behold what he sought in the praise of men, as it is declared in these words: "Finally, my brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever tilings are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things. Those things, which ye have both, learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do: and the God of peace shall be with you." All the other things which I have named above, he summed up under the name of Virtue, saying, "If there be any virtue;" but the definition which he subjoined, "Whatsoever things are of good report," he followed up by another suitable word, "If there be any praise." What the apostle says, then, in the first of these passages, "If I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ," is to be understood as if he said. If the good things which I do were done by me with human praise as my motive, if I were puffed up with the love of praise, I should not be the servant of Christ. The apostle, then, wished to please all men, and rejoiced in pleasing them, not that he might himself be inflated with their praises, but that he being praised (might build them up in Christ. Why, then, should it not delight me to be praised by you, since you are too good a man to speak insincerely, and you bestow your praise on things which you love, and which it is profitable and wholesome to love, even though they be not in me? This, moreover, does not benefit you alone, but also me. For if they are not in me, it is good for me that I am put to the blush, and am made to burn with desire to possess them. And in regard to anything in your praise which I recognise as in my possession, I rejoice that I possess it, and that such things are loved by you, and that I am loved for their sake. And in regard to those things which I do not recognise as belonging to me, I not only desire to obtain them, that I may possess them for myself, but also \ > Gal. i. 10. 2 I Cor. x. 33. =A» riiQ. iv. 8-9.

LET. CCXXXL] to DARIUS. 441

that those who love me sincerely may not always be mistaken in praising me for them.

5. Behold how many things I have said, and still I have not yet spoken of that in your letter which delighted me more than your eloquence, and far more than the praises you bestowed on me. What do you think, excellent man, that this can be? It is that I have acquired the friendship of so distinguished a man as you are, and that without having even seen you; if, indeed, I ought to speak of one as unseen whose soul I have seen in his own letters, though I have not seen his body. In which letters I rest my opinion concerning you on my own knowledge, and not, as formerly, on the testimony of my brethren. For what your character was I had already heard, but how you stood affected to me I knew not until now. From this, your friendship to me, I doubt not that even the praises bestowed on me, which give me pleasure for a reason about which I have already said enough, will much more abundantly benefit the Church of Christ, since the fact that you possess, and study, and love, and commend my labours in defence of the gospel against the remnant of impious idolaters, secures for me a wider influence in these writings in proportion to the high position which you occupy; for, illustrious yourself, you insensibly shed a lustre upon them. You, being celebrated, give celebrity to them, and wherever you shall see that the circulation of them might do good, you will not suffer them to remain altogether unknown. If you ask me how I know this, my reply is, that such is the impression concerning you produced on me by reading your letters. Herein you will now see how great delight your letter could impart to me, for if your opinion of me be favourable, you are aware how great delight is given to me by gain to the cause of Christ. Moreover, when you tell me concerning yourself that, although, as you say, you belong to a family which not for one or two generations, but even to remote ancestors, has been known as able to accept the doctrine of Christ, you have nevertheless been aided by my writings against the Gentile rites so to understand these as you never had done before, can I esteem it a small matter how great benefit our writings, commended and circulated by you, may confer upon others, and to how many and how illustrious persons your testimony may bring them, and how easily and profitably through these persons they may reach others? Or, reflecting on this, can the joy diffused in my heart be small or moderate in degree?

6. Since, then, I cannot in words express how great delight I have received from your letter, I have spoken of the reason why it delighted me, and now that which I am unable adequately to utter on this subject I leave to you to conjecture. Accept, then, my son "accept, excellent man. Christian not by outward profession merely, but by Christian love "accept, I say, the books containing my "Confessions," which you desired to have. In these behold me, that you may not praise me beyond what I am; in these believe what is said of me, not by others, but by myself; in these contemplate me, and see what I have been in myself, by myself; and if anything in me please you, join me, because of it, in praising Him to whom, and not to myself, I desire praise to be given. For "He hath made us, and not we ourselves;" indeed, we had destroyed ourselves, but He who made us has made us anew. When, however, you find me in these books, pray for me that I may not fail, but be perfected. Pray, my son; pray. I feel what I say; I know what I ask. Let it not seem to you a thing unbecoming, and, as it were, beyond your merits. You will defraud me of a great help if you do not do so. Let not only you yourself, but all also who by your testimony shall come to love me, pray for me. Tell them that I have entreated this, and if you think highly of us, consider that we command what we have asked; in any case, whether as granting a request or obeying a command, pray for us. Read the Divine Scriptures, and you will find that the apostles themselves, the leaders of Christ's flock, requested this from their sons, or enjoined it on their hearers. I certainly, since you ask it of me, will do this for you as far as I can. He sees this who is the Hearer of prayer, and who saw that I prayed for you before you asked me; but let this proof of love be reciprocated by you. We are placed over you; you are the flock of God. Consider and see that our dangers are greater than yours, and pray for us, for this becomes both us and you, that we may give a good account of you to the Chief Shepherd and Head over us all, and may escape both from the trials of this world and its allurements, which are still more dangerous, except when the peace of this world has the effect for which the apostle has directed us to pray, "That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty." For if godliness and honesty be wanting, what is a quiet and peaceable exemption from the evils of the world but an occasion either of inviting men to enter, or assisting men to follow, a course of self-indulgence and perdition? Do you, then, ask for us what we ask for" you, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. Let us ask this for each other wherever you are and wherever we are, for He whose we are is everywhere present.

7. I have sent you also other books which you did not ask, that I might not rigidly restrict myself to what you asked: my works on Faith in Things Unseen, on Patience, on Continence, on Providence, and a large work on Faith, Hope, and Charity. If, while you are in Africa, you shall read all these, either send your opinion of them to me, or let it be sent to some place whence it may be sent us by my lord and brother Aurelius, though wherever you shall be we hope to have letters from you; and do you expect letters from us as long as we are able. I most gratefully received the things you sent to me, in which you deigned to aid me both in regard to my bodily health, since you desire me to be free from the hindrance of sickness in devoting my time to God, and in regard to my library, that I may have the means to procure new books and repair the old. May God recompense you, both in the present life and in that to come, with those favours which He has prepared for such as He has willed you to be.

I request you now to salute again for me, as before, the pledge of peace entrusted to you, very dear to both of us.

444 LETTERS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [LET. CCXXXII.

FOURTH DIVISION.

[Hitherto the order followed in the arrangement of the letters has been the chronological. It being impossible to ascertain definitely the date of composition of thirty-nine of the letters, these have been placed by the Benedictine editors in the fourth division, and in it they are arranged under two principal divisions, the first embracing some controversial letters, and the second a number of those which were occasioned either by Augustine's interest in the welfare of individuals, or by the claims of official duty.]

LETTER CCXXXII.

TO THE PEOPLE OF MADAUEA, MY LORDS WORTHY OF PRAISE, AND BRETHREN MOST BELOVED, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING, IN REPLY TO THE LETTER RECEIVED BY THE HANDS OF BROTHER FLORENTINUS.
1. If, perchance, such a letter as I have received was sent to me by those among you who are Catholic Christians, the only thing at which I am surprised is, that it was sent in the name of the municipality, and not in their own name. If, however, it has pleased all or almost all of your men of rank to send a letter to me, I am surprised at the title "Father" and the "salutation in the Lord" addressed to me by you, of whom I know certainly, and with much regret, that you regard with superstitious veneration those idols against which your temples are more easily shut than your hearts; or, I should rather say, those idols which are not more truly shut up in your temples than in your hearts. Can it be that you are at last, after wise reflection, seriously thinking of that salvation which is in the Lord, in whose name you have chosen to salute me? For if it be not so, I ask you, my lords worthy of all praise, and brethren most beloved, in what have I injured, in what have I offended your benevolence, that you should think it right to treat me with ridicule rather than with respect in the salutation prefixed to your letter?

2. For when I read the words, "To Father Augustine, eternal salvation in the Lord," I was suddenly elated with such fulness of hope, that I believed you either already converted to the Lord Himself, and to that eternal salvation of which He is the author, or desirous, through our ministry, to be so converted. But when I read the rest of the letter my heart was chilled. I inquired, however, from the bearer of the letter, whether you were already Christians or were desirous to be so. After I learned from his answer that you were in no way changed, I was deeply grieved that you thought it right not only to reject the name of Christ, to whom you already see the whole world submitting, but even to insult His name in my person; for I could not think of any other Lord than Christ the Lord in whom a bishop could be addressed by you as a father, and if there had been any doubt as to the meaning to be attached to your words, it would have been removed by the closing sentence of your letter, where you say plainly, "We desire that, for many years, your lordship may always, in the midst of your clergy, be glad in God and His Christ." After reading and pondering all these things, what could I (or, indeed, could any man) think but that these words were written either as the genuine expression of the mind of the writers, or with an intention to deceive? If you write these things as the genuine expression of your mind, who has barred your way to the truth? Who has strewn it with thorns? What enemy has placed masses of rock across your path? In fine, if you are desiring to come in, who has shut the door of our places of worship against you, so that you are unwilling to enjoy the same salvation with us in the same Lord in whose name you salute us? But if you write these things deceitfully and mockingly, do you, then, in the very act of imposing on me the care of your affairs, presume to insult, with the language of feigned adulation, the name of Him through whom alone I can do anything, instead of honouring Him with the veneration which is due to Him?

3. Be assured, dearest brethren, that it is with inexpressible trembling of heart on your account that I write this letter to you, for I know how much greater in the judgment of God must be your guilt and your doom if I shall have said these things to you in vain. In regard to everything in the history of the human race which our forefathers observed and handed down to us, and not less in regard to everything connected with the seeking and holding of true religion which we now see and put on record for those who come after us, the Divine Scriptures have not been silent; so far from this, all things come to pass exactly according to the predictions of Scripture.

You cannot deny that you see the Jewish people torn from the abodes of their ancestry, dispersed and scattered over almost every country: now, the origin of that people, their gradual increase, their losing of the kingdom, their dispersion through all the world, have happened exactly as foretold.
You cannot deny that you see that the word of the Lord, and the law coming forth from that people through Christ, who was miraculously born among their nation, has taken and retained possession of the faith of all nations: now we read of all these announced beforehand as we see them. You cannot deny that you see what we call heresies and schisms, that is, many cut off from the root of the Christian society, which by means of the Apostolic Sees, and the successions of bishops, is spread abroad in an indisputably world-wide diffusion, claiming the name of Christians, and as withering branches boasting of the mere appearance of being derived from the true vine: all this has been foreseen, predicted, and described in Scripture.
You cannot deny that you see some temples of the idols fallen into ruin through neglect, others thrown down by violence, others closed, and some applied to other purposes; you see the idols themselves either broken to pieces, or burnt, or shut up, or destroyed, and the same powers of this world, who in defence of idols persecuted Christians, now vanquished and subdued by Christians, who did not fight for the truth but died for it, and directing their attacks and their laws against the very idols in defence of which they put Christians to death, and the highest dignitary of the noblest empire laying aside his crown and kneeling as a suppliant at the tomb of the fisherman Peter.

4. The Divine Scriptures, which have now come into the

LET. CCXXXIL] to THE PEOPLE OF MAD AURA. 447 hands of all, testified long before that all these things would come to pass. We rejoice that all these things have happened, with a faith which is strong in proportion to the discovery thereby made of the greatness of the authority with which they are declared in the sacred Scriptures. Seeing, then, that all these things have come to pass as foretold, are we, I ask, to suppose that the judgment of God, which we read of in the same Scriptures as appointed to separate finally between the believing and the unbelieving, is the only event in regard to which the prophecy is to fail? Yea, certainly, as all these other events have come, it shall also come. ISTor shall there be a man of our time who shall be able in that day to plead anything in defence of his unbelief. For the name of Christ is on the lips of every man: it is invoked by the just man in doing justice, by the pejurer in the act of deceiving, by the king to confirm his rule, by the soldier to nerve himself for battle, by the husband to establish his authority, by the wife to confess her submission, by the father to enforce his command, by the son to declare his obedience, by the master in supporting his right to govern, by the slave in performing his duty, by the humble in quickening piety, by the proud in stimulating ambition, by the rich man when he gives, and by the poor when he receives an alms, by the drunkard at his wine-cup, by the beggar at the gate, by the good man in keeping his word, by the wicked man in violating his promises: all frequently use the name of Christ, the Christian with genuine reverence, the Pagan with feigned respect; and they shall undoubtedly give to that same Being whom they invoke an account both of the spirit and of the language in which they repeat His name. 5. There is One invisible, from whom, as the Creator and First Cause, all things seen by us derive their being: He is supreme, eternal, unchangeable, and comprehensible by none save Himself alone. There is One by whom the supreme Majesty\(^*\) utters and reveals Himself, namely, the Word, not inferior to Him by whom it is begotten and uttered, by which Word He who begets it is manifested. There is One who is holiness, the sanctifier of all that becomes holy, who is the inseparable and undivided mutual communion between this unchangeable Word by whom that First Cause is revealed, and that First Cause who reveals Himself by the Word which is His equal. But who is able with perfectly calm and pure mind to contemplate this whole Essence (whom I have endeavoured to describe without giving His name, instead of giving His name without describing Him), and to draw blessedness from that contemplation, and by sinking, as it were, in the rapture of such meditation, to become oblivious of self, and to press on to that the sight of which is beyond our sphere of perception; in other words, to be clothed with immortality, and obtain that eternal salvation which you were pleased to desire on my behalf in your greeting ? Who, I say, is able to do this but the man who, confessing his sins, shall have levelled with the dust all the vain risings of pride, and prostrated himself in meekness and humility to receive God as his Teacher ?

6. Since, therefore, it is necessary that we be first brought down from vain self-sufficiency to lowliness of spirit, that rising thence we may attain to real exaltation, it was not possible that this spirit could be produced in us by any method at once more glorious and more gentle (subduing our haughtiness by persuasion instead of violence) than that the Word by whom the Father reveals Himself to angels, who is His Power and Wisdom, who could not be discerned by the human heart so long as it was blinded by love for the things which are seen, should condescend to assume our nature, and so to exercise and manifest His personality when incarnate as to make men more afraid of being elated by the pride of man, than of being brought low after the example of God. Therefore the Christ who is preached throughout the whole world is not Christ adorned with an earthly crown, nor Christ rich in earthly treasures, nor Christ illustrious for earthly prosperity, but Christ crucified. This was ridiculed, at first, by whole nations of proud men, and is still ridiculed by a remnant among the nations, but it was the object of faith at first to a few and now to whole nations, because when Christ crucified was preached at that time, notwithstanding the ridicule of the nations, to the few who believed, the lame received power to walk, the dumb to speak, the deaf to hear, the blind to see, and the dead were restored to life. Thus, at length, the pride of this world was convinced that, even among the things of this world, there is nothing more powerful than the humility of God, so that beneath the shield of a divine example that humility, which it is most profitable for men to practise, might find defence against the contemptuous assaults of pride.

7. men of Madaura, my brethren, nay, my fathers, I beseech you to awake at last: this opportunity of writing to you God has given to me. So far as I could, I rendered my service and help in the business of brother Florentinus, by whom, as God willed it, you wrote to me; but the business was of such a nature, that even without my assistance it might have been easily transacted, for almost all the men of his family, who reside at Hippo, know Florentinus, and deeply regret his bereavement. But the letter was sent by you to me, that, having occasion to reply, it might not seem presumptuous on my part, when the opportunity was afforded me by yourselves, to say something concerning Christ to the worshippers of idols. But I beseech you, if you have not taken His name in vain in that epistle, suffer not these things which I write to you to be in vain; but if in using His name you wished to mock me, fear Him whom the world formerly in its pride scorned as a condemned criminal, and whom the same world now, subjected to His sway, awaits as its Judge.

For the desire of my heart for you, expressed as far as in my power by this letter, shall witness against you at the judgment seat of Him who shall establish for ever those who believe in Him and confound the unbelieving. May the one true God deliver you wholly from the vanity of this world, and turn you to Himself, my lords worthy of all praise and brethren most beloved.
LETTER CCXXXVII.

This letter was addressed to Ceretius, a bishop, who had sent to Augustine certain apocryphal writings, on which the Spanish heretical sect called Priscillianists^ founded some of their doctrines. Ceretius had especially directed his attention to a hymn which they alleged to have been composed by the Lord Jesus Christ, and given by Him to His disciples on that night on which He was betrayed, when they sang an " hymn" before going out to the Mount of Olives. The length of the letter precludes its insertion here, but we believe it will interest many to read the few lines of this otherwise long-forgotten hymn, which Augustine has here preserved. They are as follows: â€”

 Salvare volo et salvari volo; Solve re volo et solvi volo; Ornare volo et ornari volo; Generari volo; Cantare volo, saltare cuncti:
Plangere volo, tundite vos omnes:
Lucerna sum tibi, ille qui me vides; Janua sum tibi, quicunque me pulsas; Qui vides quod ago, tace opera mea; Verbo illusi cuncta et non sum illusus in totum."

The reader who ponders these extracts, and remembers the occasion on which the hymn is alleged to have been composed, will agree with us that Augustine employs a very unnecessary fulness of argument in devoting several paragraphs to demolish the claims advanced on its behalf as a revelation more profound and sacred than anything contained in the canonical Scriptures. Augustine also brings against the Priscillianists the charge of justifying perjury when it might be of service in concealing their real opinions, and quotes a line in which, as he had heard from some who once belonged to that sect, the lawfulness of such deceitful conduct was taught: â€”

" Jura, perjura, secretum prodere noli."

TO POSSIDIUS,^ MY MOST BELOVED LORD AND VENERABLE BROTHER AND PARTNER IN THE SACERDOTAL OFFICE, AND TO THE BRETHREN WHO ARE WITH HIM, AUGUSTINE AND THE BRETHREN WHO ARE WITH HIM SEND GREETING IN THE LORD.

1. It requires more consideration to decide what to do with those who refuse to obey you, than to discover how to show them that things which they do are unlawful. Meanwhile, however, the letter of your Holiness has come upon me when I am exceedingly pressed with business, and the very hasty departure of the bearer has made it necessary for me to write you in reply, but has not given me time to answer as I ought to have done in regard to the matters on which you have consulted me. Let me say, however, in regard to ornaments of gold and costly dress, that I would not have you come to a precipitate decision in the way of forbidding their use, except in the case of those who, neither being married nor intending to marry, are bound to consider only how they may please God.
But those who belong to the world have also to consider how they may in these things please their wives if they be husbands, their husbands if they be wives;^ with this limitation, that it is not becoming even in married women to uncover their hair, since the apostle commands women to keep their heads covered.^ As to the use of pigments by women in colouring the face, in order to have a ruddier or a fairer complexion, this is a dishonest artifice, by which I am sure that even their own husbands do not wish to be deceived; and it is only for their own husbands that women ought to be permitted to adorn themselves, according to the toleration, not the injunction, , of Scripture. Eor the true adorning, especially of Christian il men and women, consists not only in the absence of allji deceitful painting of the complexion, but in the possession*-^.

^ Possidius, a disciple of Augustine, spoken of in Letter CI. sec. 1, p. 29, was , the Bishop of Calama who made the narrow escape recorded in Letter XCI. sec. 8, vol.
i. p. 388. He was for forty years an intimate friend of Augustine, was with him at his death, and wrote his biography.
2 1 Cor. vii. 32-34. Â« 1 Cor. xi. 6-13.
not of magnificent golden ornaments or rich apparel, but of a blameless life.

2. As for the accursed superstition of wearing amulets (among which the ear-rings worn by men at the top of the ear on one side are to be reckoned), it is practised with the view not of pleasing men, but of doing homage to devils.

But who can expect to find in Scripture express prohibition of every form of wicked superstition, seeing that the apostle says generally, " I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils"^ and again, " What concord hath Christ with Belial?"^ unless, perchance, the fact that he named Belial, while he forbade in general terms fellowship with devils, leaves it open for Christians to sacrifice to Neptune, because we nowhere read an express prohibition of the worship of Neptune! Meanwhile, let those unhappy people be admonished that, if they persist in disobedience to salutary precepts, they must at least forbear from defending their impurities, and thereby involving themselves in greater guilt. But why should we argue at all with them if they are afraid to take off their ear-rings, and are not afraid to receive the body of Christ while wearing the badge of the devil?

As to ordaining a man who was baptized in the Donatist sect, I cannot take the responsibility of recommending you to do this; it is one thing for you to do it if you are left without alternative, it is another thing for me to advise that you should do it.

LETTÉE CCXLVI.

TO LAMPADIUS, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING.

1. On the subject of Fate and Fortune, by which, as I perceived when I was with you, and as I now know in a more gratifying and more reliable way by your own letter, your mind is seriously disturbed, I ought to write you a considerable volume; the Lord will enable me to explain it in the manner which He knows to be best fitted to preserve your faith. For it is no small evil that when men embrace perverse opinions they are not only drawn by the allurement of pleasure to commit sin, but are also turned aside to vindicate their sin rather than seek to have it healed by acknowledging that they have done wrong.

Â» 1 Cor. X, 20. 2 2 Cor. vi. 15.

LET. ccxlvi] to lampadius. 453
2. Let me, therefore, briefly remind you of one thing bearing on the question which you certainly know, that all laws and all means of discipline, commendations, censures, exhortations, threatenings, rewards, punishments, and all other things by which mankind are managed and ruled, are utterly subverted and overthrown, and found to be absolutely devoid of justice, unless the will is the cause of the sins which a man commits.

How much more legitimate and right, therefore, is it for us to reject the absurdities of astrologers \textit{mathematici}, than to submit to the alternative necessity of condemning and rejecting the laws proceeding from divine authority, or even the means needful for governing our own families. In this the astrologers themselves ignore their own doctrine as to Fate and Fortune, for when any one of them, after selling to moneyed simpletons his silly prognostications of Fate, calls back his thoughts from the ivory tablets to the management and care of his own house, he reproves his wife, not with words only, but with blows, if he finds her, I do not say jesting rather forwardly, but even looking too much out of the window. Nevertheless, if she were to expostulate in such a case, saying: "Why beat me? beat Venus, rather, if you can, since it is under that planet's influence that I am compelled to do what you complain of," â€” he would certainly apply his energies not to invent some of the absurd jargon by which he cajoles the public, but to inflict some of the just correction by which he maintains his authority at home.

3. When, therefore, any one, upon being reproved, affirms that Fate is the cause of the action, and insists that therefore he is not to be blamed, because he says that under the compulsion of Fate he did the action which is censured, let him come back to apply this to his own case, let him observe this principle in managing his own affairs: let him not chastise a dishonest servant; let him not complain of a disrespectful son; let him not utter threats against a mischievous neighbour.

For in doing which of these things would he act justly, if all

from whom he suffers such wrong are impelled to commit it by Fate, not by any fault of their own 1 If, however, from the right inherent in himself, and the duty incumbent on him as

I the head of a family towards all whom for the time he has under his control, he exhorts them to do good, deters them from doing evil, commands them to obey his will, honours those who yield implicit obedience, inflicts punishment on those who set him at naught, gives thanks to those who do him good, and hates those who are ungrateful, â€” shall I wait to prove the absurdity of the astrologer's calculations of Fate, j when I find him proclaiming, not by words but by deeds, things so conclusive against his pretensions that he seems to destroy almost with his own hands every hair on the heads of the astrologers?

If your eager desire is not satisfied with these few sentences, and demands a book which will take longer time to read on this subject, you must wait patiently until I get some respite from other duties; and you must pray to God that He may be pleased to allow both leisure and capacity to write, so as to set your mind at rest on this matter. I will, however, do this with more willing readiness, if your Charity does not grudge to remind me of it by frequent letters, and to show me in your reply what you think of this letter.

LETTEE CCL.

TO HIS BELOVED LORD AND VENERABLE BROTHER AND PARTNER IN THE PRIESTLY OFFICE, AUXILIUS,† AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

1. Our son Classicianus, a man of rank, has addressed to me a letter complaining bitterly that he has suffered excommunication wrongfully at the hand of your Holiness. His account of the matter is, that he came to the church with a small escort suitable to his official authority, and begged of you that you would not, to the detriment of their own spiritual welfare, extend the privilege of the sanctuary to men who, after violating an oath which they had taken on the Gospel, were seeking in the house of faith itself assistance and protection in their crime of breaking faith; that thereafter the men themselves, reflecting on the sin which they had committed, went forth from the church, not under violent compulsion, but of their own accord; and that because of this transaction your Holiness was so displeased with him, that with the usual forms of ecclesiastical procedure you smote him and all his household with a sentence of excommunication.

LET. CCL.] TO AUXILIUS. 455

On reading this letter from him, being very much troubled, the thoughts of my heart being agitated like the waves of a stormy sea, I felt it impossible to forbear from writing to you, to beg that if you have thoroughly examined your judgment in this matter, and have proved it by irrefragable reasoning or Scripture testimonies, you will have the kindness to teach me also the grounds on which it is just that a son should be anathematized for the sin of his father, or a wife for the sin of her husband, or a servant for the sin of his master, or how it is just that even the child as yet unborn should lie under an anathema, and be debarred, even though death were imminent, from the deliverance provided in the laver of regeneration, if he happen to be born in a family at the time when the whole household is under the ban of excommunication. For this is not one of those judgments merely affecting the body, in which, as we read in Scripture, some despisers of God were slain with all their households, though these had not been sharers in their impiety. In those cases, indeed, as a warning to the survivors, death was inflicted on toadies which, as mortal, were destined at some time to die; but a spiritual judgment, founded on what is written, " That which ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven," Eîκ is binding on souls, concerning which it is said, " As the soul of the father is mine, so also the soul of the son is mine: the soul that sinneth it shall die." Eîκ

2. It may be that you have heard that other priests of great reputation have in some cases included the household of a transgressor in the anathema pronounced on him; but these could, perchance, if they were required, give a good reason for so doing. For my own part, although I have been most grievously troubled by the cruel excesses with which some men have vexed the Church, I have never ventured to do as you have done, for this reason, that if any one were to challenge me to justify such an act, I could give no satisfactory reply. But if, perchance, the Lord has revealed to you that it may be justly done, I by no means despise your youth and your inexperience, as having been but recently elevated to high office in the Church. Behold, though far advanced in life, I am ready to learn from one who is but young; and notwithstanding the number of years for which I have been a bishop, I am ready to learn from one who has not yet been a twelvemonth in the same office, if he undertakes to teach me how we can justify our conduct, either before men or before God, if we inflict a spiritual punishment on innocent souls because of another person's crime, in which they are not involved in the same way as they are involved in the original sin of Adam, in whom " all have sinned." For although the son of Classicianus derived through his father, from our first parent, guilt which behaved to be washed away by the sacred waters of baptism, who hesitates for a moment to say that he is in no way responsible for any sin which his father may have committed, since he was born, without his participation? What shall I say of his wife? What of so many son Is in the entire household? â€” of which if even one, in consequence of the severity which included the whole household in the excommunication, should perish through departing from the body without baptism, the loss thus occasioned would be an incomparably greater calamity than the bodily death of an innumerable multitude, even though they were innocent men, dragged from the courts of the sanctuary and murdered. If, therefore, you are able to give a good reason for this, I trust that you will in your reply communicate it to me, that I also may be able to do the same; but if you cannot, what right have you to do, under the promptings of inconsiderate excitement, an act for which, if you were asked to give a satisfactory reason, you could find none?

3. What I liave said hitherto applies to the case even on the supposition that our son Classicianus has done something which might appear to demand most righteously at your hands the punishment of excommunication. But if the letter which he sent to me contained the truth, there was no reason why even he himself (even though his household had been exempted from the stroke) should have been so punished.
As to this, however, I do not interfere with your Holiness; I only beseech you to pardon him when he asks forgiveness, if he acknowledges his fault;
and if, on the other hand, you, upon reflection, acknowledge that he did nothing wrong, since in fact the right rather lay on his side who earnestly demanded that in the house of faith, faith should be sacredly kept, and that it should not be broken in the place where the sinfulness of such breach of faith is taught from day to day, do, in this event, what a man of piety ought to do, â€” that is to say, if to you as a man anything has happened such as was confessed by one who was truly a man of God in the words of the psalm, "Mine eye was discomposed by anger," ^ fail not to cry to the Lord, as he did, " Have pity on me, Lord, for I am weak," ^ so that He may stretch forth His right hand to you, rebuking the storm of your passion, and making your mind calm that you may see and may perform what is just; for, as it is written, "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God." ^ And think not that, because we are bishops, it is impossible for unjust passionate resentment to gain secretly upon us; let us rather remember that, because we are men, our life in the midst of temptation's snares is beset with the greatest possible dangers. Cancel, therefore, the ecclesiastical sentence which, perhaps under the influence of unusual excitement, you have passed; and let the mutual love which, even from the time when you were a catechumen, has united him and you, be restored again; let strife be banished and peace invited to return, lest this man who is your friend be lost to you, and the devil who is your enemy rejoice over you both. Mighty is the mercy of our God; it may be that His compassion shall hear even my prayer, imploring of Him that my sorrow on your account may not be increased, but that rather what I have begun to suffer may be removed; and may your youth, not despising my old age, be encouraged and made full of joy by His grace! Farewell!

[Annexed to this letter is a fragment of a letter written at the same time to Classicianus; it is as follows: â€”]
To restrain those who for the offence of one soul bind a transgressor's entire household, that is, a large number of souls, under one sentence of excommunication, and especially to prevent any one from departing this life unbaptized in consequence of such an anathema, â€” also to decide the question whether persons ought not to be driven forth even from a church, who seek a refuge there in order that they may break the faith pledged to sureties, I desire with the Lord's help to use the necessary measures in our Council, and, if it be necessary, to write to the Apostolic See; that, by a unanimous authoritative decision of all, we may have the course which ought to be followed in these cases determined and established.

One thing I say deliberately as an unquestionable truth, that if any believer has been wrongfully excommunicated, the sentence will do harm rather to him who pronounces it than to him who suffers this wrong. For it is by the Holy Spirit dwelling in holy persons that any one is loosed or bound, and He inflicts unmerited punishment upon no one; for by Him the love which worketh not evil is shed abroad in our hearts.^] LETTER CCLIV.

TO BENENATUS, MY MOST BLESSED LORD, MY ESTEEMED AND AMIABLE BROTHER AND PARTNER IN THE PRIESTLY OFFICE, AND TO THE BRETHREN WHO ARE WITH HIM, AUGUSTINE AND THE BRETHREN WHO ARE WITH HIM SEND GREETING IN THE LORD.

The maiden^ about whom your Holiness wrote to me is at present disposed to think, that if she were of full age she would refuse every proposal of marriage. She is, however, so young, that even if she were disposed to marriage, she ought not yet to be either given or betrothed to any one. Besides this, my lord Benenatus, brother revered and beloved, it must be remembered that God takes her under guardianship in His Church with the design of protecting her against wicked men; placing her, therefore, under my care not so as that she can be given by me to whomsoever I might choose, but so as that she cannot be taken away against my will by any person who would be an unsuitable partner. The proposal which you have been pleased to mention is one which, if she were disposed and prepared to marry, would not displease me; but whether she will marry any one, â€” although for my own part, I would much prefer that she carried out what she now talks of, â€” I do not in the meantime know, for she is at an age in which her declaration that she wishes to be a nun is to be received rather as the flippant utterance of one talking heedlessly, than as the deliberate promise of one making a solemn vow. Moreover, she has an aunt by the mother's side married to our honourable brother Felix, with whom I have conferred in regard to this matter, â€” for I neither could, nor indeed should have avoided consulting him, â€” and he has not been reluctant to entertain the proposal, but has, on the contrary, expressed his satisfaction; but he expressed not unreasonably his regret that nothing had been written to him on the subject, although his relationship entitled him to be apprised of it. For, perhaps, the mother of the maiden will also come forward, though in the meantime she does not make had requested Augustine to bring up as a ward of the Church. Four letters written by him concerning her have been preserved, viz. the 252d, in which he intimates to Felix that he can decide nothing in regard to her without consulting the friend by whom she had been placed under his guardianship; the 253d, expressing to Benenatus his surprise that he should propose for her a marriage which would not strengthen the Church; the 254th, addressed also to Benenatus, which we have translated as a specimen of the series; and the 255th, in which, writing to Rusticus, a Pagan who had sought her hand for his son, Augustine bluntly denies his request, referring him for the grounds of the refusal to his correspondence with Benenatus.

Two Catholic bishops named Benenatus attended the conference with the Donatists at Carthage in 412; the one who belonged to Hospsti, in Numidia, is supposed to be Augustine's correspondent.

herself known, and to a mother's wishes in regard to the giving away of a daughter, nature gives in my opinion the precedence above all others, unless the maiden herself be already old enough to have legitimately a stronger claim to choose for herself what she pleases. I wish your Honour also to understand, that if the final and entire authority in the matter of her marriage were committed to me, and she herself, being of age and willing to marry, were to entrust herself to me under God as my Judge to give her to whomsoever I thought best, â€” I declare, and I declare the truth, in saying that the proposal which you mention pleases me meanwhile, but because of God being my Judge I cannot pledge myself to reject on her behalf a better offer if it were made; but whether any such proposal shall at any future time be made is wholly uncertain. Your Holiness perceives, therefore, how many important considerations concur to make it impossible for her to be, in the meantime, definitely promised to any one.
LETTEE CCLXIII.

TO THE EMINENTLY EELIGIOUS LADY AND HOLY DAUGHTER SAPID A, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

1. The gift prepared by the just and pious industry of your own hands, and kindly presented by you to me, I have accepted, lest I should increase the grief of one who needs, as I perceive, much rather to be comforted by me; especially because you expressed yourseK as esteeming it no small consolation to you if I would w^ear this tunic, which you had made for that holy servant of God your brother, since he, having departed from the land of the dying, is raised above the need of the things which perish in the using. I have, therefore, complied with your desire, and whatever be the kind and degree of consolation which you may feel this to yield, I have not refused it to your affection for your brother.-^

' The hesitation which Augustine here indicates in regard to accepting this gift may be understood from the following sentences of one of his sermons: â€”
" Let no one give me a present of clothing, whether linen, or tunic, or any other

â€¢â€»

LET. CCLXIII.] TO SAPID A. 40 1

The tunic which you sent I have accordingly accepted, and have already begun to wear it before writing this to you. Be therefore of good cheer; but apply yourself, I beseech you, to far better and far greater consolations, in order that the cloud which, through human weakness, gathers darkness closely round your heart, may be dissipated by the words of divine authority; and, at all times, so live that you may live with your brother, since he has so died that he lives still.

2. It is indeed a cause for tears that your brother, who loved you, and who honoured you especially for your pious life, and your profession as a consecrated virgin, is no more before youi’ eyes, as hitherto, going in and out in the assiduous discharge of his ecclesiastical duties as a deacon of the church of Carthage, and that you shall no more hear from his lips the honourable testimony which, with kindly, pious, and becoming affection, he was wont to render to the holiness of a sister so dear to him. When these things are pondered, and are regretfully desired ^ with all the vehemence of long-cherished
article of dress, except as a gift to be used in common by my brethren and myself. I will accept nothing for myself which is not to be of service to our community, because I do not wish to have anything which does not equally belong to all the rest. Wherefore I request you, my brethren, to offer me no gift of apparel which may not be worn by the others as suitably as by me. A gift of costly raiment, for example, may sometimes be presented to me as becoming apparel for a bishop to wear; but it is not becoming for Augustine, who is poor, and who is the son of poor parents. Would you have men say that in the Church I found means to obtain richer clothing than I could have had in my father's house, or in the pursuit of secular employment? That would be a shame to me! The clothing worn by me must be such that I can give it to my brethren if they require it. I do not wish anything which would not be suitable for a presbyter, a deacon, or a sub-deacon, for I receive everything in common with them. If gifts of more costly apparel be given to me, I shall sell them, as has been my custom hitherto, in order that, if the dress be not available for all, the money realized by the sale may be a common benefit. I sell them accordingly, and distribute their price among the poor. Wherefore, if any wish me to wear articles of clothing presented to me as gifts, let them give such clothing as shall not make me blush when I use it. For I assure you that a costly dress makes me blush, because it is not in harmony with my profession, or with such exhortations as I now give to you, and ill becomes one whose frame is bent, and whose locks are whitened, as you see, by age. " â€” Sermon 356, Bened. edition, vol. V. col. 1389, quoted by Tillemont, xiii. p. 222.

For requiritur the Benedictine editors suggest recurrit, as a conjectural emendation of the text. We propose, and adopt in the translation, a simpler and perhaps more probable alteration, and read requiruntur.

affection, the heart is pierced, and, like blood from the pierced heart, tears flow apace. But let your heart rise heavenward, and your eyes will cease to weep. The things over the loss of which you mourn have indeed passed away, for they were in their nature temporary, but their loss does not involve the annihilation of that love with which Timotheus loved [his sister] Sapida, and loves her still: it abides in its own treasury, and is hidden with Christ in God. Does the miser lose his gold when he stores it in a secret place? Does he not then become, so far as lies in his power, more confidently assured that the gold is in his possession when he keeps it in some safer hiding-place, where it is hidden even from his eyes? Earthly covetousness believes that it has found a safer guardianship for its loved treasures when it no longer sees them; and shall heavenly love sorrow as if it had lost for ever that which it has only sent before it to the garner of the upper world?

Sapida, give yourself wholly to your high calling, and set your affections on things above, where, at the right hand of God, Christ sitteth, who condescended for us to die, that we, though we were dead, might live, and to secure that no man should fear death as if it were destined to destroy him, and that no one of those for whom the Life died should after death be mourned for as if he had lost life. Take to yourself these and other similar divine consolations, before which human sorrow may blush and flee away.

3. There is nothing in the sorrow of mortals over their dearly beloved dead which merits displeasure; but the sorrow of believers ought not to be prolonged. If, therefore, you have been grieved till now, let this grief suffice, and sorrow not as do the heathen, " who have no hope." ^ For when the Apostle I^aul said this, he did not prohibit sorrow altogether, but only such sorrow as the heathen manifest who have no hope. For even Martha and Mary, pious sisters, and believers, wept for their brother Lazarus, of whom they knew that he would rise again, though they knew not that he was at that time to be restored to life; and the Lord Himself wept for that same Lazarus, whom He was going to bring back from death; ^ wherein doubtless He by His example permitted, though He did not by any precept enjoin, the shedding of tears over the graves even of those regarding whom we believe that they shall rise ao^ain to the true life. Nor is it without good reason that Scripture saith in the book of Ecclesiasticus:

' Sursum sit cor et sicci erunt ociili.

LET. CCLXIII.] TO SAPIDA. 463

" Let tears fall down over the dead, and begin to lament as if thou hadst suffered great harm thyseK;" but adds, a little further on, this counsel, "and then comfort thyself for thy heaviness. For of heaviness cometh death, and the heaviness of the heart breaketh strength." ^

4: Your brother, my daughter, is alive as to the soul, is asleep as to the body: " Shall not he who sleeps also rise again from sleep ? " ^ God, who has already received his spirit, shall again give back to him his body, which He did not take away to annihilate, but only took aside to restore. There is therefore no reason for protracted sorrow, since there is a much stronger reason for everlasting joy. For even the mortal part of your brother, which has been buried in the earth, shall not be for ever lost to you; â€” that part in which he was visibly present with you, through which also he addressed you and conversed with you, by which he spoke with a voice not less thoroughly known to your ear than was his countenance when presented to your eyes, so that, wherever the sound of his voice was heard, even though he was not seen, he used to be at once recognised by you. These things are indeed withdrawn so as to be no longer perceived by the senses of the living, that the absence of the dead may make surviving friends mourn for them. But seeing that even the bodies of the dead shall not perish (as not even a hair of the head shall perish),* but shall, after being laid aside for a time, be received again never more to be laid aside, but fixed finally in the higher condition of existence into which they shall have been changed, certainly there is more cause for thankfulness in the sure hope of an immeasurable eternity, than for sorrow in the transient experience of a very short span of time. This hope the heathen do not possess, because they know not the Scriptures nor the power of God,^ who is able to restore what was lost, to quicken what was dead, to renew what has been subjected to corruption, to re-unite things which have been severed from each other, and to preserve thenceforward for evermore what was originally corruptible and shortlived. These things He has promised, who has, by the fulfilment of other promises, given our faith good ground to believe that these also shall be fulfilled. Let your faith often discourse now to you on these things, because your hope shall not be disappointed, though your love may be now for a season interrupted in its exercise; ponder these things; in them find more solid and abundant consolation. For if the fact that I now wear (because he could not) the garment which you had woven for your brother yields some comfort to you, how much more full and satisfactory the comfort which you should find in considering that he for whom this was prepared, and who then did not require an imperishable garment, shall be clothed with incorruption and immortality !

TO NOBILIUS, MY MOST BLESSED AND VENERABLE BROTHER AND PARTNER IN THE PRIESTLY OFFICE, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING.

So important is the solemnity at which your brotherly affection invites me to be present, that my heart's desire would carry my poor body to you, were it not that infirmity renders this impossible. I might have come if it had not been winter; I might have braved the winter if I had been young: for in the latter case the warmth of youth would have borne uncomplainingly the cold of the season; in the former case the warmth of summer would have met with gentleness the chill languor of old age. For the present, my lord most blessed, my holy and venerable partner in the priestly office, I cannot undertake in winter so long a journey, carrying with me as I must the frigid feebleness of very many years. I reciprocate the salutation due to your worth, on behalf of my own welfare I ask an interest in your prayers, and I myself beseech the Lord God to grant that the prosperity of peace may follow the dedication of so great an edifice to His sacred service.

' This letter, probably one of the latest from the pen of Augustine, is the last of his letters in the Benedictine edition; the only remaining one, the 270th, was not written by Augustine, but addressed to him by an unknown correspondent.

ON THE BOOK OF PSALMS,

WITH A NEW TRANSLATION.

By JAMES G. MUEPHY, LL.D, T.C.D.,

AUTHOR OF COMMEaJTARIES ON THE BOOKS OF GENESIS, EXODUS, ETC.

' Every Bible Student will look upon this volume with interest, and should give warm thanks to the learned author for the care and erudition which have been bestowed upon it. . . The introductory chapters are very valuable, referring both to the nature of the Psalms, their themes, their authors, and their arrangements. The exegesis is admirable, and the spirit is devout.' â€” Methodist Recorder.

GOSPEL OF ST. LUKE.

By F. GODET,

DOCTOR AND PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY, NEUCHATEL.

'We are indebted to the publishers for an English translation of the admirable work which stands at the head of this review. ... It is a work of great ability, learning, and research.' â€” Christian Observer.

'The whole book is very valuable, and is the work of a critic, scholar, and divine of no ordinary attainments, who has devoted to it wonderful conscientiousness and diligent care.' â€” Union Review.

'This is one of the most important and valuable works yet issued in the Foreign Theological Library. Eich in learning, scientific in method, profound and luminous in thought, it IS a masterpiece of exposition, critical and spiritual, worthy to be placed side by side with the author's great "Commentary on St. John's Gos^eVâ€” Dickinson's Theological Quarterly.

Applied to illustrate and Explain the Doctrines of Original Sin, the New Birth, the Disembodied State, and the Spiritual Body.

By Rev. J. B. HEARD, M.A.

With an Appendix on the Fatherhood of God.

"The author has got a striking and consistent theory. Whether agreeing or disagreeing with that theory, it is a book which any student of the Bible may read with pleasure." — Guardian,

"A valuable and interesting treatise on the "Tripartite Nature of Man," the first English theological work of any pretensions which has dealt with the subject in a methodical and systematic manner." — Dean of Norwich.

"It is with considerable satisfaction we note the issue of a fourth edition of this most original and valuable treatise, which, without exaggeration, may be described as one of the ablest contributions to our theological literature which has been published of late years." — English Independent.

VOICES OF THE PROPHETS.

Twelve Lectures Preached in the Chapel of Lincoln's Inn, in the Years 1870-74, on the Foundation of Bishop Warburton.
By EDWARD HAMILTON GIFFORD, D.D.

' The author has long ago attained high position as a scholar, a man of science, and Â«. theologian, and in the volume before us he offers his readers some of the best fruits of these varied accomplishments.' â€” Standard.

' We have not for many years met with a book dealing with the important question of prophecy in all respects so satisfactory, so reverent in its treatment of the written word, so fair in argument, so courteous and dignified withal in its replies to the objections of "science falsely so called." ' â€” Daily Review.

' This volume deals with the subject of prophecy in a clear and forcible manner. The objections to a belief in prophetic utterances are ably met, and much light is thrown upon the matter, which has here been dealt with in a scholarly and Christian spirit.' â€” Rock.

WORKS BY THE REV. ADOLPH SAPHIR, B.A.

From Notice by Professor Delitzscii, m ' Saah-auf Hoffnung.'

' "We have long felt it our duty to direct our German readers to the instructive, original, and spirited (geistvolleu) writings of Adolph Saphir, which we place among the most valuable English productions in practical theological literature. . . . The author has become English, not without retaining the peculiarity of German theology, while his love to the Jewish nation gives to his writings a historical rather than a dogmatic character. Throughout he draws out of the Scripture, which stands before his mind in grand connected outlines as a complete organism. All his writings, instead of moving in worn-out grooves of thought, proceed from a direct and loving communion with God's word and deeds; everywhere we meet with surprisingly deep views of the ways of God and of the failures of the Church, while illustrations from literature and history are made subsidiary.' . . .

1. "FIl HE Thirteen Books of my Confessions, whether they refer to my evil or good, praise the just and good God, and stimulate the heart and mind of man to approach unto Him. And, as far as pertaineth unto me, they wrought this in me when they were written, and this they work when they are read. What some think of them they may have seen, but that they have given much pleasure, and do give pleasure, to many brethren I know. From the First to the Tenth they have been written of myself; in the remaining three, of the Sacred Scriptures, from the text, 'In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth,' even to the rest of the Sabbath (Gen. i. 1, ii. 2)."

2. "In the Fourth Book, when I acknowledged the distress of my mind at the death of a friend, saying, that our soul, though one, had been in some manner made out of two; and therefore, I say, perchance was I afraid to die lest he should die wholly whom I had so much loved (chap, vi.); this seems to me as if it were a light declamation rather than a grave confession, although this folly may in some sort be tempered by that 'perchance' which follows. And in the Thirteenth Book (chap, xxxii.) what I said, viz. that the 'firmament was made between the spiritual upper waters, and the corporeal lower waters,' was said without due consideration; but the thing is very obscure."
TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

IF St. Augustine," says Nourrisson, 1 "had left nothing but his Confessions and the City of God, one could readily understand the respectful sympathy that surrounds his memory. How, indeed, could one fail to admire in the City of God the flight of genius, and in the Confessions, what is better still, the effusions of a great soul ? " It may be safely predicted, that while the mind of man yearns for knowledge, and his heart seeks rest, the Confessions will retain that foremost place in the world's literature which it has secured by its sublime outpourings of devotion and profound philosophical spirit. There is in the book a wonderful combination of childlike piety and intellectual power. Desjardins' idea,* that, while in Augustine's other works we see the philosopher or the controversialist, here we see the man, is only to be accepted as a comparative statement of Augustine's attitude in the Confessions; for philosophy and piety are in many of his reflections as it were molten into one homogeneous whole. In his highest intellectual flights we find the breathings of faith and love, and, amid the profoundest expressions of penitential sorrow, gleams of his metaphysical genius appear.

It may, indeed, be from the man's showing himself so little, as distinguished from the philosopher, that some readers are a little disappointed in the book. They have expected to meet with a copiousness of biographic details, and have found, com-mingled with such as are given, long disquisitions on Manichæanism, Time, Creation, and Memory. To avoid such disappointment we must ascertain the author's design. The book is emphatically not an autobiography. There is in it an outline of the author's life up to his mother's death; but only so much of detail is given as may subserve his main purpose. That purpose is clearly explained in the fourth section of his Tenth Book. It was that the impenitent on reading it might not say, " I cannot," and " sleep in despair," but rather that, looking to that God who had raised the writer from his low estate of pride and sin to be a pillar of the Church, he might take courage, and " awake in the sweetness of His grace, by which he that is weak is made strong; " and that those no longer in sin might rejoice and praise God as they heard of the past lusts of him who was now freed from them. 1 This, his design of encouraging penitence and stimulating praise, is referred to in his Retractations?

and in his Letter to Darius?
These two main ideas are embodied in the very meaning of the title of the book, the word confession having, as Augustine constantly urges, two meanings. In his exposition of the Psalms we read: "Confession is understood in two senses, of our sins, and of God's praise. Confession of our sins is well known, so well known to all the people, that whenever they hear the name of confession in the lessons, whether it is said in praise or of sin, they beat their breasts." 4 Again: *Confession of sin all know, but confession of praise few attend to." 5 "The former but showeth the wound to the physician, the latter giveth thanks for health." 6 He would therefore have his hearers make the sacrifice of praise their ideal, since, in the

City of God, even in the New Jerusalem, there will be no longer confession of sin, but there will be confession of praise. 1 It is not surprising, that with this view of confession he should hinge on the incidents of his life such considerations as tend to elevate the mind and heart of the reader. When, for example, he speaks of his youthful sins, 2 he diverges into a disquisition on the motives to sin; when his friend dies, 3 he moralizes on death; and to give one example of a reverse process his profound psychological review of memory 4 recalls his former sin (which at times haunts him in his dreams), and leads up to devout reflections on God's power to cleanse from sin. This undertone of penitence and praise which pervades the Confessions in all its episodes, like the golden threads which run through the texture of an Eastern garment, presents one of its peculiar charms.

It would not be right to overlook a charge that has been brought against the book by Lord Byron. He says, "Augustine in his fine Confessions makes the reader envy his transgressions." Nothing could be more reckless or further from the truth than this charge. There is here no dwelling on his sin, or painting it so as to satisfy a prurient imagination. As we have already remarked, Augustine's manner is not to go into detail further than to find a position from which to "edify" the reader, and he treats this episode in his life with his characteristic delicacy and reticence. His sin was dead; and he had carried it to its burial with tears of repentance. And when, ten years after his baptism, he sets himself, at the request of some,
to a consideration of what he then was at the moment of making his confessions, he refers hardly at all to this sin of his youth; and such allusions as he does make are of the most casual kind. Instead of enlarging upon it, he treats it as past, and only speaks of temptation and sin as they are common to all men. Many of the French writers on the Confessions 1 institute a comparison in this matter between the confessions of Augustine and those of Rousseau. Pressense draws attention to the delicacy and reserve which characterise the one, and the arrogant defiance of God and man manifested in the other. The confessions of the one he speaks of as " un grand acte de repentir et d'amour," and eloquently says, " In it he seems, like the Magdalen, to have spread his box of perfumes at the foot of the Saviour; from his stricken heart there exhales the incense most agreeable to God the homage of true penitence." The other he truly describes as uttering " a cry of triumph in the very midst of his sin, and robing his shame in a royal purple." Well may Desjardins 3 express surprise at a book of such foulness coming from a genius so great; and perhaps his solution of the enigma is not far from the truth, when he attributes it to an overweening vanity and egotism. 4

It is right to point out, in connection with this part of our subject, that in regard to some at least of Augustine's self-accusations, 5 there may be a little of that pious exaggeration of his sinfulness which, as Lord Macaulay points out in his essays on Bunyan, 6 frequently characterises deep penitence. But however this may be, justice requires us to remember, in considering his transgression, that from his very childhood he had been surrounded by a condition of civilisation presenting manifold temptations. Carthage, where he spent a large part of his life, had become, since its restoration and colonization under Augustus Ctesar, an " exceeding great city," in wealth and importance next to Rome. 1 "African Paganism," says Pressense, 2 " was half Asiatic; the ancient worship of nature, the adoration of Astarte, had full licence in the city of Carthage; Dido had become a mythological being, whom this dissolute city had made its protecting divinity, and it is easy to recognise in her the great goddess of Phoenicia under a new name." The luxury of the period is described by Jerome and Tertullian, when they denounce the custom of painting the face and tiring the head, and the prodigality that would give 25,000 golden crowns for a veil, immense revenues for a pair of ear-rings, and the value of a forest or an island for a head-dress. 3 And Jerome, in one of his epistles, gives an illustration of the Church's relation to the Pagan world at that time, when he represents an old priest of Jupiter with his grand-daughter, a catechumen, on his knee, who responds to his caresses by singing canticles. 4 It was a time when we can imagine one of Augustine's parents going to the Colosseum, and enjoying the lasciviousness of its displays, and its gladiatorial shows, with their contempt of human life; while the other carefully shunned such scenes, as being under the ban of the teachers of the Church. 5 It was an age in which there was action and reaction between religion and philosophy; but in which the power of Christianity was so great in its influences on Paganism, that some received the Christian Scriptures only to embody in their phraseology the ideas of heathenism. Of this last point Manichseanism presents an illustration. Now all these influences left their mark on Augustine. In his youth he plunged deep into the pleasures of his day; and we know how he endeavoured to find in Manichasism a solution of those speculations which haunted his subtle and inquiring mind. Augustine at this time, then, is not to be taken as a type of what Christianity produced. He is to a great extent the outgrowth of the Pagan influences of the time. Considerations such as these may enable us to judge of his early sin more justly than if we measured it by our own privileges and opportunities.

The style of Augustine is sometimes criticised as not having the refinement of Virgil, Horace, or Cicero. But it should be remembered that he wrote in a time of national decay; and further, as Desjardins has remarked in the introduction to his essay, he had no time "to cut his phrases." From the period of his conversion to that of his death, he was constantly engaged in controversy with this or that heresy; and if he did not write with classical accuracy, he so inspired the language with his genius, and moulded it by his fire, that it appears almost to pulsate with the throbings of his brain. He seems likewise to have despised mere elegance, for in his Confessions? when speaking of the style of Faustus, he says, "What profit to me was the elegance of my cup-bearer, since he offered me not the more precious draught for which I thirsted?"

In this connection the remarks of Collinges 3 are worthy of note. He says, when anticipating objections that might be made to his own style: "It was the last of my study; my opinion always was what Augustine calls diligens negligentia was the best diligence as to that; while I was yet a very young man I had learned out of him that it was no solecism in a preacher to use ossum for os, for (saith he) an iron key is better than one made of gold if it will better open the door, for that is all the use of the key. I had learned out of Hierom that a gaudry of phrases and words in a pulpit is but signum insipiente.

The words of a preacher, saith he, ought pungcre non pal/pare, to prick the heart, not to smooth and coax. The work of an orator is too precarious for a minister of the gospel. Gregory observed that our Saviour had not styled us the sugar but the salt of the earth, and Augustine observeth, that though Cyprian in one epistle showed much of a florid orator, to show he could do it, yet he never would do so any more, to show he would not."

There are several features in the Confessions deserving of remark, as being of special interest to the philosopher, the historian, or the divine.
1. Chiefest amongst these is the intense desire for knowledge and the love of truth which characterised Augustine.

This was noticeable before his conversion in his hungering after such knowledge as Manichesianism and the philosophy of the time could afford. 1 It is none the less observable in that better time, when, in his quiet retreat at Cassiciacum, he sought to strengthen the foundations of his faith, and resolved to give himself up to the acquisition of divine knowledge. 2 It was seen, too, in the many conflicts in which he was engaged with Donatists, Manichseans, Arians, and Pelagians, and in his earnest study of the deep things of God. This love of knowledge is perhaps conveyed in the beautiful legend quoted by Nourrisson, 3 of the monk wrapped in spirit, who expressed astonishment at not seeing Augustine among the elect in heaven. "He is higher up," he was answered, "he is standing before the Holy Trinity disputing thereon for all eternity."

While from the time of his conversion we find him holding on to the fundamental doctrines of the faith with the tenacity of one who had experienced the hollowness of the teachings of philosophy, 1 this passion for truth led him to handle most freely subjects of speculation in things non-essential. 2 But whether viewed as a controversialist, a student of Scripture, or a bishop of the Church of God, he ever manifests those qualities of mind and heart that gained for him not only the affection of the Church, but the esteem of his unorthodox opponents. To quote Guizot's discriminating words, there was in him "ce melange de passion et de douceur, d'autorite et d'emotion, d'emotion d'esprit et de rigueur logique, qui lui donnait un si rare pouvoir." 3

2. It is to this eager desire for truth in his many-sided mind that we owe those trains of thought that read like forecasts of modern opinion. We have called attention to some such anticipations of modern thought as they recur in the notes throughout the book; but the speculations on Memory, Time, and Creation, which occupy so large a space in Books Ten and Eleven, deserve more particular notice. The French essayists have entered very fully into these questions. M. Saisset, in his admirable introduction to the Be Civitate Dei* reviews Augustine's theories as to the mysterious problems connected with the idea of Creation. He says, that in his subtle analysis of Time, and in his attempt at reconciling "the eternity of creative action with the dependence of things created, ... he has touched with a bold and delicate hand one of the deepest mysteries of the human mind, and that to all his glorious titles he has added another, that of an ingenious psychologist and an eminent metaphysician.* Desjardins likewise commends the depth of Augustine's speculations as to Time, 5 and maintains that no one's teaching as to Creation has shown more clearness, boldness, and vigour, avoiding the perils of dualism on the one hand, and atheism on the other. 1

In his remarks on Augustine's disquisitions on the phenomena of Memory, his praise is of a more qualified character. He compares his theories with those of Malebranche, and, while recognising the practical and animated character of his descriptions, thinks him obscure in his delineation of the manner in which absent realities reproduce themselves on the memory. 2

We have had occasion in the notes to refer to the Unseen Universe. The authors of this powerful " Apologia " for Christianity propose it chiefly as an antidote to the materialistic disbelief in the immortality of the soul amongst scientific men, which has resulted in this age from the recent advance in physical science; just as in the last century English deism had its rise in a similar influence. It is curious, in connection with this part of our subject, to note that in leading up to the conclusion at which he arrives, M. Saisset quotes a passage from the City of God, 3 which contains an adumbration of the theory of the above work in regard to the eternity of the invisible universe. 4 Verily, the saying of the wise man is true: " The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done, is that which shall be done:

and there is no new thing under the sun." 6

3. We have already, in a previous paragraph, briefly adverted to the influence Christianity and Paganism had one on the

2 Ibid. pp. 120-123. Nourrisson's criticism of Augustine's views on Memory may well be compared with that of Desjardins. He speaks of the powerful originality of Augustine, who is ingenious as well as new, and says some of his disquisitions are "the most admirable which have inspired psychological observation." And further, "One does not meet in all the books of St. Augustine any philosophical theories which have greater depth than that on Memory." Philoso phie, etc. as above, i. 133.

other. The history of Christianity has been a steady advance on Paganism and Pagan philosophy; but it can hardly be denied that in this advance there has been an absorption and in some periods in no small degree of some of their elements. As these matters have been examined in the notes, we need not do more than refer the reader to the Index of Subjects for the evidence to be obtained in this respect from the Confessions on such matters as Baptism, False Miracles, and Prayers for the Dead.

4. There is one feature in the Confessions which we should not like to pass unnoticed. A reference to the Retractations* will show that Augustine highly appreciated the spiritual use to which the book might be put in the edification of the brethren. We believe that it will prove most useful in this way; and spiritual benefit will accrue in proportion to the steadiness of its use. We would venture to suggest that Book X., from section 37 to the end, may be profitably used as a manual of self-examination. We have pointed out in a note, that in his comment on the 8th Psalm he makes our Lord's three temptations to be types of all the temptations to which man can be subjected; and makes them correspond in their order, as given by St. Matthew, to "the Lust of the Flesh, the Lust of the Eyes, and the Pride of Life," mentioned by St. John. 2 Under each of these heads we have, in this part of the Confessions, a most severe examination of conscience; and the impression is deepened by his allegorically likening the three divisions of temptation to the beasts of the field, the fish of the sea, and the birds of the air. 3 We have already remarked, in adverting to allegorical interpretation, 4 that where "the strict use of the history is not disregarded," to use Augustine's expression, allegorizing, by way of spiritual meditation, may be profitable. Those who employ it with this idea will find their interpretations greatly aided, and made more systematic, by realizing Augustine's methods here and in the last two books of the Confessions, as when he makes the sea to represent the wicked world, and the fruitful earth the Church. 1

It only remains to call attention to the principles on which this translation and its annotations have been made. The text of the Benedictine edition has been followed; but the head-lines of the chapters are taken from the edition of Bruder, as being the more definite and full. After carefully translating the whole of the book, it has been compared, line by line, with the translation of Watts 8 (one of the most nervous translations of the seventeenth century), and that of Dr. Pusey, which is confessedly founded upon that of Watts. Reference has also been made, in the case of obscure passages, to the French translation of Du Bois, and the English translation of the first Ten Books alluded to in the note on p. 233. The references to Scripture are in the words of the Authorized Version wherever the sense will bear it; and whenever noteworthy variations from our version occur, they are indicated by references to the old Italic version, or to the Vulgate. In some cases, where Augustine has clearly referred to the LXX. in order to amend his version thereby, such variations are indicated. 3 The annotations are, for the most part, such as have been derived from the translator's own reading. Two exceptions, however, must be made. Out of upwards of four hundred notes, some forty are taken from the annotations in Pusey and Watts, but in every case these have been indicated by the initials E. B. P. or W. W. Dr. Pusey's annotations (which will be found chiefly in the earlier part of this work) consist almost entirely of quotations from other works of Augustine. These annotations are very copious, and Dr.

Pusey explains that he resorted to this method "partly because this plan of illustrating St.
Augustine out of himself had been already adopted by M. Du Bois in his Latin edition . . .
and it seemed a pity not to use valuable materials ready collected to one's hand. The far greater part of these illustrations are taken from that edition." It seemed the most proper course, in using such notes of Du Bois as appeared suitable for this edition, to take them from Dr. Pusey's edition, and, as above stated, to indicate their source by his initials. A Textual Index has been added, for the first time, to this edition, and both it and the Index of Subjects have been prepared with the greatest possible care.

Chapter xv. Whatever is, owes its being to God 161

Chapter xvi. Evil arises not from a substance, but from the perversion of the will, 162

Chapter xvii. Above his changeable mind, he discovers the unchangeable Author of Truth, 162

Chapter xviii. Jesus Christ, the Mediator, is the only way of safety, . 165

Chapter xix. He does not yet fully understand the saying of John, "That the Word was made flesh," 166

Chapter xx. He rejoices that he proceeded from Plato to the Holy Scriptures, and not the reverse, 169
Chapter xxi. What he found in the sacred books which are not to be found in Plato, 170

BOOK EIGHTH.

he finally describes the thirty-second year of his age, the most memorable OP HIS WHOLE LIFE, IN WHICH, BEING INSTRUCTED BY SIMPLICIANUS CONCERNING THE CONVERSION OF OTHERS, AND THE MANNER OF ACTING, HE IS, AFTER A SEVERE STRUGGLE, RENEWED IN HIS WHOLE MIND, AND IS CONVERTED UNTO GOD.

Chapter i. He, now given to divine things, and yet entangled by the lusts of love, consults Simplicianus in reference to the renewing of his mind, 174

Chapter ii. The pious old man rejoices that he read Plato and the Scriptures, and tells him of the rhetorician Victorinus having been converted to the faith through the reading of the sacred books, . . .176

Chapter iii. That God and the angels rejoice more on the return of one sinner than of many just persons, 182

Chapter iv. He shows by the example of Victorinus that there is more joy in the conversion of nobles, 183

Chapter v. Of the causes which alienate us from God, . . . .185

Chapter vi. Pontitianus' account of Antony, the founder of Monachism, and of some who imitated him, 189

Chapter vii. He deplores his wretchedness, that having been born thirtytwo years, he had not yet found the truth, 193

Chapter viii. The conversation with Alypius being ended, he retires to the garden, whither his friend follows him, ...... 196

Chapter ix. That the mind commandeth the mind, but it willeth not entirely, 197
Chapter x. He refutes the opinion of the Manichseans as to two kinds of minds, one good and the other evil, 198

Chapter xi. In what manner the Spirit struggled with the flesh, that it might be freed from the bondage of vanity, 200

THE THIRTEEN BOOKS

OF THE

CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUR. AUGUSTINE,

BISHOP OF HIPPO

BOOK FIRST.

COMMENCING WITH THE INVOCATION OF GOD, AUGUSTINE RELATES IN DETAIL
THE BEGINNING OF HIS LIFE, HIS INFANCY AND BOYHOOD, UP TO HIS FIFTEENTH YEAR; AT WHICH AGE HE ACKNOWLEDGES THAT HE WAS MORE INCLINED TO ALL YOUTHFUL PLEASURES AND VICES THAN TO THE STUDY OF LETTERS.

Chap. i. He proclaims the greatness of God, whom he desires to seek and invoke, being awakened by Him.

1. RE AT art Thou, O Lord, and greatly to be praised;
JTT great is Thy power, and of Thy wisdom there is no end. 1 And man, being a part of Thy creation, desires to praise Thee, man, who bears about with him his mortality, the witness of his sin, even the witness that Thou "resistest the proud," 2 yet man, this part of Thy creation, desires to praise Thee. 3 Thou movest us to delight in praising Thee; for Thou hast formed us for Thyself, and our hearts are restless till they find rest in Thee. 4 Lord, teach me to know and understand

1 Ps. cxlv. 3, and cxlvi. 5. 2 Jas. iv. 6, and 1 Pet. v. 5.

3 Augustine begins with praise, and the whole book vibrates with praise. He says elsewhere (in Ps. cxxix.), that "as a new song fits not well an old man's lips, he should sing a new song who is a new creature and is living a new life; " and so from the time of his new birth, the "new song" of praise went up from him, and that "not of the lip only," but (ibid, cxlviii.) conscientia lingua vita.

* And the rest which the Christian has here is but an earnest of the more perfect rest hereafter, when, as Augustine says (De Gen. ad Lit. xii. 26), "all virtue will be to love what one sees, and the highest felicity to have what one loves."

CON. A

2 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK I.]

which of these should be first, to call on Thee, or to praise Thee; and likewise to know Thee, or to call upon Thee.

But who is there that calls upon Thee without knowing Thee?

For he that knows Thee not may call upon Thee as other than Thou art. Or perhaps we call on Thee that we may know Thee. " But how shall they call on Him in whom they have not believed? or how shall they believe without a preacher?"

And those who seek the Lord shall praise Him. 2 For those who seek shall find Him, 3 and those who find Him shall praise Him. Let me seek Thee, Lord, in calling on Thee, and call on Thee in believing in Thee; for Thou hast been preached unto us. O Lord, my faith calls on Thee, that faith which Thou hast imparted to me, which Thou hast breathed into me through the incarnation of Thy Son, through the ministry of Thy preacher. 4

Chap. ii. That the God whom we invoke is in us, and we in Him.

2. And how shall I call upon my God my God and my Lord? For when I call on Him I ask Him to come into me.

And what place is there in me into which my God can come into which God can come, even He who made heaven and earth? Is there anything in me, Lord my God, that can contain Thee? Do indeed the very heaven and the earth, which Thou hast made, and in which Thou hast made me, contain Thee? Or, as nothing could exist without Thee, doth whatever exists contain Thee? Why, then, do I ask Thee to come into me, since I indeed exist, and could not exist if Thou wert not in me? Because I am not yet in hell, though Thou art even there; for "if I go down into hell Thou art there." 5 I could not therefore exist, could not exist at all, my God, unless Thou wert in me. Or should I not rather

4 That is, Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, who was instrumental in his conversion (vi. sec. 1; viii. sec. 2S, etc.). "Before conversion," as Leighton observes on 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2, "wit or eloquence may draw a man to the word, and possibly prove a happy bait to catch him (as St. Augustine reports of his hearing St. Ambrose), but, once born again, then it is the milk itself that he desires for itself."

5 Ps. exxxix. 8.

CHAP. IV.] GOD FILLETH ALL THINGS. 3

say, that I could not exist unless I were in Thee from whom are all things, by whom are all things, in whom are all things?'

Even so, Lord; even so. Where do I call Thee to, since Thou art in me, or whence canst Thou come into me? For where outside heaven and earth can I go that from thence my God may come into me who has said, "I fill heaven and earth"? 2

Chap. hi. Everywhere God wholly filkth all things, but neither heaven nor earth containeth Him.

3. Since, then, Thou fillest heaven and earth, do they contain Thee? Or, as they contain Thee not, dost Thou fill them, and yet there remains something over? And where dost Thou pour forth that which remaineth of Thee when the heaven and earth are filled? Or, indeed, is there no need that Thou who containest all things shouldest be contained of any, since those things which Thou fillest Thou fillest by containing them? For the vessels which Thou fillest do not sustain Thee, since should they even be broken Thou wilt not be poured forth. And when Thou art poured forth on us, 8 Thou art not cast down, but we are uplifted; nor art Thou dissipated, but we are drawn together. But, as Thou fillest all things, dost Thou fill them with Thy whole self, or, as even all things cannot altogether contain Thee, do they contain a part, and do all at once contain the same part? Or has each its own proper part the greater more, the smaller less? Is, then, one part of Thee greater, another less? Or is it that Thou art wholly everywhere whilst nothing altogether contains Thee?*

Chap. iv. The majesty of God is supreme, and His virtues inexplicable.

4. What, then, art Thou, my God what, I ask, but the Lord God? For who is Lord but the Lord? or who is God save our God? 6 Most high, most excellent, most potent, most omnipotent; most piteous and most just; most hidden and most near; most beautious and most strong; stable, yet contained of none; unchangeable, yet changing all things; never new, never old; making all things new, yet bringing old age upon the proud and they know it not; always working, yet ever at rest; gathering, yet needing nothing; sustaining, pervading, and protecting; creating, nourishing, and developing; seeking, and yet possessing all things. Thou lovest, and burnest not; art jealous, yet free from care; repentest, and hast no sorrow; art angry, yet serene; changest Thy ways, leaving unchanged Thy plans; recoverest what Thou findest, having yet never lost; art never in want, whilst Thou rejoicest in gain; never covetous, though requiring usury. 1

* Rom. xi. 36. 2 Jer. xxiii. 24. 3 Acts ii. 18.

That Thou mayest owe, more than enough is given to Thee; 2 yet who hath anything that is not Thine ? Thou payest debts while owing nothing; and when Thou forgivest debts, losest nothing. Yet, my God, my life, my holy joy, what is this that I have said ? And what saith any man when He speaks of Thee ? Yet woe to them that keep silence, seeing that even they who say most are as the dumb. 3

Chap. v. He seeks rest in God, and pardon of his sins.

5. Oh ! how shall I find rest in Thee ? Who will send Thee into my heart to inebriate it, so that I may forget my woes, and embrace Thee, my only good ? What art Thou to me ? Have compassion on me, that I may speak. What am I to Thee that Thou demandest my love, and unless I give it Thee art angry, and threatenest me with great sorrows ? Is it, then, a light sorrow not to love Thee ? Alas ! alas ! tell me of Thy compassion, Lord my God, what Thou art to me.

8 " As it is impossible for mortal, imperfect, and perishable man to comprehend the immortal, perfect, and eternal, we cannot expect that he should be able to express in praise the fulness of God's attributes. The Talmud relates of a rabbi, who did not consider the terms, 'the great, mighty, and fearful God,' which occur in the daily prayer, as being sufficient, but added some more attributes

' What ! ' exclaimed another rabbi, who was present, ' imaginest thou to be able to exhaust the praise of God ? Thy praise is blasphemy. Thou hadst better be quiet.' Hence the Psalmist's exclamation, after finding that the praises of God were inexhaustible: n?nn fPDH "J?, ' Silence is praise to Thee. ' " Breslau.
"Say unto my soul, I am thy salvation." So speak that I may hear. Behold, Lord, the ears of my heart are before Thee; open Thou them, and "say unto my soul, I am thy salvation." When I hear, may I run and lay hold on Thee. Hide not Thy face from me. Let me die, lest I die, if only I may see Thy face.

6. Cramped is the dwelling of my soul; do Thou expand it, that Thou mayest enter in. It is in ruins, restore Thou it. There is that about it which must offend Thine eyes; I confess and know it, but who will cleanse it? or to whom shall I cry but to Thee? Cleanse me from my secret sins, Lord, and keep Thy servant from those of other men. I believe, and therefore do I speak; 4 Lord, Thou knowest. Have I not confessed my transgressions unto Thee, my God; and Thou hast put away the iniquity of my heart? 5 I do not contend in judgment with Thee, who art the Truth; and I would not deceive myself, lest my iniquity lie against itself. 7 I do not, therefore, contend in judgment with Thee, for "if Thou, Lord, shouldest mark iniquities, Lord, who shall stand?"

Chap. vi. He describes his infancy, and lauds the protection and eternal providence of God.

7. Still suffer me to speak before Thy mercy me, "dust and ashes." Suffer me to speak, for, behold, it is Thy mercy I address, and not derisive man. Yet perhaps even Thou deridest me; but when Thou art turned to me Thou wilt have compassion on me. 10 For what do I wish to say, O Lord my

"Be it that sin may never see the light, that it may be like a child born and buried in the womb; yet as that child is a man, a true man, there closeted in that hidden frame of nature, so sin is truly sin, though it never gets out beyond the womb which did conceive and enliven it." God, but that I know not whence I came hither into this shall I call it dying life or living death? Yet, as I have heard from my parents, from whose substance Thou didst form me, for I myself cannot remember it, Thy merciful comforts sustained me. Thus it was that the comforts of a woman's milk entertained me; for neither my mother nor my nurses filled their own breasts, but Thou by them didst give me the nourishment of infancy according to Thy ordinance and that bounty of Thine which underlieth all things. For Thou didst cause me not to want more than Thou gavest, and those who nourished me willingly to give me what Thou gavest them. For they, by an instinctive affection, were anxious to give me what Thou hadst abundantly supplied. It was, in truth, good for them that my good should come from them, though, indeed, it was not from them, but by them; for from Thee, God, are all good things, and from my God is all my safety. 1 This is what I have since discovered, as Thou hast declared Thyself to me by the blessings both within me and without me which Thou hast bestowed upon me. For at that time I knew how to suck, to be satisfied when comfortable, and to cry when in pain nothing beyond.

8. Afterwards I began to laugh, at first in sleep, then when waking. For this I have heard mentioned of myself, and I believe it (though I cannot remember it), for we see the same in other infants. And now little by little I realized where I was, and wished to tell my wishes to those who might satisfy them, but I could not; for my wants were within me, while they were without, and could not by any faculty of theirs enter into my soul. So I cast about limbs and voice, making the few and feeble signs I could, like, though indeed not much like, unto what I wished; and when I was not satisfied either not being understood, or because it would have been injurious to me I grew indignant that my elders were not subject unto me, and that those on whom I had no claim did not wait on me, and avenged myself on them by tears. That infants are such I have been able to learn by watching them; and they, though unknowing, have better shown me that I was such an one than my nurses who knew it.

9. And, behold, my infancy died long ago, and I live. But Thou, O Lord, who ever livest, and in whom nothing dies (since before the world was, and indeed before all that can be called "before," Thou existest, and art the God and Lord of all Thy creatures; and with Thee fixedly abide the causes of all unstable things, the unchanging sources of all things changeable, and the eternal reasons of all things unreasoning and temporal), tell me, Thy suppliant, O God; tell, merciful One, Thy miserable servant I tell me whether my infancy succeeded

another age of mine which had at that time perished. Was it that which I passed in my mother's womb? For of that something has been made known to me, and I have myself seen women with child. And what, O God, my joy, preceded that life? Was I, indeed, anywhere, or anybody? For no one can tell me these things, neither father nor mother, nor the experience of others, nor my own memory. Dost Thou laugh at me for asking such things, and command me to praise and confess Thee for what I know?

10. I give thanks to Thee, Lord of heaven and earth, giving praise to Thee for that my first being and infancy, of which I have no memory; for Thou hast granted to man that from others he should come to conclusions as to himself, and that he should believe many things concerning himself on the authority of feeble women. Even then I had life and being; and as my infancy closed I was already seeking for signs by which my feelings might be made known to others.
Whence could such a creature come but from Thee, Lord? Or shall any man be skilful enough to fashion himself? Or is there any other vein by which being and life runs into us save this, that "Thou, Lord, hast made us," 2 with whom being and life are one, because Thou Thyself art being and life in the highest? Thou art the highest, "Thou changest not," 3

neither in Thee doth this present day come to an end, though it doth end in Thee, since in Thee all such things are; for they would have no way of passing away unless Thou sustendest them. And since "Thy years shall have no end," 1 Thy years are an ever present day. And how many of ours and our fathers' days have passed through this Thy day, and received from it their measure and fashion of being, and others yet to come shall so receive and pass away! "But Thou art the same; " 2 and all the things of to-morrow and the days yet to come, and all of yesterday and the days that are past, Thou wilt do to-day, Thou hast done to-day. What is it to me if any understand not? Let him still rejoice and say,

"What is this?" 3 Let him rejoice even so, and rather love to discover in failing to discover, than in discovering not to discover Thee.

Chap. vii. He shows by examples that even infancy is prone to sin.

11. Hearken, God! Alas for the sins of men! Man saith this, and Thou dost compassionate him; for Thou didst create him, but didst not create the sin that is in him.
Who bringeth to my remembrance the sin of my infancy? For before Thee none is free from sin, not even the infant which has lived but) a day upon the earth. Who bringeth this to my remembrance? Doth not each little one, in whom I behold that which I do not remember of myself? In what, then, did I sin? Is it that I cried for the breast?
If I should now so cry, not indeed for the breast, but for the food suitable to my years, I should be most justly

1 Ps. cii. 27. 2 Ibid.

3 Ex. xvi. 15. This is one of the alternative translations put against "it is manna" in the margin of the authorized version. It is the literal significance of the Hebrew, and is so translated in most of the old English versions. Augustine indicates thereby the attitude of faith. Many things we are called on to believe (to use the illustration of Locke) which are above reason, but none that are contrary to reason. We are but as children in relation to God, and may therefore only expect to know "parts of His ways." Even in the difficulties of Scripture he sees the goodness of God. "God," he says, "has in Scripture clothed His mysteries with clouds, that man's love of truth might be inflamed by the difficulty of finding them out. For if they were only such as were readily understood, truth would not be eagerly sought, nor would it give pleasure when found." Be Ver. Relig. c. 17.

laughed at and rebuked. What I then did deserved rebuke; but as I could not understand those who rebuked me, neither custom nor reason suffered me to be rebuked. For as we grow we root out and cast from us such habits. I have not seen any one who is wise, when "purging" * anything cast away the good. Or was it good, even for a time, to strive to get by crying that which, if given, would be hurtful to be bitterly indignant that those who were free and its elders, and those to whom it owed its being, besides many others wiser than it, who would not give way to the nod of its good pleasure, were not subject unto it to endeavour to harm, by struggling as much as it could, because those commands were not obeyed which only could have been obeyed to its hurt? Then, in the weakness of the infant's limbs, and not in its will, lies its innocency. I myself have seen and known an infant to be jealous though it could not speak. It became pale, and cast bitter looks on its foster-brother. Who is ignorant of this? Mothers and nurses tell us that they appease these things by I know not what remedies; and may this be taken for innocence, that when the fountain of milk is flowing fresh and abundant, one who has need should not be allowed to share it, though needing that nourishment to sustain life? Yet we look leniently on these things, not because they are not faults, nor because the faults are small, but because they will vanish as age increases. For although you may allow these things now, you could not bear them with equanimity if found in an older person.

12. Thou, therefore, Lord my God, who gavest life to the infant, and a frame which, as we see, Thou hast endowed with senses, compacted with limbs, beautified with form, and, for its general good and safety, hast introduced all vital energies Thou commandest me to praise Thee for these things, "to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praise unto Thy name, Most High;" 2 for Thou art a God omnipotent and good, though Thou hadst done nought but these things, which none other can do but Thou, who alone madest all things, Thou most fair, who madest all things fair, and orderest all according to Thy law. This period, then, of my life, Lord, of which I have no remembrance, which I believe on the word of others, and which I guess from other infants, it chagrins me -true though the guess be to reckon in this life of mine which I lead in this world; inasmuch as, in the darkness of my forgetfulness, it is like to that which I passed in my mother's womb. But if "I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me," I where, I pray thee, my God, where, Lord, or when was I, Thy servant, innocent? But behold, I pass by that time, for what have I to do with that, the memories of which I cannot recall?

Chap. viii. That when a boy he learned to speak, not by any set method, but from the acts and words of his parents.

13. Did I not, then, growing out of the state of infancy, come to boyhood, or rather did it not come to me, and succeed to infancy? Nor did my infancy depart (for whither went it ?); and yet it did no longer abide, for I was no longer an infant that could not speak, but a chattering boy. I remember this, and I afterwards observed how I first learned to speak, for my elders did not teach me words in any set method, as they did letters afterwards; but I myself, when I was unable to say all I wished and to whomsoever I desired, by means of the whimperings and broken utterances and various motions of my limbs, which I used to enforce my wishes, repeated the sounds in my memory by the mind, O my God, which Thou gavest me. When they called anything by name, and moved the body towards it while they spoke, I saw and gathered that the thing they wished to point out was called by the name they then uttered; and that they did mean this was made plain by the motion of the body, even by the natural language of all nations expressed by the countenance, glance of the eye, movement of other members, and by the sound of the voice indicating the affections of the mind, as it seeks, possesses, rejects, or avoids. So it was that by frequently hearing affections, in duly placed sentences, I gradually gathered what things they were the signs of; and having formed my mouth to the utterance of these signs, I thereby expressed my will. Thus I exchanged with those about me the signs by which we express our wishes, and advanced deeper into the stormy fellowship of human life, depending the while on the authority of parents, and the beck of elders.

Chap. ix. Concerning the hatred of learning, the love of play, and the fear of being whipped noticeable in boys: and of the folly of our elders and masters,

14. my God! what miseries and mockeries did I then experience, when obedience to my teachers was set before me as proper to my boyhood, that I might flourish in this world, and distinguish myself in the science of speech, which should get me honour amongst men, and deceitful riches! After that I was put to school to get learning, of which I (worthless as I was) knew not what use there was; and yet, if slow to learn, I was flogged! For this was deemed praiseworthy by our forefathers; and many before us, passing the same course, had appointed beforehand for us these troublesome ways by which we were compelled to pass, multiplying labour and sorrow upon the sons of Adam. But we found, Lord, men praying to Thee, and we learned from them to conceive of Thee, according to our ability, to be some Great One, who was able (though not visible to our senses) to hear and help us.

For as a boy I began to pray to Thee, my "help" and my "refuge," and in invoking Thee broke the bands of my tongue, and entreated Thee though little, with no little earnestness, that I might not be beaten at school. And when Thou heardedst me not, giving me not over to folly thereby, my elders, yea, and my own parents too, who wished me no ill, laughed at my stripes, my then great and grievous ill

15. Is there any one, Lord, with so high a spirit, cleaving to Thee with so strong an affection for even a kind of obtuseness may do that much but is there, I say, any one who, by cleaving devoutly to Thee, is endowed with so great a courage that he can esteem lightly those racks and hooks, and varied tortures of the same sort, against which, throughout the whole world, men supplicate Thee with great fear, deriding those who most bitterly fear them, just as our parents derided the torments with which our masters punished us when we were boys? For we were no less afraid of our pains, nor did we pray less to Thee to avoid them; and yet we sinned, in writing, or reading, or reflecting upon our lessons less than was required of us. For we wanted not, Lord, memory or capacity, of which, by Thy will, we possessed enough for our age, but we delighted only in play; and we were punished for this by those who were doing the same things themselves. But the idleness of our elders they call business, whilst boys who do the like are punished by those same elders, and yet neither boys nor men find any pity. For will any one of good sense approve of my being whipped because, as a boy, I played ball, and so was hindered from learning quickly those lessons by means of which, as a man, I should play more unbecomingly? And did he by whom I was beaten do other than this, who, when he was overcome in any little controversy with a co-tutor, was more tormented by anger and envy than I when beaten by a playfellow in a match at ball?

Chap. x. Through a love of ball-playing and shows, he neglects his studies and the injunctions of his parents.

16. And yet I erred, Lord God, the Creator and Disposer of all things in Nature, but of sin the Disposer only, I erred, Lord my God, in doing contrary to the wishes of my parents and of those masters; for this learning which they (no matter for what motive) wished me to acquire, I might have put to good account afterwards. For I disobeyed them not because I had chosen a better way, but from a fondness for play, loving the honour of victory in the matches, and to have my ears tickled with lying fables, in order that they might itch the more furiously the same curiosity beaming more and more in my eyes for the shows and sports of my elders. Yet those who give these entertainments are held in such high repute, that almost all desire the same for their children, whom they are still willing should be beaten, if so be these same games keep them from the studies by which they desire them to arrive at being the givers of them. Look down upon these things, Lord, with compassion, and deliver us who now call upon Thee; deliver those also who do not call upon Thee, that they may call upon Thee, and that Thou mayest deliver them.

Chap. xi. Seized by disease, his mother being troubled, he earnestly demands baptism, which on recovery is postponed his father not as yet believing in Christ.
17. Even as a boy I had heard of eternal life promised to us through the humility of the Lord our God condescending to our pride, and I was signed with the sign of the cross, and was seasoned with His salt 1 even from the womb of my mother, who greatly trusted in Thee. Thou sawest, O Lord, how at one time, while yet a boy, being suddenly seized with pains in the stomach, and being at the point of death Thou sawest, my God, for even then Thou wast my keeper, with what emotion of mind and with what faith I solicited from the piety of my mother, and of Thy Church, the mother of us all, the baptism of Thy Christ, my Lord and my God. On which, the mother of my flesh being much troubled, since she, with a heart pure in Thy faith, travailed in birth 2 more lovingly for my eternal salvation, would, had I not quickly recovered, have without delay provided for my initiation and washing by Thy life-giving sacraments, confessing Thee, Lord Jesus, for the remission of sins. So my cleansing was deferred, as if I must needs, should I live, be further polluted; because, indeed, the guilt contracted by sin would, after baptism, be greater and more perilous. 3 Thus I at that

3 Baptism was in those days frequently (and for similar reasons to the above) postponed till the hour of death approached. The doctors of the Church endeavoured to discourage this, and persons baptized on a sick-bed ("clinically")

18. I beseech Thee, my God, I would gladly know, if it be Thy will, to what end my baptism was then deferred ?

Was it for my good that the reins were slackened, as it were, upon me for me to sin ? Or were they not slackened ? If not, whence comes it that it is still dinned into our ears on all sides, "Let him alone, let him act as he likes, for he is not yet baptized"? But as regards bodily health, no one exclaims, "Let him be more seriously wounded, for he is not yet cured!" How much better, then, had it been for me to have been cured at once; and then, by my own and my friends' diligence, my soul's restored health had been kept safe in Thy keeping, who gavest it! Better, in truth. But how numerous and great waves of temptation appeared to hang over me after my childhood! These were foreseen by my mother; and she preferred that the unformed clay should be exposed to them rather than the image itself.

Chap. xii. Being compelled, he gave his attention to learning; but fully acknowledges that this was the work of God.

19. But in this my childhood (which was far less dreaded for me than youth) I had no love of learning, and hated to be forced to it, yet was I forced to it notwithstanding; and this was well done towards me, but I did not well, for I would not have learned had I not been compelled. For no man were, if they recovered, looked on with suspicion. The Emperor Constantine was not baptized till the close of his life, and he is censured by Dr. Newman (Arians, iii. sec. 1) for presuming to speak of questions which divided the Arians and the Orthodox as "unimportant," while he himself was both unbaptized and uninstructed. On the postponing of baptism with a view to unrestrained enjoyment of the world, and on the severity of the early Church towards sins committed after baptism, see Kaye's lertullian, pp. 234-241.

CHAP. XIII.] HE HATES STUDY. 15

doeth well against his will, even if that which he doth be well.
Neither did they who forced me do well, but the good that was done to me came from Thee, my God. For they considered not in what way I should employ what they forced me to learn, unless to satisfy the inordinate desires of a rich beggary and a shameful glory. But Thou, by whom the very hairs of our heads are numbered, didst use for my good the error of all who pressed me to learn; and my own error in willing not to learn, didst Thou make use of for my punishment of which I, being so small a boy and so great a sinner, was not unworthy. Thus by the instrumentality of those who did not well didst Thou well for me; and by my own sin didst Thou justly punish me. For it is even as Thou hast appointed, that every inordinate affection should bring its own punishment. 2

Chap. xiii. He delighted in Latin studies and the empty fables of the poets, but hated the elements of literature and the Greek language.

20. But what was the cause of my dislike of Greek literature, which I studied from my boyhood, I cannot even now understand. For the Latin I loved exceedingly not what our first masters, but what the grammarians teach; for those primary lessons of reading, writing, and ciphering, I considered no less of a burden and a punishment than Greek. Yet whence was this unless from the sin and vanity of this life? for I was " but flesh, a wind that passeth away and cometh not again." 3 For those primary lessons were better, assuredly, because more certain; seeing that by their agency I acquired, and still retain, the power of reading what I find written, and writing myself what I will; whilst in the others I was compelled to learn about the wanderings of a certain iEneas, oblivious of my own, and to weep for Dido dead, because she slew herself for love; while at the same time I brooked with dry eyes my wretched self dying far from Thee, in the midst of those things, God, my life.

21. For what can be more wretched than the wretch who pities not himself shedding tears over the death of Dido for love of iEneas, but shedding no tears over his own death in not loving Thee, O God, light of my heart, and bread of the inner mouth of my soul, and the power that weddest my mind with my innermost thoughts? I did not love Thee, and committed fornication against Thee; and those around me thus sinning cried, " Well done! Well done! " For the friendship of this world is fornication against Thee; *
and "Well done! Well done!" is cried until one feels ashamed not to be such a man. And for this I shed no tears, though I wept for Dido, who sought death at the sword's point, myself the while seeking the lowest of Thy creatures having forsaken Thee earth tending to the earth; and if forbidden to read these things, how grieved would I feel that I was not permitted to read what grieved me. This sort of madness is considered a more honourable and more fruitful learning than that by which I learned to read and write.

22. But now, my God, cry unto my soul; and let Thy Truth say unto me, "It is not so, it is not so; better much was that first teaching." For behold, I would rather forget the wanderings of iEneas, and all such things, than how to write and read. But it is true that over the entrance of the grammar school there hangs a vail; but this is not so much a sign of the majesty of the mystery, as of a covering for error. Let not them exclaim against me of whom I am no longer in fear, whilst I confess to Thee, my God, that which my soul desires, and acquiesce in reprehending my evil ways, that I may love Thy good ways. Neither let those cry out against me who buy or sell grammar-learning. For if I ask them whether it be true, as the poet says, that iEneas once came to Carthage, the unlearned will reply that they do not know, the learned will deny it to be true. But if I ask with what letters the name ^Eneas is written, all who have learnt this will answer truly, in accordance with the conventional understanding men have arrived at as to these signs. Again, if I should ask which, if forgotten, would cause the greatest inconvenience in our life, reading and writing, or these poetical fictions, who does not see what every one would answer who had not entirely forgotten himself? I erred, then, when as a boy I preferred those vain studies to those more profitable ones, or rather loved the one and hated the other. "One and one are two, two and two are four," this was then in truth a hateful song to me; while the wooden horse full of armed men, and the burning of Troy, and the "spectral image" of Creusa * were a most pleasant spectacle of vanity.

Chap. xiv. Why he despised Greek literature, and easily learned Latin.
23. But why, then, did I dislike Greek learning, which was full of like tales? For Homer also was skilled in inventing similar stories, and is most sweetly vain, yet was he disagreeable to me as a boy. I believe Virgil, indeed, would be the same to Grecian children, if compelled to learn him, as I was Homer. The difficulty, in truth, the difficulty of learning a foreign language mingled as it were with gall all the sweetness of those fabulous Grecian stories. For not a single word of it did I understand, and to make me do so, they vehemently urged me with cruel threatenings and punishments. There was a time also when (as an infant) I knew no Latin; but this I acquired without any fear or tormenting, by merely taking notice, amid the blandishments of my nurses, the jests of those who smiled

1 Mneid, ii. 772.

2 Exaggerated statements have been made as to Augustine's deficiency in the knowledge of Greek. In this place it is clear that he simply alludes to a repugnance to learn a foreign language that has often been seen in boys since his day. It would seem equally clear from Bk. vii. sec. 13 (see also De Trin. iii. sec. 1), that when he could get a translation of a Greek book, he preferred it to one in the original language. Perhaps in this, again, he is not altogether singular. It is difficult to decide the exact extent of his knowledge, but those familiar with his writings can scarcely fail to be satisfied that he had a sufficient acquaintance with the language to correct his Italic version by the Greek Testament and the LXX., and that he was quite alive to the importance of such knowledge in an interpreter of Scripture. See also Con. Faust, xi. 2-4; and De Doctr. Clvrist. ii. 11-15.

on me, and the sportiveness of those who toyed with me. I learnt all this, indeed, without being urged by any pressure of punishment, for my own heart urged me to bring forth its own conceptions, which I could not do unless by learning words, not of those who taught me, but of those who talked to me; into whose ears, also, I brought forth whatever I discerned. From this it is sufficiently clear that a free curiosity hath more influence in our learning these things than a necessity full of fear. But this last restrains the overflowings of that freedom, through Thy laws, God, -Thy laws, from the ferule of the schoolmaster to the trials of the martyr, being effective to mingle for us a salutary bitter, calling us back to Thyself from the pernicious delights which allure us from Thee.

Cuap. XV. He entreats God, that whatever useful things he learned as a boy may be dedicated to Him.
24. Hear my prayer, Lord; let not my soul faint under Thy discipline, nor let me faint in confessing unto Thee Thy mercies, whereby Thou hast saved me from all my most mischievous ways, that Thou mightest become sweet to me beyond all the seductions which I used to follow; and that I may love Thee entirely, and grasp Thy hand with my whole heart, and that Thou mayest deliver me from every temptation, even unto the end. For lo, Lord, my King and my God, for Thy service be whatever useful thing I learnt as a boy for Thy service what I speak, and write, and count. For when I learned vain things, Thou didst grant me Thy discipline; and my sin in taking delight in those vanities, Thou hast forgiven me. I learned, indeed, in them many useful words; but these may be learned in things not vain, and that is the safe way for youths to walk in.

Chap. XVI. He disapproves of the mode of educating youth, and he points out why wickedness is attributed to the gods by the poets.

25. But woe unto thee, thou stream of human custom! Who shall stay thy course? How long shall it be before thou art dried up? How long wilt thou carry down the sons of Eve into that huge and formidable ocean, which even they who are embarked on the cross (lignum) can scarce pass over? I Do I not read in thee of Jove the thunderer and adulterer? And the two verily he could not be; but it was that, while the fictitious thunder served as a cloak, he might have warrant to imitate real adultery. Yet which of our gowned masters can lend a temperate ear to a man of his school who cries out and says: "These were Homer's fictions; he transfers things human to the gods. I could have wished him to transfer divine things to us." 2 But it would have been more true had he said: "These are, indeed, his fictions, but he attributed divine attributes to sinful men, that crimes might not be accounted crimes, and that whosoever committed any might appear to imitate the celestial gods and not abandoned men."

26. And yet, thou stream of hell, into thee are cast the sons of men, with rewards for learning these things; and much is made of it when this is going on in the forum in the sight of laws which grant a salary over and above the rewards. And thou beatest against thy rocks and roarest, saying, "Hence words are learnt; hence eloquence is to be attained, most necessary to persuade people to your way of thinking, and to unfold your opinions." So, in truth, we should never have understood these words, "golden shower," "bosom," "intrigue,"
"highest heavens," and other words written in the same place, unless Terence had introduced a good-for-nothing youth upon the stage, setting up Jove as his example of lewdness:

"Viewing a picture, where the tale was drawn, Of Jove's descending in a golden shower To Danae's bosom... with a woman to intrigue."

And see how he excites himself to lust, as if by celestial authority, when he says:

"Great Jove, Who shakes the highest heavens with his thunder, And I, poor mortal man, not do the same! I did it, and with all my heart I did it." 3

1 So in Tract. II. on John, he has: "The sea has to be crossed, and dost thou despise the wood?" explaining it to mean the cross of Christ. And again:
*Thou art not at all able to walk in the sea, be carried by a ship be carried by the wood believe on the Crucified," etc.

* Cic. Tusc. i. 26. 3 Terence, Eunuch. Act 3, scene 6 (Colman).

Not one whit more easily are the words learnt for this vileness, but by their means is the vileness perpetrated with more confidence. I do not blame the words, they being, as it were, choice and precious vessels, but the wine of error which was drunk in them to us by inebriated teachers; and unless we drank, we were beaten, without liberty of appeal to any sober judge. And yet, my God, in whose presence I can now with security recall this, did I, unhappy one, learn these things willingly, and with delight, and for this was I called a boy of good promise. 1

Chap. xvii. He continues on the unhappy method of training youth in literary subjects.

2 7. Bear with me, my God, while I speak a little of those talents Thou hast bestowed upon me, and on what follies I wasted them. For a lesson sufficiently disquieting to my soul was given me, in hope of praise, and fear of shame or stripes, to speak the words of Juno, as she raged and sorrowed that she could not

"Latium bar From all approaches of the Dardan king," a which I had heard Juno never uttered. Yet were we compelled to stray in the footsteps of these poetic fictions, and to turn that into prose which the poet had said in verse. And his speaking was most applauded in whom, according to the reputation of the persons delineated, the passions of anger and sorrow were most strikingly reproduced, and clothed in the most suitable language. But what is it to me, my true Life, my God, that my declaiming was applauded above that of many who were my contemporaries and fellow-students?

Behold, is not all this smoke and wind? Was there nothing else, too, on which I could exercise my wit and tongue?

Thy praise, Lord, Thy praises might have supported the tendrils of my heart by Thy Scriptures; so had it not been dragged away by these empty trifles, a shameful prey of 3 fowls of the air. For there is more than one way in which men sacrifice to the fallen angels.

Chap, xviii. Men desire to observe the rules of learning, but neglect the eternal rules of everlasting safety.

28. But what matter of surprise is it that I was thus carried towards vanity, and went forth from Thee, my God, when men were proposed to me to imitate, who, should they in relating any acts of theirs not in themselves evil be guilty of a barbarism or solecism, when censured for it became confounded; but when they made a full and ornate oration, in well-chosen words, concerning their own licentiousness, and were applauded for it, they boasted? Thou seest this, Lord, and keepest silence, "long-suffering, and plenteous in mercy and truth," 1 as Thou art. Wilt Thou keep silence for ever? And even now Thou drawest out of this vast deep the soul that seeketh Thee and thirsteth after Thy delights, whose "heart said unto Thee," I have sought Thy face, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek." 2

For I was far from Thy face, through my darkened 3 affections. For it is not by our feet, nor by change of place, that we either turn from Thee or return to Thee. Or, indeed, did that younger son look out for horses, or chariots, or ships, or fly away with visible wings, or journey by the motion of his limbs, that he might, in a far country, prodigally waste all that Thou gavest him when he set out? A kind Father when Thou gavest, and kinder still when he returned destitute! So, then, in wanton, that is to say, in darkened affections, lies distance from Thy face.

29. Behold, O Lord God, and behold patiently, as Thou art wont to do, how diligently the sons of men observe the conventional rules of letters and syllables, received from those who spoke prior to them, and yet neglect the eternal rules of everlasting salvation received from Thee, insomuch that he who practises or teaches the hereditary rules of pronunciation, if, contrary to grammatical usage, he should say, without aspirating the first letter, a human being, will offend men more than if, in opposition to Thy commandments, he, a human being, were to hate a human being. As if, indeed, any man should feel that an enemy could be more destructive to him than that hatred with which he is excited against him, or that he could destroy more utterly him whom he persecutes than he destroys his own soul by his enmity. And of a truth, there is no science of letters more innate than the writing of conscience that he is doing unto another what he himself would not suffer. How mysterious art Thou, who in silence "dwellest on high," * Thou God, the only great, who by an unwearied law deallest out the punishment of blindness to illicit desires! When a man seeking for the reputation of eloquence stands before a human judge while a thronging multitude surrounds him, inveighs against his enemy with the most fierce hatred, he takes most vigilant heed that his tongue slips not into grammatical error, but takes no heed lest through the fury of his spirit he cut off a man from his fellow-men. 2

30. These were the customs in the midst of which I, unhappy boy, was cast, and on that arena it was that I was more fearful of perpetrating a barbarism than, having done so, of envying those who had not. These things I declare and confess unto Thee, my God, for which I was applauded by them whom I then thought it my whole duty to please, for I did not perceive the gulf of infamy wherein I was cast away from Thine eyes. 3 For in Thine eyes what was more infamous than I was already, displeasing even those like myself, deceiving innumerable lies both tutor, and masters, and parents, from love of play, a desire to see frivolous spectacles, and a stage-struck restlessness, to imitate them? Pilferings I committed from my parents' cellar and table, either enslaved by gluttony, or that I might have something to give to boys who sold me their play, who, though they sold it, liked it as well as I. In this play, likewise, I often sought dishonest victories, I myself being conquered by the vain desire of pre-eminence.

2 Literally, "takes care not by a slip of the tongue to say inter hominibus, but takes no care lest hominem auferat ex hominibus."
And what could I so little endure, or, if I detected it, censured I so violently, &s the very things I did to others, and, when myself detected I was censured, preferred rather to quarrel than to yield ? Is this the innocence of childhood ? Nay, Lord, nay, Lord; I entreat Thy mercy, my God. For these same sins, as we grow older, are transferred from governors and masters, from nuts, and balls, and sparrows, to magistrates and kings, to gold, and lands, and slaves, just as the rod is succeeded by more severe chastisements. It was, then, the stature of childhood that Thou, O our King, didst approve of as an emblem of humility when Thou saidst: " Of such is the kingdom of heaven." 1

31. But yet, Lord, to Thee, most excellent and most good, Thou Architect and Governor of the universe, thanks had been due unto Thee, our God, even hadst Thou willed that I should not survive my boyhood. For I existed even then; I lived, and felt, and was solicitous about my own well-being, a trace of that most mysterious unity * from whence I had my being; I kept watch by my inner sense over the wholeness of my senses, and in these insignificant pursuits, and also in my thoughts on things insignificant, I learnt to take pleasure in truth. I was averse to being deceived, I had a vigorous memory, was provided with the power of speech, was softened by friendship, shunned sorrow, meanness, ignorance. In such a being what was not wonderful and praiseworthy ? But all these are gifts of my God; I did not give them to myself; and they are good, and all these constitute myself. Good, then, is He that made me, and He is my God; and before Him will I rejoice exceedingly for every good gift which, as a boy, I had. For in this lay my sin, that not in Him, but in His creatures myself and the rest I sought for pleasures,

CHAP. I.] THE WICKEDNESS OF HIS YOUTH. 25

BOOK SECOND.

HE ADVANCES TO PUBERTY, AND INDEED TO THE EARLY PART OP THE SIXTEENTH YEAR OF HIS AGE, IN WHICH, HAVING ABANDONED HIS STUDIES, HE IN-DULGED IN LUSTFUL PLEASURES, AND, WITH HIS COMPANIONS, COMMITTED THEFT.

CHAP. i. He deprecates the wickedness of his youth.

1. T WILL now call to mind my past foulness, and the carnal corruptions of my soul, not because I love them, but that I may love Thee, my God. For love of Thy love do I it, recalling, in the very bitterness of my remembrance, my most vicious ways, that Thou mayest grow sweet to me, Thou sweetness without deception! Thou sweetness happy and assured! and re-collecting myself out of that my dissipation, in which I was torn to pieces, while, turned away from Thee the One, I lost myself among many vanities. For I even longed in my youth formerly to be satisfied with worldly things, and I dared to grow wild again with various and shadowy loves; my form consumed away, and I became corrupt in Thine eyes, pleasing myself, and eager to please in the eyes of men.

Chap. ii. Stricken with exceeding grief, he remembers the dissolute passions in which, in his sixteenth year, he used to indulge.

2. But what was it that I delighted in save to love and to be beloved? But I held it not in moderation, mind to mind, the bright path of friendship, but out of the dark concupiscence of the flesh and the effervescence of youth exhalations came forth which obscured and overcast my heart, so that I was unable to discern pure affection from unholy desire. Both boiled confusedly within me, and dragged away my unstable youth into the rough places of unchaste desires, and plunged me into a gulf of infamy. Thy anger had overshadowed me, and I knew it not. I was become deaf by the rattling of the chains of my mortality, the punishment for my soul's pride; and I wandered farther from Thee, and Thou didst " suffer " me; and I was tossed to and fro, and wasted, and poured out, and boiled over in my fornications, and Thou didst hold Thy peace, Thou my tardy joy! Thou then didst hold Thy peace, and I wandered still farther from Thee, into more and more barren seed-plots of sorrows, with proud dejection and restless lassitude.

3. Oh for one to have regulated my disorder, and turned to my profit the fleeting beauties of the things around me, and fixed a bound to their sweetness, so that the tides of my youth might have spent themselves upon the conjugal shore, if so be they could not be tranquillized and satisfied within the object of a family, as Thy law appoints, Lord, who thus formest the offspring of our death, being able also with a tender hand to blunt the thorns which were excluded from Thy paradise!

For Thy omnipotency is not far from us even when we are far from Thee, else in truth ought I more vigilantly to have given heed to the voice from the clouds: " Nevertheless, such shall have trouble in the flesh, but I spare you;" 2 and, " It is good for a man not to touch a woman;" 3 and, " He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord; but he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife." 4

I should, therefore, have listened more attentively to these words, and, being severed ' for the kingdom of heaven's sake," 5 I would with greater happiness have expected Thy embraces.

4. But I, poor fool, seethed as does the sea, and, forsaking Thee, followed the violent course of my own stream, and exceeded all Thy limitations; nor did I escape Thy scourges. 6

For what mortal can do so? But Thou wert always by me, mercifully angry, and dashing with the bitterest vexations all my illicit pleasures, in order that I might seek pleasures free from vexation. But where I could meet with such except in Thee, Lord, I could not find, except in Thee, who teachest by sorrow, 1 and wounding us to heal us, and killest us that we may not die from Thee. 2 Where was I, and how far was I exiled from the delights of Thy house, in that sixteenth year of the age of my flesh, when the madness of lust to the which human shamelessness granteth full freedom, although forbidden by Thy laws held complete sway over me, and I resigned myself entirely to it? Those about me meanwhile took no care to save me from ruin by marriage, their sole care being that I should learn to make a powerful speech, and become a persuasive orator.

Chap. hi. Concerning his father, a freeman of Thagaste, the assistcr of his son's studies, and on the admonitions of his mother on the preservation of chastity.

5. And for that year my studies were intermitted, while after my return from Madaura 3 (a neighbouring city, whither I had begun to go in order to learn grammar and rhetoric), the expenses for a further residence at Carthage were provided for me; and that was rather by the determination than the means of my father, who was but a poor freeman of Thagaste.

To whom do I narrate this? Not unto Thee, my God; but before Thee unto my own kind, even to that small part of the human race who may chance to light upon these my writings.

And to what end? That I and all who read the same may reflect out of what depths we are to cry unto Thee. 4 For what cometh nearer to Thine ears than a confessing heart and a life of faith? For who did not extol and praise my father, in that he went even beyond his means to supply his son with all the necessaries for a far journey for the sake of his studies? For many far richer citizens did not the like for their children. But yet this same father did not trouble himself how I grew towards Thee, nor how chaste I was, so long as I was skilful in speaking however barren I was to Thy tilling, God, who art the sole true and good Lord of my heart, which is Thy field.

6. But while, in that sixteenth year of my age, I resided with my parents, having holiday from school for a time (this idleness being imposed upon me by my parents' necessitous circumstances), the thorns of lust grew rank over my head, and there was no hand to pluck them out. Moreover when my father, seeing me at the baths, perceived that I was becoming a man, and was stirred with a restless youthfulness, he, as if from this anticipating future descendants, joyfully told it to my mother; rejoicing in that intoxication wherein the world so often forgets Thee, its Creator, and falls in love with Thy creature instead of Thee, from the invisible wine of its own perversity turning and bowing down to the most infamous things. But in my mother's breast Thou hadst even now begun Thy temple, and the commencement of Thy holy habitation, whereas my father was only a catechumen as yet, and that but recently. She then started up with a pious fear and trembling; and, although I had not yet been baptized, 1 she feared those crooked ways in which they walk who turn their back to Thee, and not their face. 2

7. Woe is me! and dare I affirm that Thou heldest Thy peace, my God, while I strayed farther from Thee? Didst Thou then hold Thy peace to me? And whose words were they but Thine which by my mother, Thy faithful handmaid, Thou pouredst into my ears, none of which sank into my heart to make me do it? For she desired, and I remember privately warned me, with great solicitude, "not to commit fornication; but above all things never to defile another man's wife." These appeared to me but womanish counsels, which I should blush to obey. But they were Thine, and I knew it not, and I thought that Thou heldest Thy peace, and that it was she who spoke, through whom Thou heldest not Thy peace to me, and in her person wast despised by me, her son, "the son of Thy handmaid, Thy servant." 1 But this I knew not, and rushed on headlong with such blindness, that amongst my equals I was ashamed to be less shameless, when I heard them pluming themselves upon their disgraceful acts, yea, and glorying all the more in proportion to the greatness of their baseness; and I took pleasure -in doing it— not for the pleasure's sake only, but for the praise. What is worthy of dispraise but vice? But I made myself out worse than I was, in order that I might not be dispraised; and when in anything I had not sinned as the abandoned ones, I would affirm that I had done what I had not, that I might not appear abject for being more innocent, or of less esteem for being more chaste.

8. Behold with what companions I walked the streets of Babylon, in whose filth I was rolled, as if in cinnamon and precious ointments. And that I might cleave the more tenaciously to its very centre, my invisible enemy trod me down, and seduced me, I being easily seduced. Nor did the mother of my flesh, although she herself had ere this fled
"out of the midst of Babylon," 2 progressing, however, but slowly in the skirts of it, in counselling me to chastity, so bear in mind what she had been told about me by her husband as to restrain in the limits of conjugal affection (if it could not be cut away to the quick) what she knew to be destructive in the present and dangerous in the future. But she took no heed of this, for she was afraid lest a wife should prove a hindrance and a clog to my hopes. Not those hopes of the future world, which my mother had in Thee; but the hope of learning, which both my parents were too anxious that I should acquire, he, because he had little or no thought of Thee, and but vain thoughts for me she, because she calculated that those usual courses of learning would not only be no drawback, but rather a furtherance towards my attaining Thee. For thus I conjecture, recalling as well as I can the dispositions of my parents. The reins, meantime, were slackened towards me beyond the restraint of due severity, that I might play, yea, even to dissoluteness, in whatsoever I fancied. And in all there was a mist, shutting out from my sight the brightness of Thy truth, my God; and my iniquity displayed itself as from very "fatness." x fancied. And in all there was a mist, shutting out from my sight the brightness of Thy truth, my God; and my iniquity displayed itself as from very "fatness." x

Chap. iv. He commits theft with his companions, not urged on by poverty, but from a certain distaste for well-doing.

9 Theft is punished by Thy law, Lord, and by the law written in men's hearts, which itself cannot blot out. For what thief will suffer a thief? Even a rich thief will not suffer him who is driven to it by want. Yet had I a desire to commit robbery, and did so, compelled neither by hunger, nor poverty, but through a distaste for well-doing, and a lustiness of iniquity. For I pilfered that of which I had already sufficient, and much better. Nor did I desire to enjoy what I pilfered, but the theft and sin itself. There was a pear-tree close to our vineyard, heavily laden with fruit, which was tempting neither for its colour nor its flavour. To shake and rob this some of us wanton young fellows went, late one night (having, according to our disgraceful habit, prolonged our games in the streets until then), and carried away great loads, not to eat ourselves, but to fling to the very swine, having only eaten some of them; and to do this pleased us all the more because it was not permitted. Behold my heart, my God; behold my heart, which Thou hadst pity upon when in the bottomless pit. Behold, now, let my heart tell Thee what it was seeking there, that I should be gratuitously wanton, having no inducement to evil but the evil itself. It was foul, and I loved it. I loved to perish. I loved my own error not that for which I erred, but the error itself. Base soul, falling from Thy firmament to utter destruction not seeking aught through the shame but the shame itself!
Chap. v. Concerning the motives to sin, which are not in the love of evil, but in the desire of obtaining the property of others.

10. There is a desirableness in all beautiful bodies, and in gold, and silver, and all things; and in bodily contact sympathy is powerful, and each other sense hath his proper adaptation of body. Worldly honour hath also its glory, and

1 Ps. lxiii. 7.

CHAP. V. OUR MOTIVES TO SIN. Si

the power of command, and of overcoming; whence proceeds also the desire for revenge. And yet to acquire all these, we must not depart from Thee, Lord, nor deviate from Thy law.
The life which we live here hath also its peculiar attractiveness, through a certain measure of comeliness of its own, and harmony with all things here below. The friendships of men also are endeared by a sweet bond, in the oneness of many souls. On account of all these, and such as these, is sin committed; while through an inordinate preference for these goods of a lower kind, the better and higher are neglected, even Thou, our Lord God, Thy truth, and Thy law. For these meaner things have their delights, but not like unto my God, ytfio- hath created all things; for in Him doth the righteous deliffrftl mid^e is'Xhv sweetness of the upright in heart. 1

'Il: When, therefore, we inquire why a crime was committed, we do not believe it, unless it appear that there might have been the wish to obtain some of those which we designated meaner things, or else a fear of losing them. For truly they are beautiful and comely, although in comparison with those higher and celestial goods they be abject and contemptible. A man hath murdered another; what was his motive? He desired his wife or his estate; or would steal to support himself; or he was afraid of losing something of the kind by him; or, being injured, he was burning to be revenged. "Would he commit murder without a motive, taking delight simply in the act of murder? Who would credit it?"

For as for that savage and brutal man, of whom it is declared that he was gratuitously wicked and cruel, there is yet a motive assigned. "Lest through idleness," he says, "hand or heart should grow inactive." 2 And to what purpose? Why, even that, having once got possession of the city through that practice of wickedness, he might attain unto honours, empire, and wealth, and be exempt from the fear of the laws, and his difficult circumstances from the needs of his family, and the consciousness of his own wickedness. So it seems that even Catiline himself loved not his own villainies, but something else, which gave him the motive for committing them.

Chap. vi. Why he delighted in that theft, when all things which under the appearance of good invite to vice are true and perfect in God alone.

12. What was it, then, that I, miserable one, so doted on in thee, thou theft of mine, thou deed of darkness, in that sixteenth year of my age? Beautiful thou wert not, since thou wert theft. But art thou anything, that so I may argue the case with thee? Those pears that we stole were fair to the sight, because they were Thy creation, Thou fairest 1 of all, Creator of all, Thou good God, the highest good, and my true good. Those pears truly were pleasant to the sight; but it was not for them that my miserable soul lusted, for I had abundance of better, but those I plucked simply that I might steal. For, having plucked them, I threw them away, my sole gratification in them being my own sin, which I was pleased to enjoy. For if any of these pears entered my mouth, the sweetener of it was my sin in eating it. And now, O Lord my God, I ask what it was in that theft of mine that caused me such delight; and behold it hath no beauty in it not such, I mean, as exists in justice and wisdom; nor such as is in the mind, memory, senses, and animal life of man; nor yet such as is the glory and beauty of the stars in their courses; or the earth, or the sea, teeming with incipient life, to replace, as it is born, that which decayeth; nor, indeed, that false and shadowy beauty which pertaineth to deceptive vices.

13. For thus doth pride imitate high estate, whereas Thou alone art God, high above all. And what does ambition seek but honours and renown, whereas Thou alone art to be honoured above all, and renowned for evermore? The cruelty of the powerful wishes to be feared; but who is to be feared but God only, 2 out of whose power what can be forced away or withdrawn when, or where, or whither, or by whom? The enticements of the wanton would fain be deemed love; and yet is naught more enticing than Thy charity, nor is aught loved more healthfully than that, Thy truth, bright and beautiful above all. Curiosity affects a desire for knowledge, "whereas it is Thou who supremely knowest all things. Yea,

ignorance and foolishness themselves are concealed under the names of ingenuousness and harmlessness, because nothing can be found more ingenuous than Thou; and what is more harmless, since it is a sinner's own works by which he is harmed? And sloth seems to long for rest; but what sure rest is there besides the Lord? Luxury would fain be called plenty and abundance; but Thou art the fulness and unfailing plenteousness of unfading joys. Prodigality presents a shadow of liberality; but Thou art the most lavish giver of all good. Covetousness desires to possess much; and Thou art the Possessor of all things. Envy contends for excellence; but what so excellent as Thou? Anger seeks revenge; who avenges more justly than Thou? Fear starts at unwonted and sudden chances which threaten things beloved, and is wary for their security; but what can happen that is unwonted or sudden to Thee? or who can deprive Thee of what Thou lovest? or where is there unshaken security save with Thee? Grief languishes for things lost in which desire had delighted itself, even because it would have nothing taken from it, as nothing can be from Thee.

14. Thus doth the soul commit fornication when she turns away from Thee, and seeks without Thee what she cannot find pure and untainted until she returns to Thee. Thus all pervertedly imitate Thee who separate themselves far from Thee, and raise themselves up against Thee. But even by thus imitating Thee they acknowledge Thee to be the Creator of all nature, and so that there is no place whither they can altogether retire from Thee. 2 What, then, was it that I loved in that theft? And wherein did I, even corruptedly and pervertedly, imitate my Lord? Did I wish, if only by artifice, to act contrary to Thy law, because by power I could not, so that, being a captive, I might imitate an imperfect liberty by doing with impunity things which I was not allowed to do, in obscured likeness of Thy omnipotency? 3

3 "For even souls, in their very sins, strive after nothing else but some kind of likeness of God, in a proud and preposterous, and, so to say, slavish liberty. So neither could our first parents have been persuaded to sin unless it had been said, 'Ye shall be as gods.' " Aug. De Trin. xi. 5.

Behold this servant of Thine, fleeing from his Lord, and following a shadow! O rottenness! monstrosity of life and profundity of death! Could I like that which was unlawful only because it was unlawful?

Chap. vii. He gives thanks to God for the remission of his sins, and remind* every one that the Supreme God may have preserved us from greater sins.

1 5. "What shall I render unto the Lord," 2 that whilst my memory recalls these things my soul is not appalled at them? I will love Thee, Lord, and thank Thee, and confess unto Thy name, because Thou hast put away from me these so wicked and nefarious acts of mine.

To Thy grace I attribute it, and to Thy mercy, that Thou hast melted away my sin as it were ice. To Thy grace also I attribute whatsoever of evil I have not committed; for what might I not have committed, loving as I did the sin for the sin's sake? Yea, all I confess to have been pardoned me, both those which I committed by my own perverseness, and those which, by Thy guidance, I committed not. Where is he who, reflecting upon his own infirmity, dares to ascribe his chastity and innocency to his own strength, so that he should love Thee the less, as if he had been in less need of Thy mercy, whereby Thou dost forgive the transgressions of those that turn to Thee? For whosoever, called by Thee, obeyed Thy voice, and shunned those things which he reads me recalling and confessing of myself, let him not despise me, who, being sick, was healed by that same Physician by whose aid it was that he was not sick, or rather was less sick.

And for this let him love Thee as much, yea, all the more, since by whom he sees me to have been restored from so great a feebleness of sin, by Him he sees himself from a like feebleness to have been preserved.

Chap. viii. In his theft he loved the company of his fellow-sinnera.

16. " What fruit had I then," wretched one, in those things which, when I remember them, cause me shame above all in that theft, which I loved only for the theft's sake?

And

1 Jonah i. and iv. 2 Ps. cxvi. 12. * Rev. iii. 5.

CHAP. IX.] INFLUENCE OF BAD COMPANIONS. 35

as the theft itself was nothing, all the more wretched was I who loved it. Yet by myself alone I would not have done it I recall what my heart was alone I could not have done it. I loved, then, in it the companionship of my accomplices with whom I did it. I did not, therefore, love the theft alone yea, rather, it was that alone that I loved, for the companionship was nothing. What is the fact? Who is it that can teach me, but He who illuminateth mine heart and searcheth out the dark corners thereof? What is it that hath come into my mind to inquire about, to discuss, and to reflect upon? For had I at that time loved the pears I stole, and wished to enjoy them, I might have done so alone, if I could have been satisfied with the mere commission of the theft by which my pleasure was secured; nor needed I have provoked that itching of my own passions, by the encouragement of accomplices. But as my enjoyment was not in those pears, it was in the crime itself, which the company of my fellowsinners produced.
Chap. ix. It was a pleasure to him also to laugh when seriously deceiving others.

17. By what feelings, then, was I animated? For it was in truth too shameful; and woe was me who had it. But still what was it? "Who can understand his errors?"! We laughed, because our hearts were tickled at the thought of deceiving those who little imagined what we were doing, and would have vehemently disapproved of it. Yet, again, why did I so rejoice in this, that I did it not alone? Is it that no one readily laughs alone? No one does so readily; but yet sometimes, when men are alone by themselves, nobody being by, a fit of laughter overcomes them when anything very droll presents itself to their senses or mind. Yet alone I would not have done it alone I could not at all have done it. Behold, my God, the lively recollection of my soul is laid bare before Thee—alone I had not committed that theft, wherein what I stole pleased me not, but rather the act of stealing; nor to have done it alone would I have liked so well, neither would I have done it. O Friendship too unfriendly! thou mysterious seducer of the soul, thou greediness to do mischief out of mirth and wantonness, thou craving for others' loss, without desire for my own profit or revenge; but when they say, "Let us go, let us do it," we are ashamed not to be shameless.

Chap. x. With God there is true rest and life unchanging.

18. Who can unravel that twisted and tangled knottiness? It is foul. I hate to reflect on it. I hate to look on it. But thee do I long for, O righteousness and innocency, fair and comely to all virtuous eyes, and of a satisfaction that never palls! With thee is perfect rest, and life unchanging. He who enters into thee enters into the joy of his Lord, I and shall have no fear, and shall do excellently in the most Excellent. I sank away from Thee, my God, and I wandered too far from Thee, my stay, in my youth, and became to myself an unfruitful land.

OF THE SEVENTEENTH, EIGHTEENTH, AND NINETEENTH YEARS OF HIS AGE, PASSED AT CARTHAGE, WHEN, HAVING COMPLETED HIS COURSE OF STUDIES, HE IS CAUGHT IN THE SNARES OF A LICENTIOUS PASSION, AND FALLS INTO THE ERRORS OF THE MANICH^ANS.

Chap. i. Deluded by an insane love, he, though foul and dishonourable, desires to be thought elegant and urbane.

1. r l 10 Carthage I came, where a cauldron of unholy loves
I bubbled up all around me. I loved not as yet, yet I loved to love; and, with a hidden want, I abhorred myself that I wanted not. I searched about for something to love, in love with loving, and hating security, and a way not beset with snares. For within me I had a dearth of that inward food, Thyself, my God, though that dearth caused me no hunger; but I remained without all desire for incorruptible food, not because I was already filled thereby, but the more empty I was the more I loathed it. For this reason my soul was far from well, and, full of ulcers, it miserably cast itself forth, craving to be excited by contact with objects of sense. Yet, had these no soul, they would not surely inspire love. To love and to be loved was sweet to me, and all the more when I succeeded in enjoying the person I loved. I befouled, therefore, the spring of friendship with the filth of concupiscence, and I dimmed its lustre with the hell of lustfulness; and yet, foul and dishonourable as I was, I craved, through an excess of vanity, to be thought elegant and urbane. I fell precipitately, then, into the love in which I longed to be ensnared. My God, my mercy, with how much bitterness didst Thou, out of Thy infinite goodness, besprinkle for me that sweetness! For I was both beloved, and secretly arrived at the bond of enjoying; and was joyfully bound with troublesome ties, that I might be scourged with the burning iron rods of jealousy, suspicion, fear, anger, and strife.

38 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK III]

Chap. ii. In public spectacles he is moved by an empty compassion. He is attacked by a troublesome spiritual disease.

2. Stage-plays also drew me away, full of representations of my miseries and of fuel to my fire. 1 Why does man like to be made sad when viewing doleful and tragical scenes, which yet he himself would by no means suffer? And yet he wishes, as a spectator, to experience from them a sense of grief, and in this very grief his pleasure consists. What is this but wretched insanity? For a man is more affected with these actions, the less free he is from such affections. Howsoever, when he suffers in his own person, it is the custom to style it "misery;" but when he compassionates others, then it is styled "mercy." 2 But what kind of mercy is it that arises from fictitious and scenic passions? The hearer is not expected to relieve, but merely invited to grieve; and the more he grieves, the more he applauds the actor of these fictions. And if the misfortunes of the characters (whether of olden times or merely imaginary) be so represented as not to touch the feelings of the spectator, he goes away disgusted and censorious; but if his feelings be touched, he sits it out attentively, and sheds tears of joy.

3. Are sorrows, then, also loved? Surely all men desire to rejoice? Or, as man wishes to be miserable, is he, nevertheless, glad to be merciful, which, because it cannot exist without passion, for this cause alone are passions loved? This also is from that vein of friendship. But whither does it go? Whither does it flow? Wherefore runs it into that torrent of pitch, 3 seething forth those huge tides of loathsome lusts into which it is changed and transformed, being of its own will cast away and corrupted from its celestial clearness? Shall, then, mercy be repudiated? By no means. Let us, therefore, love sorrows sometimes. But beware of uncleanness, my soul, under the protection of my God, the God of our fathers, who is to be praised and exalted above all for ever, 1 beware of uncleanness. For I have not now ceased to have compassion; but then in the theatres I sympathized with lovers when they sinfully enjoyed one another, although this was done fictitiously in the play. And when they lost one another, I grieved with them, as if pitying them, and yet had delight in both.

But now-a-days I feel much more pity for him that delighteth in his wickedness, than for him who is counted as enduring hardships by failing to obtain some pernicious pleasure, and the loss of some miserable felicity. This, surely, is the truer mercy, but grief hath no delight in it. For though he that condoles with the unhappy be approved for his office of charity, yet would he who had real compassion rather there were nothing for him to abate. For if good-will be ill-willed (which it cannot), then can he who is truly and sincerely commiserating wish that there should be some unhappy ones, that he might commiserate them. Some grief may then be justified, none loved. For thus dost Thou, O Lord God, who lovest souls far more purely than do we, and art more incorruptibly compassionate, although Thou art wounded by no sorrow. " And who is sufficient for these things ? " 2

4. But I, wretched one, then loved to grieve, and sought out what to grieve at, as when, in another man’s misery, though feigned and counterfeited, that delivery of the actor best pleased me, and attracted me the most powerfully, which moved me to tears. What marvel was it that an unhappy sheep, straying from Thy flock, and impatient of Thy care, I became infected with a foul disease ? And hence came my love of griefs not such as should probe me too deeply, for I loved not to suffer such things as I loved to look upon, but such as, when hearing their fictions, should lightly affect the surface; upon which, like as with empoisoned nails, folowed burning, swelling, putrefaction, and horrible corruption. Such was my life ! But was it life, my God ?

40 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK III.]

Chap. hi. Not even when at church does he suppress his desires. In the School of Rhetoric he abhors the acts of the subverters.

5. And Thy faithful mercy hovered over me afar. Upon what unseemly iniquities did I wear myself out, following a sacrilegious curiosity, that, having deserted Thee, it might drag me into the treacherous abyss, and to the beguiling obedience of devils, unto whom I immolated my wicked deeds, and in all which Thou didst scourge me ! I dared, even while Thy solemn rites were being celebrated within the walls of Thy church, to desire, and to plan a business sufficient to procure me the fruits of death; for which Thou chastisedst me with grievous punishments, but nothing in comparison with my fault, O Thou my greatest mercy, my God, my refuge from those terrible hurts, among which I wandered with presumptuous neck, receding farther from Thee, loving my own ways, and not Thine loving a vagrant liberty.

6. Those studies, also, which were accounted honourable, were directed towards the courts of law; to excel in which, the more crafty I was, the more I should be praised. Such is the blindness of men, that they even glory in their blindness.
And now I was head in the School of Rhetoric, whereat I rejoiced proudly, and became inflated with arrogance, though more sedate, Lord, as Thou knowest, and altogether removed from the subvertings of those " subverters " 1 (for this stupid and diabolical name was held to be the very brand of gallantry) amongst whom I lived, with an impudent shamefacedness that I was not even as they were. And with them I was, and at times I was delighted with their friendship whose acts I ever abhorred, that is, their "subverting," wherewith they insolently attacked the modesty of strangers, which they disturbed by uncalled for jeers, gratifying thereby their mischievous mirth. Nothing can more nearly resemble the

"This appears to have been a name which a pestilent and savage set of persons gave themselves, licentious alike in speech and action. Augustine names them again, De Vera Relig. c. 40; Ep. 185 ad Bonifac. c. 4; and below, v. c. 12; whence they seem to have consisted mainly of Carthaginian students, whose savage life is mentioned again, ib. c. 8." actions of devils than these. By what name, therefore, could they be more truly called than "subverters"? being themselves subverted first, and altogether perverted being secretly mocked at and seduced by the deceiving spirits, in what they themselves delight to jeer at and deceive others.

Chap. iv. In the nineteenth year of his age (his father having died two years before) he is led by the "Hortensius" of Cicero to "philosophy," to God, and a better mode of thinking.

7. Among such as these, at that unstable period of my life, I studied books of eloquence, wherein I was eager to be eminent from a damnable and inflated purpose, even a delight in human vanity. In the ordinary course of study, I lighted upon a certain book of Cicero, whose language, though not his heart, almost all admire. This book of his contains an exhortation to philosophy, and is called Hortensius. This book, in truth, changed my affections, and turned my prayers to Thyself, Lord, and made me have other hopes and desires. Worthless suddenly became every vain hope to me; and, with an incredible warmth of heart, I yearned for an immortality of wisdom, and began now to arise' that I might return to Thee. Not, then, to improve my language which I appeared to be purchasing with my mother's means, in that my nineteenth year, my father having died two years before not to improve my language did I have recourse to that book; nor did it persuade me by its style, but its matter.

8. How ardent was I then, my God, how ardent to fly from earthly things to Thee! Nor did I know how Thou wouldst deal with me. For with Thee is wisdom. In Greek the love of wisdom is called "philosophy," with which that book inflamed me. There be some who seduce through philosophy, under a great, and alluring, and honourable name colouring and adorning their own errors. And almost all who in that and former times were such, are in that book censured and pointed out. There is also disclosed that most salutary admonition of Thy Spirit, by Thy good and pious servant: "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ: for in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." x And since at that time (as Thou, Light of my heart, knowest) the words of the apostle were unknown to me, I was delighted with that exhortation, in so far only as I was thereby stimulated, and enkindled, and inflamed to love, seek, obtain, hold, and embrace, not this or that sect, but wisdom itself, whatever it were; and this alone checked me thus ardent, that the name of Christ was not in it. For this name, according to Thy mercy, Lord, this name of my Saviour Thy Son, had my tender heart piously drunk in, deeply treasured even with my mother's milk; and whatsoever was without that name, though never so erudite, polished, and truthful, took not complete hold of me.
1 Up to the time of Cicero the Romans employed the term sapientia for QiXtttroipia, (Monboddo's Ancient Metaphys. i. 5). It is interesting to watch the effect of the philosophy in which they had been trained on the writings of some of the Fathers. Even Justin Martyr, the first after the "Apostolic," has traces of this influence. See the account of his search for "wisdom," and conversion, in his Dialogue with Trypho, li. and iii.

Chap. v. He rejects the Sacred Scriptures as too simple, and as not to be compared with the dignity of Tally.

9. I resolved, therefore, to direct my mind to the Holy Scriptures, that I might see what they were. And behold, I perceive something not comprehended by the proud, not disclosed to children, but lowly as you approach, sublime as you advance, and veiled in mysteries; and I was not of the number of those who could enter into it, or bend my neck to follow its steps. For not as when now I speak did I feel when I turned towards those Scriptures, 2 but they appeared to me to be

1 Col. ii. 8, 9.

2 In connection with the opinion Augustine formed of the Scriptures before and after his conversion, it is interesting to recall Fenelon's glowing description of the literary merit of the Bible. The whole passage might well be quoted did space permit: " L'Ecriture surpasse en naïveté, en vivacité, en grandeur, tous les écrivains de Rome et de la Grèce. Jamais Homère même n'a approché de la sublimité de Moïse dans ses cantiques. . . . Jamais nulle ode Grecque ou Latine n'a pu atteindre à la hauteur des Psalms. . . . Jamais Homère ni aucun autre poète n'a égale Isiaie peignant la majesté de Dieu. . . . Tantôt ce prophète a toute la douceur et toute la tendresse d'une églogue, dans les riantes peintures qu'il fait de la paix; tantôt il s'élève jusqu'à laisser tout au-dessous de lui. Mais qu'y a-t-il, dans l'antiquité profane, de comparable au tendre Jéremie, unworthy to be compared with the dignity of Tully; for my inflated pride shunned their style, nor could the sharpness of my wit pierce their inner meaning. 1 Yet, truly, were they such as would develope in little ones; but I scorned to be a little one, and, swollen with pride, I looked upon myself as a great one.

Chap. VI. Deceived by his own fault, he falls into the errors of the Mankhmans, who gloried in the true knowledge of God and in a thorough examination of things.

10. Therefore I fell among men proudly raving, very carnal, and voluble, in whose mouths were the snares of the devil

the bird-lime being composed of a mixture of the syllables of Thy name, and of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the Paraclete, the Holy Ghost, the Comforter. 2 These names departed not out of their mouths, but so far forth as the sound only and the clatter of the tongue, for the heart was empty of truth. Still they cried, " Truth, Truth," and spoke much about it to me,

" yet was it not in them;" 8 but they spake falsely not of Thee only who, verily, art the Truth but also of these elements of this world, Thy creatures. And I, in truth, should have deplorant les maux de son peuple; ou a Nahum, voyant de loin, en esprit, bomber la superbe Ninive sous les efforts d'une armée innombrable ? On croit voir cette armée, ou croit entendre le bruit des armes et des chariots; tout est depeint d'une manière vive qui saisit l'imagination; il laisse Homere loin derriere lui. . . Enfin, il y a autant de difference entre les poetes profanes et les prophetes, iju'il y en a entre le veritable enthousiasme et le faux." Surl'Eioq. de la Chaire, Dial. iii.

1 Thatis probablythe "spiritual" meaning on which Ambrose (vi. 6, below) laid bo much emphasis. How different is the attitude of mind indicated in xi. 3 from the spiritual pride which beset him at this period of his life! When converted lie became as a little child, and ever looked to God as a Father, from whom he must receive both light and strength. He speaks, on Ps. cxlvi., of the Scriptures, which were plain to "the little ones," being obscured to the mocking spirit of the Manichseans. See also below, iii. 14, note.

2 So, in Book xxii. sec. 13 of his reply to Faustus, he charges them with "professing to believe the New Testament in order to entrap the unwary;" and again, in sec. 15, he says: "They claim the impious liberty of holding and teaching, that whatever they deem favourable to their heresy was said by Christ and the apostles; while they have the profane boldness to say, that whatever in the same writings is unfavourable to them is a spurious interpolation." They professed to believe in the doctrine of the Trinity, but affirmed (ibid. xx. 6) "that the Father dwells in a secret light, the power of the Son in the sun, and His wisdom in the moon, and the Holy Spirit in the air." It was this employment of the phraseology of Scripture to convey doctrines utterly unscriptural that rendered their teaching such a snare to the unwary. See also below, v. 12, note.

passed by philosophers, even when speaking truth concerning them, for love of Thee, my Father, supremely good, beauty of all things beautiful! Truth, Truth! how inwardly even then did the marrow of my soul pant after Thee, when they frequently, and in a multiplicity of ways, and in numerous and huge books, sounded out Thy name to me, though it was but a voice! 1 And these were the dishes in which to me, hungering for Thee, they, instead of Thee, served up the sun and moon, Thy beauteous works but yet Thy works, not Thyself, nay, nor Thy first works. For before these corporeal works are Thy spiritual ones, celestial and shining though they be. But I hungered and thirsted not even after those first works of Thine, but after Thee Thyself, the Truth, "with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning;" 2 yet they still served up to me in those dishes glowing phantasies, than which better were it to love this very sun (which, at least, is true to our sight), than those illusions which deceive the mind through the eye. And yet, because I supposed them to be Thee, I fed upon them; not with avidity, for Thou didst not taste to my mouth as Thou art, for Thou wast not these empty fictions; neither was I nourished by them, but the rather exhausted. Food in our sleep appears like our food awake; yet the sleepers are not nourished by it, for they are asleep.

But those things were not in any way like unto Thee as Thou hast now spoken unto me, in that those were corporeal phantasies, false bodies, than which these true bodies, whether celestial or terrestrial, which we perceive with our fleshly sight, are much more certain. These things the very beasts

1 There was something peculiarly enthralling to an ardent mind like Augustine's in the Manichsean system. That system was kindred in many ways to modern Rationalism. Reason was exalted at the expense of faith. Nothing was received on mere authority, and the disciple's inner consciousness was the touchstone of truth. The result of this is well pointed out by Augustine (Con. Faust, xxxii. sec. 19): "Your design, clearly, is to deprive Scripture of all authority, and to make every man's mind the judge what passage of Scripture he is to approve of, and what to disapprove of. This is not to be subject to Scripture in matters of faith, but to make Scripture subject to you. Instead of making the high authority of Scripture the reason of approval, every man makes his approval the reason for thinking a passage correct."

Compare also Con. Faust, xi. sec. 2, and xxxii. sec. 16. " Jas. i. 17.

md birds perceive as well as we, and they are more certain ihan when we imagine them. And again, we do with more certainty imagine them, than by them conceive of other greater and infinite bodies which have no existence. With such empty husks was I then fed, and was not fed. But Thou, thy Love, in looking for whom I fail 1 that I may be strong, art neither those bodies that we see, although in heaven, nor art Thou those which we see not there; for Thou hast created them, nor dost Thou reckon them amongst Thy greatest works.

How far, then, art Thou from those phantasies of mine, phantasies of bodies which are not at all, than which the images of those bodies which are, are more certain, and still more certain the bodies themselves, winch yet Thou art not; nay, nor yet the soul, which is the life of the bodies. Better, then, and more certain is the life of bodies than the bodies themselves.

But Thou art the life of souls, the life of lives, having life in Thyself; and Thou changest not, Life of my soul.

11. Where, then, wert Thou then to me, and how far from me ? Far, indeed, was I wandering away from Thee, being even shut out from the very husks of the swine, whom with husks I fed. 2 For how much better, then, are the fables of the grammarians and poets than these snares ! For verses, and poems, and Medea flying, are more profitable truly than these men's five elements, variously painted, to answer to the five caves of darkness, 3 none of which exist, and which slay the believer. For verses and poems I can turn into 4 true food, but the "Medea flying," though I sang, I maintained it not; though I heard it sung, I believed it not; but those things I did believe. Woe, woe, by what steps was I dragged down to "the depths of hell!" 5 toiling and turmoiling through want of Truth, when I sought after Thee,

4 "Of this passage St. Augustine is probably speaking when he says, ' Praises bestowed on bread in simplicity of heart, let him (Petilian) defame, if he will, by the ludicrous title of poisoning and corrupting frenzy. my God, to Thee I confess it, who hadst mercy on me when I had not yet confessed, sought after Thee not according to the understanding of the mind, in which Thou desiredst that I should excel the beasts, but according to the sense of the flesh! Thou wert more inward to me than my most inward part; and higher than my highest. I came upon that bold woman, who " is simple, and knoweth nothing," * the enigma of Solomon, sitting " at the door of the house on a seat," and saying, " Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant." 2 This woman seduced me, because she found my soul beyond its portals, dwelling in the eye of my flesh, and thinking on such food as through it I had devoured.

Chap. vii. He attacks the doctrine of the Manichceans concerning evil, God, and the righteousness of the patriarchs.

12. For I was ignorant as to that which really is, and was, as it were, violently moved to give my support to foolish deceivers, when they asked me, " Whence is evil? " 3 and, " Is God limited by a bodily shape, and has He hairs and nails? " and, " Are they to be esteemed righteous who had many wives at once, and did kill men, and sacrificed living creatures? " 4 At which tilings I, in my ignorance, was much disturbed, and, retreating from the truth, I appeared to myself to be going towards it; because as yet I knew not that evil was naught but a privation of good, until in the end it ceases altogether to be; which how should I see, the sight of whose eyes saw no further than bodies, and of my mind no farther than a phantasm? And I knew not God to be a Spirit, 5 not one who hath parts extended in length and breadth, nor whose

3 The strange mixture of the pensive philosophy of Persia with Gnosticism and Christianity, propounded by Manichams, attempted to solve this question, which was " the great object of heretical inquiry" (Mansel's Gnostics, lee. i.).
It was Augustine's desire for knowledge concerning it that united him to this sect, and which also led him to forsake it, when he found therein nothing but empty fables (De Lib. Arb. i. sec. 4.) Manichaeus taught that evil and good were primeval, and had independent existences. Augustine, on the other hand, maintains that it was not possible for evil so to exist (De Civ. Dei, xi. sec. 22), but, as he here states, evil is "a privation of good." The evil will has a causa deficiens, but not a causa effiriens (ibid. xii. 6), as is exemplified in the fall of the angels.

CHAP. VII. LAW OF PROGRESS IN SCRIPTURE. 4*7

being was bulk; for every bulk is less in a part than in the whole, and, if it be infinite, it must be less in such part as is limited by a certain space than in its infinity; and cannot be wholly everywhere, as Spirit, as God is. And what that should be in us, by which we were like unto God, and might rightly in Scripture be said to be after "the image of God," * I was entirely ignorant.

13. Nor had I knowledge of that true inner righteousness, which doth not judge according to custom, but out of the most perfect law of God Almighty, by which the manners of places and times were adapted to those places and times being itself the while the same always and everywhere, not one thing in one place, and another in another; according to which Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and Moses, and David, and all those commended by the mouth of God were righteous, 2 but were judged unrighteous by foolish men, judging out of man's judgment, 3 and gauging by the petty standard of their own manners the manners of the whole human race. Like as if in an armoury, one knowing not what were adapted to the several members should put greaves on his head, or boot himself with a helmet, and then complain because they would not fit. Or as if, on some day when in the afternoon business was forbidden, one were to fume at not being allowed to sell as it was lawful to him in the forenoon. Or when in some house he sees a servant take something in his hand which the butler is not permitted to touch, or something done behind a stable which would be prohibited in the diningroom, and should be indignant that in one house, and one family, the same thing is not distributed everywhere to all.

Such are they who cannot endure to hear something to have been lawful for righteous men in former times which is not so now; or that God, for certain temporal reasons, commanded them one thing, and these another, but both obeying the same righteousness; though they see, in one man, one day, and one house, different things to be fit for different members, and a thing which was formerly lawful after a time unlawful that permitted or commanded in one corner, which done in another is justly prohibited and punished. Is justice, then, various and changeable? Nay, but the times over which she presides are not all alike, because they are times. 1 But men, whose days upon the earth are few, 2 because by their own perception they cannot harmonize the causes of former ages and other nations, of which they had no experience, with these of which they have experience, though in one and the same body, day, or family, they can readily see what is suitable for each member, season, part, and person to the one they take exception, to the other they submit.

14. These things I then knew not, nor observed. They met my eyes on every side, and I saw them not. I composed poems, in which it was not permitted me to place every foot everywhere, but in one metre one way, and in another another, nor even in any one verse the same foot in all places. Yet the art itself by which I composed had not different principles for these different cases, but comprised all in one. Still I saw not how that righteousness, which good and holy men submitted to, far more excellently and sublimely comprehended in one all those things which God com-

' The law of the development of revelation implied in the above passage is one to which Augustine frequently resorts in confutation of objections such as those to which lie refers in the previous and following sections. It may likewise be effectively used when similar objections are raised by modern sceptics. In the Rabbinical books there is a tradition of the wanderings of the children of Israel, that not only did their clothes not wax old (Deut. xxix. 5) during those forty years, but that they grew with their growth. The written word is as it were the swaddling-clothes of the holy child Jesus; and as the revelation concerning Him the Word Incarnate grew, did the written word grow. God spoke in sundry parts [voXvipipus] and in divers manners unto the fathers by the prophets (Heb. i. 1); but when the "fulness of the time was come" (Gal. iv. 4), He completed the revelation in His Son. Our Lord indicates this principle when He speaks of divorce in Matt. xix. 8. "Moses," he says, "because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives; but from the beginning it was not so." (See Con Faust, xix. 26, 29.) When objections, then, as to obsolete ritual usages, or the sins committed by Old Testament worthies are urged, the answer is plain: the ritual has become obsolete, because only intended for the infancy of revelation, and the sins, while recorded in, are not approved by Scripture, and those who committed them will be judged according to the measure of revelation they received. See also De Ver. Relig.
xvii.; in Ps. lxiii. 1, liv. 22; Con. Faust, xxii. 25; Trench, Hulsean Lees, iv., v. (.1845);

manded, and in no part varied, though in varying times it did not prescribe all things at once, but distributed and enjoined what was proper for each. And I, being blind, blamed those pious fathers, not only for making use of present things as God commanded and inspired them to do, but also for foreshowing things to come as God was revealing them.

Chap. viii. He argues against the same as to the reason of offences.

15. Can it at any time or place be an unrighteous thing for a man to love God with all his heart, with all his soul, and with all his mind, and his neighbour as himself? 2 Therefore those offences which be contrary to nature are everywhere and at all times to be held in detestation and punished; such were those of the Sodomites, which should all nations commit, they should all be held guilty of the same crime by the divine law, which hath not so made men that they should in that way abuse one another. For even that fellowship which should be between God and us is violated, when that same nature of which He is author is polluted by the perversity of lust. But those offences which are contrary to the customs of men are to be avoided according to the customs severally prevailing; so that an agreement made, and confirmed by custom or law of any city or nation, may not be violated at the lawless pleasure of any, whether citizen or stranger. For any part which is not consistent with its whole is unseemly. But when God commands anything contrary to the customs or compacts of any nation to be done, though it

1 Here, as at the end of sec. 17, he alludes to the typical and allegorical character of Old Testament histories. Though he does not with Origen go so far as to disparage the letter of Scripture (see De Civ. Dei, xiii. 21), but upholds it, he constantly employs the allegorical principle. He (alluding to the patriarchs) goes so far, indeed, as to say (Con. Faust, xxii. 24), that "not only the speech but the life of these men was prophetic; and the whole kingdom of the Hebrews was like a great prophet; " and again: " "We may discover a prophecy of the coming ot Christ and of the Church both in what they said and what they did." This method of interpretation he first learned from Ambrose. See note on "the letter killeth," etc. (below, vi. sec. 6), for the danger attending it. On the general subject, reference may also be made to his in Ps. cxxxvi. 3 j Serm. 2; De Tentat. Abr. sec. 7; and De Civ. Dei, xvii. 3.

were never done by them before, it is to be done; and if intermitted it is to be restored, and, if never established, to be established. For if it be lawful for a king, in the state over which he reigns, to command that which neither he himself nor any one before him had commanded, and to obey him cannot be held to be inimical to the public interest, nay, it were so if he were not obeyed (for obedience to princes is a general compact of human society), how much more, then, ought we unhesitatingly to obey God, the Governor of all His creatures! For as among the authorities of human society the greater authority is obeyed before the lesser, so must God above all.

16. So also in deeds of violence, where there is a desire to harm, whether by contumely or injury; and both of these either by reason of revenge, as one enemy against another; or to obtain some advantage over another, as the highwayman to the traveller; or for the avoiding of some evil, as with him who is in fear of another; or through envy, as the unfortunate man to one who is happy; or as he that is prosperous in anything to him who he fears will become equal to himself, or whose equality he grieves at; or for the mere pleasure in another's pains, as the spectators of gladiators, or the deriders and mockers of others. These be the chief iniquities which spring forth from the lust of the flesh, of the eye, and of power, whether singly, or two together, or all at once. And so do men live in opposition to the three and seven, that psaltery
"of ten strings," * Thy ten commandments, God most high and most sweet. But what foul offences can there be against Thee who canst not be defiled? Or what deeds of violence against Thee who canst not be harmed? But Thou avengest

1 Ps. cxliv. 9. " St. Augustine (Qucest. in Exod. ii. qu. 71) mentions the two modes of dividing the ten commandments into three and seven, or four and six, and gives what appear to have been his own private reasons for preferring the first. Both commonly existed in his day, but the Anglican mode appears to have been the most usual. It occurs in Origen, Greg. Naz., Jerome, Ambrose, Chrys. St. Augustine alludes to his division again, Serm. 8, 9, de x. Chordis, and sec. 33 on this psalm: 'To the first commandment there belong three strings, because God is trine. To the other, i.e. the love of our neighbour, seven strings. These let us join to those three, which belong to the love of God, if we would on the psaltery of ten strings sing a new song.' " E. B. that which men perpetrate against themselves, seeing also that when they sin against Thee, they do wickedly against their own souls; and iniquity gives itself the lie, 1 either by corrupting or perverting their nature, which Thou hast made and ordained, or by an immoderate use of things permitted, or in " burning " in things forbidden to that use which is against nature; 2 or when convicted, raging with heart and voice against Thee, kicking against the pricks; 3 or when, breaking through the pale of human society, they audaciously rejoice in private combinations or divisions, according as they have been pleased or offended. And these things are done whenever Thou art forsaken, O Fountain of Life, who art the only and true Creator and Ruler of the universe, and by a self-willed pride any one false thing is selected therefrom and loved. So, then, by a humble piety we return to Thee; and Thou purgest us from our evil customs, and art merciful unto the sins of those who confess unto Thee, and dost "hear the groaning of the prisoner," 4 and dost loosen us from those fetters which we have forged for ourselves, if we lift not up against Thee the horns of a false liberty, losing all through craving more, by loving more our own private good than Thee, the good of all.

Chap. ix. That the judgment of God and men, as to human acts of violence, is different.

17. But amidst these offences of infamy and violence, and so many iniquities, are the sins of men who are, on the whole, making progress: which, by those who judge rightly, and after the rule of perfection, are censured, yet commended withal, upon the hope of bearing fruit, like as in the green blade of the growing corn. And there are some which resemble offences of infamy or violence, and yet are not sins, because they neither offend Thee, our Lord God, nor social custom: when, for example, things suitable for the times are provided for the use of life, and we are uncertain whether it be out of a lust of having; or when acts are punished by constituted authority for the sake of correction, and we are uncertain whether it be out of a lust of hurting. Many a deed, then, which in the sight of men is disapproved, is approved by Thy testimony; and many a one who is praised by men is, Thou being witness, condemned; because frequently the view of the deed, and the mind of the doer, and the hidden exigency of the period, severally vary. But when Thou unexpectedly commandest an unusual and unthoughtof thing yea, even if Thou hast formerly forbidden it, and still for the time keepest secret the reason of Thy command, and it even be contrary to the ordinance of some society of men, who doubts but it is to be done, inasmuch as that society is righteous which serves Thee ? x But blessed are they who know Thy commands ! For all things were done by them who served Thee either to exhibit something necessary at the time, or to foreshow things to come.' 2

Chap. X. He reproves the triflings of the Manichceans as to the fruits of the earth.
18. These things being ignorant of, I derided those holy servants and prophets of Thine. And what did I gain by deriding them but to be derided by Thee, being insensibly, and little by little, led on to those follies, as to credit that a fig-tree wept when it was plucked, and that the mother-tree shed milky tears ? Which fig notwithstanding, plucked not by his own but another's wickedness, had some " saint " 3 eaten and mingled with his entrails, he should breathe out

1 The Manichseans, like the deistical writers of the last century, attacked the spoiling of the Egyptians, the slaughter of the Canaanites, and such episodes. Referring to the former, Augustine says (Con. Faust, xxii. 71), "Then, as for Faustus' objection to the spoiling of the Egyptians, he knows not what he says. In this Moses not only did not sin, but it would have been sin not to do it. It was by the command of God, who, from His knowledge both of the actions and of the hearts of men, can decide upon what every one should be made to suffer, and through whose agency. The people at that time were still carnal, and engrossed with earthly affection; while the Egyptians were in open rebellion against God, for they used the gold, God's creature, in the service of idols, to the dishonour of the Creator, and they had grievously oppressed strangers by making them work without pay. Thus the Egyptians deserved the punishment, and the Israelites were suitably employed in inflicting it." For an exhaustive vindication of the conduct of the children of Israel as the agents of God in punishing the Canaanites, see Graves on the Pentateuch, Part iii. lecture 1. See also De Civ. Dei, i. 26; and Quaint, in Jos. 8, 16, etc.

of it angels; yea, in his prayers he shall assuredly groan and sigh forth particles of God, which particles of the most high and true God should have remained bound in that fig unless they had been set free by the teeth and belly of some " elect saint " ! * And I, miserable one, believed that more mercy was to be shown to the fruits of the earth than unto men, for whom they were created; for if a hungry man who was not a Manichtean should beg for any, that morsel which should be given him would appear, as it were, condemned to capital punishment. 2

Chap. xi. He refers to the tears, and the memorable dream concerning her son, granted by God to his mother.

19. And Thou sendedst Thine hand from above, 3 and drewest my soul out of that profound darkness, when my mother, Thy faithful one, wept to Thee on my behalf more than mothers are wont to weep the bodily deaths of their children. For she saw that I was dead by that faith and spirit which she had from Thee, and Thou heardest her, O Lord. Thou heardest her, and despisedst not her tears, when, pouring down, they watered the earth 4 under her eyes in every place where she prayed; yea, Thou hearest her. For whence was that dream with which Thou consoledst her, so that she permitted me to live with her, and to have my meals at the same table in the house, which she had begun to avoid,
1 According to this extraordinary system, it was the privilege of the "elect" to set free in eating such parts of the divine substance as were imprisoned in the vegetable creation (Con. Faust, xxxi. 5). They did not marry or work in the fields, and led an ascetic life, the "hearers" or catechumens being privileged to provide them with food. The "elect" passed immediately on dying into the realm of light, while, as a reward for their service, the souls of the "hearers" after death transmigrated into plants (from which they might be most readily freed), or into the "elect," so as, in their turn, to pass away into the realm of light. See Con. Faust, v. 10, xx. 23; and in Ps. cxl.

2 Augustine frequently alludes to their conduct to the poor, in refusing to give them bread or the fruits of the earth, lest in eating they should defile the portion of God contained therein. But to avoid the odium of their conduct, they would inconsequently give money whereby food might be bought. See in Ps. cxl. sec. 12; and De Mor. Mankh. 86, 37, and 53.

hating and detesting the blasphemies of my error? For she saw herself standing on a certain wooden rule, 1 and a bright youth advancing towards her, joyous and smiling upon her, whilst she was grieving and bowed down with sorrow. But he having inquired of her the cause of her sorrow and daily weeping (lie wishing to teach, as is their wont, and not to be taught), and she answering that it was my perdition she was lamenting, he bade her rest contented, and told her to behold and see "that where she was, there was I also." And when she looked she saw me standing near her on the same rule. Whence was this, unless that Thine ears were inclined towards her heart? Thou Good Omnipotent, who so carest for every one of us as if Thou caredst for him only, and so for all as if they were but one!

20. Whence was this, also, that when she had narrated this vision to me, and I tried to put this construction on it, "That she rather should not despair of being some day what I was," she immediately, without hesitation, replied, "No; for it was not told me that 'where he is, there shalt thou be,' but 'where thou art, there shall he be' "? I confess to Thee,

Lord, that, to the best of my remembrance (and I have oft spoken of this), Thy answer through my watchful mother that she was not disquieted by the speciousness of my false interpretation, and saw in a moment what was to be seen, and which I myself had not in truth perceived before she spake even then moved me more than the dream itself, by which the happiness to that pious woman, to be realized so long after, was, for the alleviation of her present anxiety, so long before predicted. For nearly nine years passed in which

I wallowed in the slime of that deep pit and the darkness of falsehood, striving often to rise, but being all the more heavily dashed down. But yet that chaste, pious, and sober widow (such as Thou lovest), now more buoyed up with hope, though no whit less zealous in her weeping and mourning, desisted not, at all the hours of her supplications, to bewail my case unto Thee. And her prayers entered into Thy presence, and yet Thou didst still suffer me to be involved and re-involved in that darkness.

CHAP. XII.] HIS MOTHER'S ANXIETY. 55

Chap. xii. The excellent answer of the bishop when referred to by his mother as to the conversion of her son.

21. And meanwhile Thou grantedst her another answer, which I recall; for much I pass over, hastening on to those things which the more strongly impel me to confess unto Thee, and much I do not remember. Thou didst grant her then another answer, by a priest of Thine, a certain bishop, reared in Thy Church and well versed in Thy books. He, when this woman had entreated that he would vouchsafe to have some talk with me, refute my errors, unteach me evil things, and teach me good (for this he was in the habit of doing when he found people fitted to receive it), refused, very prudently, as I afterwards came to see. For he answered that I was still unteachable, being inflated with the novelty of that heresy, and that I had already perplexed divers inexperienced persons with vexatious questions, 1 as she had informed him. " But leave him alone for a time," saith he, " only pray God for him; he will of himself, by reading, discover what that error is, and how great its impiety." He disclosed to her at the same time how he himself, when a little one, had, by his misguided mother, been given over to the Manichaeans, and had not only read, but even written out almost all their books, and had come to see (without argument or proof from any one) how much that sect was to be shunned, and had shunned it. Which when he had said, and she would not be satisfied, but repeated more earnestly her entreaties, shedding copious tears, that he would see and discourse with me, he, a little vexed at her importunity, exclaimed, " Go thy way, and God bless thee, for it is not possible that the son of these tears should perish." Which answer (as she often mentioned in her conversations with me) she accepted as though it were a voice from heaven.
We can easily understand that Augustine's dialectic skill would render him a formidable opponent, while, with the zeal of a neophyte, he urged those difficulties of Scripture (De Agon. Christ, iv.) which the Manichaeans knew so well how to employ. In an interesting passage (De Duab. Anim. con. Manich. ix.) he tells us that his victories over "inexperienced persons" stimulated him to fresh conquests, and thus kept him bound longer than he would otherwise have been in the chains of this heresy.

THEN FOLLOWS A PERIOD OF NINE YEARS FROM THE NINETEENTH YEAR OF HIS AGE, DURING WHICH, HAVING LOST A FRIEND, HE FOLLOWED THE MANICHAEANS AND WROTE BOOKS ON THE FAIR AND FIT, AND PUBLISHED A WORK ON THE LIBERAL ARTS, AND THE CATEGORIES OF ARISTOTLE.

Chap. i. Concerning that most unhappy time in which he, being deceived, deceived others; and concerning the mockers of his confession,

1. "T~UEING this space of nine years, then, from my seventeenth to my eight and twentieth year, we went on seduced and seducing, deceived and deceiving, in divers lusts; publicly, by sciences which they style "liberal" secretly, with a falsity called religion. Here proud, there superstitious, everywhere vain! Here, striving after the emptiness of popular fame, even to theatrical applauses, and poetic contests, and strifes for grassy garlands, and the follies of shows and the intemperance of desire. There, seeking to be purged from these our corruptions by carrying food to those who were called "elect" and "holy," out of which, in the laboratory of their stomachs, they should make for us angels and gods, by whom we might be delivered. 1 These things did I follow eagerly, and practise with my friends by me and with me deceived. Let the arrogant, and such as have not been yet savagely cast down and stricken by Thee, my God, laugh at me; but notwithstanding I would confess to Thee mine own shame in Thy praise. Bear with me,

I beseech Thee, and give me grace to retrace in my present

1 Augustine tells us that he went not beyond the rank of a "hearer," because he found the Manichsean teachers readier in refuting others than in establishing their own views, and seems only to have looked for some esoteric doctrine to have been disclosed to him under their materialistic teaching as to God viz.
that He was an unmeasured Light that extended all ways but one, infinitely (Serm. iv. sec. 5) rather than to have really accepted it. De Util. Cred. Praif.

remembrance the circlings of my past errors, and to " offer to Thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving." * For what am I to myself without Thee, but a guide to mine own downfall ? Or what am I even at the best, but one sucking Thy milk, ? and feeding upon Thee, the meat that perisheth not ? 3 But what kind of man is any man, seeing that he is but a man ? Let, then, the strong and the mighty laugh at us, but let us who are " poor and needy " 4 confess unto Thee.

Chap. ii. He teaches rhetoric, the only thing he loved, and scorns the soothsayer who promised him victory.

2. In those years I taught the art of rhetoric, and, overcome by cupidity, put to sale a loquacity by which to overcome. Yet I preferred Lord, Thou knowest to have honest scholars (as they are esteemed); and these I, without artifice, taught artifices, not to be put in practice against the life of the guiltless, though sometimes for the life of the guilty. And Thou, God, from afar sawest me stumbling in that slippery path, and amid much smoke 5 sending out some flashes of fidelity, which I exhibited in that my guidance of such as loved vanity and sought after leasing, 6 I being their companion. In those years I had one (whom I knew not in what is called lawful wedlock, but whom my wayward passion, void of understanding, had discovered), yet one only, remaining faithful even to her; in whom I found out truly by my own experience what difference there is between the restraints of the marriage bonds, contracted for the sake of issue, and the compact of a lustful love, where children are born against the parents' will, although, being born, they compel love.

3. I remember, too, that when I decided to compete for a theatrical prize, a soothsayer demanded of me what I would give him to win; but I, detesting and abominating such foul mysteries, answered, " That if the garland were of imperishable gold, I would not suffer a fly to be destroyed to secure it for me." For he was to slay certain living creatures in his sacrifices, and by those honours to invite the devils to give me their support. But this ill thing I also refused, not out of a pure love for Thee, God of my heart; for I knew not how to love Thee, knowing not how to conceive aught beyond corporeal brightness. And doth not a soul, sighing after such-like fictions; commit fornication against Thee, trust in false things, and nourish the wind? But I would not, forsooth, have sacrifices offered to devils on my behalf, though T myself was offering sacrifices to them by that superstition. For what else is nourishing the wind but nourishing them, that is, by our wanderings to become their enjoyment and derision?

Chap. hi. Not even the most experienced men could persuade him of the vanity of astrology, to which he was devoted.

4. Those impostors, then, whom they designate Mathematicians, I consulted without hesitation, because they used no sacrifices, and invoked the aid of no spirit for their divinations, which art Christian and true piety fittedly rejects and

1 "He alone is truly pure who waiteth on God, and keepeth himself to Him alone" (Aug. De Vita Beata, sec. 18). "Whoso...her legitimate husband. Whosoever seeketh of God anything besides God, doth not love God purely. If a wife loved her husband because he is rich, she is not pure, for she loveth not her husband but the gold of her husband" (Aug. Serin. 137). "Whoso seeks from God any other reward but God, and for it would serve God, esteems what he wishes to receive more than Him from whom he would receive it. What, then? hath God no reward? None, save Himself. The reward of God is God Himself. This it loveth; if it love aught beside, it is no pure love. You depart from the immortal flame, you will be chilled, corrupted. Do not depart; it will be thy corruption, will be fornication in thee" (Aug. in Ps. Lxxii. sec 32). "The pure fear of the Lord (Ps. xix. 9) is that wherewith the Church, the more ardently she loveth her Husband, the more diligently she avoids offending Him, and therefore love, when perfected, casteth not out this fear, but it remaineth for ever and ever" (Aug. * loc). "Under the name of pure fear is signified that will whereby we must needs be averse from sin, and avoid sin, not through the constant anxiety of infirmity, but through the tranquillity of affection" (De Civ. Dei, xiv. sec. G5).

3 "Indisputably we must take care, lest the mind, believing that which it does not see, feign to itself something which is not, and hope for and love that which is false. For in that case it will not be charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned, which is the end of the commandment" (De Trin. viii. sec. 6). And again condemns. 1 For good it is to confess unto Thee, and to say, "Be merciful unto me, heal my soul, for I have sinned against Thee;" 2 and not to abuse Thy goodness for a license to sin, but to remember the words of the Lord, "Behold, thou art made whole; sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee." 8 All of which salutary advice they endeavour to destroy when they say, "The cause of thy sin is inevitably determined in heaven;" and, "This did Venus, or Saturn, or

1 Augustine classes the votaries of both wizards and astrologers (De Doctr. Christ, ii. 23; and De Civ. Dei. x. 9; compare also Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. c. 5) as alike "deluded and imposed on by the false angels, to whom the lowest part of the world has been put in subjection by the law of God's providence;" and he says, "All arts of this sort are either nullities, or are part of a guilty superstition springing out of a baleful fellowship between men and devils, and are to be utterly repudiated and avoided by the Christian, as the covenants of a false and treacherous friendship." It is remarkable that though these arts were strongly denounced in the Pentateuch, the Jews acquiring them from the surrounding Gentile nations have embedded them deeply in their oral law, said also to be given by Moses (e.g. in Moed Katon 28, and Shabbath 156, prosperity comes from the influence of the stars; in Shabbath 61 it is a question whether the influence of the stars or a charm has been effective; and in Sanhedrin 17 magic is one of the qualifications for the Sanhedrim). It might have been expected that the Christians, if only from that reaction against Judaism which shows itself in Origen's disparagement of the letter of the Old Testament Scriptures (see De Princip. iv. 15, 16), would have shrunk from such strange arts. But the influx of pagans, who had practised them, into the Christian Church appears gradually to have leavened it in no slight degree. This is not only true of the Valentinians (see Kaye's Clement of Alex, vi.) and other heretics, but the influence of these contacts is seen even in the writings of the "orthodox." Those who can read between the lines will find no slight trace of this (after separating what they would conceive to be true from what is manifestly false) in the story told by Zonaras, in his Annals, of the controversy between the Rabbis and Sylvester, Bishop of Eome, before Constantine.

The Jews were worsted in argument, and evidently thought an appeal to miracles might, from the Emperor's education, bring him over to their side. An ox is brought forth. The Jewish wonder-worker whispers a mystic name into its ear, and it falls dead; but Sylvester, according to the story, is quite equal to the occasion, and restores the animal to life again by uttering the name of the Redeemer. It may have been that the cessation of miracles may have gradually led stable professors of Christianity to invent miracles; and, as Bishop Kaye observes (Tertullian, p. 95), "the success of the first attempts naturally encouraged others to practise similar impositions on the credulity of mankind."

As to the time of the cessation of miracles, comparison may be profitably made of the views of Kaye, in the early part of c. ii. of his Tertullian, and of Blunt, in his Right Use of the Early Fathers, series ii. lecture 6.

And who is this but Thee, our God, the sweetness and well-spring of righteousness, who renderest " to every man according to his deeds," 1 and despisest not " a broken and a contrite heart ! " 2

5. There was in those days a wise man, very skilful in medicine, and much renowned therein, who had with his own proconsular hand put the Agonistic garland upon my distempered head, not, though, as a physician; 3 for this disease Thou alone healest, who resistest the proud, and givest grace to the humble. 4 But didst Thou fail me even by that old man, or forbear from healing my soul ? For when I had become more familiar with him, and hung assiduously and fixedly on his conversation (for though couched in simple language, it was replete with vivacity, life, and earnestness), when he had perceived from my discourse that I was given to books of the horoscope-casters, he, in a kind and fatherly manner, advised me to throw them away, and not vainly bestow the care and labour necessary for useful things upon these vanities; saying that he himself in his earlier years had studied that art with a view to gaining his living by following it as a profession, and that, as he had understood Hippocrates, he would soon have understood this, and yet he had given it up, and followed medicine, for no other reason than that he discovered it to be utterly false, and he, being a man of character, would not gain his living by beguiling people. " But thou," saith he, " who hast rhetoric to support thyself by, so that thou folio west

3 This physician was Vindicianus, the "acute old man" mentioned in vii. sec. '8, below, and again in Ep. 138, as "the most eminent physician of his day." Augustine's disease, however, could not be reached by his remedies. We are irresistibly reminded of the words of our great poet: "Canst thou minister to a mind diseased; Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow; Raze out the written troubles of the brain; And, with some sweet oblivious antidote, Cleanse the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff Which weighs upon the heart ? this of free will, not of necessity all the more, then, oughtest thou to give me credit herein, who laboured to attain it so perfectly, as I wished to gain my living by it alone." When I asked him to account for so many true things being fore told by it, he answered me (as he could) " that the force of chance, diffused throughout the whole order of nature, brought this about. For if when a man by accident opens the leaves of some poet, who sang and intended something far different, a verse oftentimes fell out wondrously apposite to the present business, it were not to be wondered at," he continued, " if out of the soul of man, by some higher instinct, not knowing what goes on within itself, an answer should be given by chance, not art, which should coincide with the business and actions of the questioner."

6. And thus truly, either by or through him, Thou didst look after me. And Thou didst delineate in my memory what I might afterwards search out for myself. But at that time neither he, nor my most dear Nebridius, a youth most good and most circumspect, who scoffed at that whole stock of divination, could persuade me to forsake it, the authority of the authors influencing me still more; and as yet I had lighted upon no certain proof such as I sought whereby it might without doubt appear that what had been truly foretold by those consulted was by accident or chance, not by the art of the star-gazers.

Chap. IV. Sorely distressed by weeping at the death of his friend, he provides consolation for himself.

7. In those years, when I first began to teach rhetoric in my native town, I had acquired a very dear friend, from association in our studies, of mine own age, and, like myself, just rising up into the flower of youth. He had grown up with me from childhood, and we had been both school-fellows and playfellows. But he was not then my friend, nor, indeed, afterwards, as true friendship is; for true it is not but in such as Thou bindest together, cleaving unto Thee by that love which is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us. 1 But yet it was too sweet, being ripened by the fervour of similar studies. For, from the true faith (which he, as a youth, had not soundly and thoroughly become master of), I had turned him aside towards those superstitious and pernicious fables which my mother mourned in me. With me this man's mind now erred, nor could my soul exist without him. But behold, Thou wert close behind Thy fugitives at once God of vengeance 1 and Fountain of mercies, who turnest us to Thyself by wondrous means. Thou removedst that man from this life when he had scarce completed one whole year of my friendship, sweet to me above all the sweetness of that my life.

8. " Who can show forth all Thy praise " * which he hath experienced in himself alone? What was it that Thou didst then, O my God, and how unsearchable are the depths of Thy judgments! * For when, sore sick of a fever, he long lay unconscious in a death-sweat, and all despaired of his recovery, he was baptized without his knowledge; * myself meanwhile little caring, presuming that his soul would retain rather what it had imbibed from me, than what was done to his unconscious body. Far different, however, was it, for he was revived and restored. Straightway, as soon as I could talk to him (which I could as soon as he was able, for I never left him, and we hung too much upon each other), I attempted to jest with him, as if he also would jest with me at that baptism which he had received when mind and senses were in abeyance, but had now learnt that he had received. But he shuddered at me, as if I were his enemy; and, with a remarkable and unexpected freedom, admonished me, if I desired to continue his friend, to desist from speaking to him in such a way. I, confounded and confused, concealed all my emotions, till he should get well, and his health be strong enough to allow me to deal with him as I wished. But he was withdrawn from my frenzy, that with Thee he might be preserved for my comfort. A few days after, during my absence, he had a return of the fever, and died.

9. At this sorrow my heart was utterly darkened, and whatever I looked upon was death. My native country was a torture to me, and my father's house a wondrous unhappiness; and whatsoever I had participated in with him, wanting him, turned into a frightful torture. Mine eyes sought him everywhere, but he was not granted them; and I hated all places because he was not in them; nor could they now say to me,

" Behold, he is coming," as they did when he was alive and absent. I became a great puzzle to myself, and asked my soul why she was so sad, and why she so exceedingly disquieted me; 2 but she knew not what to answer me. And if I said, " Hope thou in God," 2 she very properly obeyed me not; because that most dear friend whom she had lost was, being man, both truer and better than that phantasm 3 she was bid to hope in. Naught but tears were sweet to me, and they succeeded my friend in the dearest of my affections.

Chap. v. Why weeping is pleasant to the wretched.
10. And now, Lord, these things are passed away, and time hath healed my wound. May I learn from Thee, who art Truth, and apply the ear of my heart unto Thy mouth, that Thou mayest tell me why weeping should be so sweet to the unhappy. 4 Hast Thou although present everywhere cast away far from Thee our misery? And Thou abidest in Thy-

3 The mind may rest in theories and abstractions, but the heart craves a being that it can love; and Archbishop Whately has shown in one of his essays that the idol worship of every age had doubtless its origin in the craving of mind and heart for an embodiment of the object of worship. "Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us," says Philip (John xiv. 8), and he expresses the longing of the soul; and when the Lord replies, "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father," He reveals to us God's satisfaction of human wants in the incarnation of His Son.

Augustine's heart was now thrown in upon itself, and his view of God gave him no consolation. It satisfied his mind, perhaps, in a measure, to think of God as a "corporeal brightness" (see iii. 12; iv. 3, 12, 31; v. 19, etc.) when free from trouble, but it could not satisfy him now. He had yet to learn of Him who is the very image of God who by His divine power raised the dead to life again, while, with perfect human sympathy, He could "weep with those that wept," the "Son of Man" (not of a man, He being miraculously born, but of the race of men [avffpuTau]), i.e. the Son of Mankind. See also viii. sec. 27, note, below.

self, but we are disquieted with divers trials; and yet, unless we wept in Thine ears, there would be no hope for us remaining. Whence, then, is it that such sweet fruit is plucked from the bitterness of life, from groans, tears, sighs, and lamentations? Is it the hope that Thou hearest us that sweetens it? This is true of prayer, for therein is a desire to approach unto Thee. But is it also in grief for a thing lost, and the sorrow with which I was then overwhelmed?

For I had neither hope of his coming to life again, nor did I seek this with my tears; but I grieved and wept only, for I was miserable, and had lost my joy. Or is weeping a bitter thing, and for distaste of the things which aforesaid we enjoyed before, and even then, when we are loathing them, does it cause us pleasure?

Chap. vi. His friend being snatched away by death, he imagines that he remains only as half.

11. But why do I speak of these things? For this is not the time to question, but rather to confess unto Thee. Miserable I was, and miserable is every soul fettered by the friendship of perishable things he is torn to pieces when he loses them, and then is sensible of the misery which he had before ever he lost them. Thus was it at that time with me; I wept most bitterly, and found rest in bitterness. Thus was I miserable, and that life of misery I accounted dearer than my friend.

For though I would willingly have changed it, yet I was even more unwilling to lose it than him; yea, I knew not whether I was willing to lose it even for him, as is handed down to us (if not an invention) of Pylades and Orestes, that they would gladly have died one for another, or both together, it being worse than death to them not to live together. But there had sprung up in me some kind of feeling, too, contrary to this, for both exceedingly wearisome was it to me to live, and dreadful to die. I suppose, the more I loved him, so much the more did I hate and fear, as a most cruel enemy, that death which had robbed me of him; and I imagined it would suddenly annihilate all men, as it had power over him.

Thus, I remember, it was with me. Behold my heart, my God! Behold and look into me, for I remember it well, my Hope! who cleansest me from the uncleanness of such affections, directing mine eyes towards Thee, and plucking my feet out of the net. I For I was astonished that other mortals lived, since he whom I loved, as if he would never die, was dead; and I wondered still more that I, who was to him a second self, could live when he was dead. Well did one say of his friend, "Thou half of my soul," 2 for I felt that my soul and his soul were but one soul in two bodies; 3 and, consequently, my life was a horror to me, because I would not live in half. And therefore, perchance, was I afraid to die, lest he should die wholly 4 whom I had so greatly loved.

Chap. vii. Troubled by restlessness and grief, he leaves Ms country a second time for Carthage.

12. O madness, which knowest not how to love men as men should be loved! foolish man that I then was, enduring with so much impatience the lot of man! So I fretted, sighed, wept, tormented myself, and took neither rest nor advice. For I bore about with me a rent and polluted soul, impatient of being borne, by me, and where to repose it I found not. Not in pleasant groves, not in sport or song, not in fragrant spots, nor in magnificent banqueting, nor in the pleasures of the bed and the couch, nor, finally, in books and songs did it find repose. All things looked terrible, even the very light itself; and whatsoever was not what he was, was repulsive and hateful, except groans and tears, for in those alone found I a little repose. But when my soul was withdrawn from them, a heavy burden of misery weighed me down. To Thee, O Lord, should it have been raised, for Thee to lighten and avert it. 5 This I knew, but was neither willing nor able; all

4 Augustine's reference to this passage in his Retractations is quoted at the beginning of the book. He might have gone further than to describe his words here as declamatio levis, since the conclusion is not logical.

5 "The great and merciful Architect of His Church, whom not only the philosophers have styled, but the Scripture itself calls τοιούτου (an artist or artificer), employs not on us the hammer and chisel with an intent to wound or mangle us, but only to square and fashion our hard and stubborn hearts into such lively stones as may both grace and strengthen His heavenly structure."

the more since, in my thoughts of Thee, Thou wert not any solid or substantial thing to me. For Thou wert not Thyself, but an empty phantasm, and my error was my god. If I attempted to discharge my burden thereon, that it might find rest, it sank into emptiness, and came rushing down again upon me, and I remained unto myself an unhappy spot, where I could neither stay nor depart from. For whither could my heart fly from my heart? Whither could I fly from mine own self? Whither not follow myself? And yet fled I from my country; for so should my eyes look less for him where they were not accustomed to see him. And thus I left the town of Thagaste, and came to Carthage.

Chap. viii. That his grief ceased by time, and the consolation of friends.
13. Times lose no time, nor do they idly roll through our senses. They work strange operations on the mind. 2 Behold, they came and went from day to day, and by coming and going they disseminated in my mind other ideas and other remembrances, and by little and little patched me up again with the former kind of delights, unto which that sorrow of mine yielded. But yet there succeeded, not certainly other sorrows, yet the causes of other sorrows. 3 For whence had that former sorrow so easily penetrated to the quick, but that I had poured out my soul upon the dust, in loving one who must die as if he were never to die? But what revived and refreshed me especially was the consolations of other friends, with whom I did love what instead of Thee I loved. And this was a monstrous fable and protracted lie, by whose adulterous contact our soul, which lay itching in our ears, was being polluted. But that fable would not die to me so oft as any of my friends died. There were other things in them which did more lay hold of my mind, to discourse and jest with them; to indulge in an interchange of kindnesses; to read together pleasant books; together to trifle, and together to be earnest; to differ at times without ill-humour, as a man would do with his own self; and even by the infrequency of these differences to give zest to our more frequent consentings; sometimes teaching, sometimes being taught; longing for the absent with impatience, and welcoming the coming with joy. These and similar expressions, emanating from the hearts of those who loved and were beloved in return, by the countenance, the tongue, the eyes, and a thousand pleasing movements, were so much fuel to melt our souls together, and out of many to make but one.

4 "Friendship," says Lord Bacon, in his essay thereon, the sentiment being perhaps suggested by Cicero's "Secundas res splendidiiores facit amicitia et adversas partiens communicansque leviores" (De Amicit. 6), "redoubleth joys, and cutteth griefs in halves. " Augustine appears to have been eminently open to influences of this kind. In his De Duab. Anim. con. Munich, (c. ix.) he tells us that friendship was one of the bonds that kept him in the ranks of the Manichceans; and here we find that, aided by time and weeping, it restored him in his great grief. CHAP. IX.] GOB SHOULD BE OUR HIGHEST LOVE. 67

CprAP. ix. That the love of a human being, however constant in loving and returning love, j^rishes; while he who loves God never loses a friend.

14. This is it that is loved in friends; and so loved that a man's conscience accuses itself if he love not him by whom he is beloved, or love not again him that loves him, expecting nothing from him but indications of his love. Hence that mourning if one die, and gloom of sorrow, that steeping of the heart in tears, all sweetness turned into bitterness, and upon the loss of the life of the dying, the death of the living. Blessed be he who loveth Thee, and his friend in Thee, and his enemy for Thy sake. For he alone loses none dear to him to whom all are dear in Him who cannot be lost. And who is this but our God, the God that created heaven and earth, 1 and filleth them, 2 because by filling them He created them? 3 None loseth Thee but he who leaveth Thee. And he who leaveth Thee, whither goeth he, or whither fleeth he, but from Thee well pleased to Thee angry? For where doth not he find Thy law in his own punishment? "And Thy law is the truth," 4 and truth Thou.

Chap X. That all things exist that they may perish, and that we, are not safe unless God watches over us.

15. "Turn us again, Lord God of Hosts, cause Thy face to shine; and we shall be saved." 1 For whithersoever the soul of man turns itself, unless towards Thee, it is affixed to sorrows, 2 yea, though it is affixed to beauteous things without Thee and without itself. And yet they were not unless they were from Thee. They rise and set; and by rising, they begin as it were to be; and they grow, that they may become perfect; and when perfect, they wax old and perish; and all wax not old, but all perish. Therefore when they rise and tend to be, the more rapidly they grow that they may be, so much the more they hasten not to be. This is the way of them. 3 Thus much hast Thou given them, because they are parts of things, which exist not all at the same time, but by departing and succeeding they together make up the universe, of which they are parts. And even thus is our speech accomplished by signs emitting a sound; but this, again, is not perfected unless one word pass away when it has sounded its part, in order that another may succeed it. Let my soul praise Thee out of 1 Pa. lxxx. 19. 8 See iv. cc. 1, 12, and vi. c. 16, below.

3 It is interesting in connection with the above passages to note what Augustine says elsewhere as to the origin of the law of death in the sin of our first parents. In his De Gen. ad Lit. (vi. 25) he speaks thus of their condition in the garden, and the provision made for the maintenance of their life: "Aliud est non posse mori, sicut quasdam naturas immortales creavit Deus; aliud est autem posse non mori, secundum quem modum primus creatus est homo immortalis." Adam, he goes on to say, was able to avert death, by partaking of the tree of life.
He enlarges on this doctrine in Book xiii. De Civ. Dei. He says (sec. 20):
" Our first parents decayed not with years, nor drew nearer to death a condition secured to them in God's marvellous grace by the tree of life, which grew along with the forbidden tree in the midst of Paradise. " Again (sec. 19) he says: " Why do the philosophers find that absurd which the Christian faith preaches, namely, that our first parents were so created, that, if they had not sinned, they would not have been dismissed from their bodies by any death, but would have been endowed with immortality as the reward of their obedience, and would have lived eternally with their bodies ? " That this was the doctrine of the early Church has been fully shown by Bishop Bull in his State of Man before the Fall, vol. ii.
Theoplius of Antioch was of opinion (Ad Attolyc. c. 24) that Adam might have gone on from strength to strength, until at last he " would have been taken up into heaven." See also on this subject Dean Buckland's Sermon on Death; and Delitzsch, Bibl. Psychol, vi. sees. 1 and 2.

CHAP. XI.] A CALL TO RETURN TO GOD. 69

all these things, O God, the Creator of all; but let not my soul be affixed to these things by the glue of love, through the senses of the body. For they go whither they were to go, that they might no longer be; and they rend her with pestilent desires, because she longs to be, and yet loves to rest in what she loves. But in these things no place is to be found; they stay not they flee; and who is he that is able to follow them with the senses of the flesh ? Or who can grasp them, even when they are near ? For tardy is the sense of the flesh, because it is the sense of the flesh, and its boundary is itself.
It sufficeth for that for which it was made, but it is not sufficient to stay things running their course from their appointed starting-place to the end appointed. For in Thy word, by which they were created, they hear the fiat, " Hence and hitherto."

Chai\ xi. That portions of the world are not to be loved; but that God, their Author, is immutable, and His word eternal.

16. Be not foolish, O my soul, and deaden not the ear of thine heart with the tumult of thy folly. Hearken thou also.
The word itself invokes thee to return; and there is the place of rest imperturbable, where love is not abandoned if itself abandoneth not. Behold, these things pass away, that others may succeed them, and so this lower universe be made complete in all its parts. But do I depart anywhere, saith the word of God ? There fix thy habitation. There commit whatsoever thou hast thence, my soul; at all events now thou art tired out with deceits. Commit to truth whatsoever thou hast from the truth, and nothing shalt thou lose; and thy decay shall flourish again, and all thy diseases be healed, 1 and thy perishable parts shall be re-formed and renovated, and drawn together to thee; nor shall they put thee down where themselves descend, but they shall abide with thee, and continue for ever before God, who abideth and continueth for ever. 2
17. Why, then, be perverse and follow thy flesh? Rather let it be converted and follow thee. Whatever by her thou feel'st, is but in part; and the whole, of which these are portions, thou art ignorant of, and yet they delight thee.

70 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK IV.]

But had the sense of thy flesh been capable of comprehending the whole, and not itself also, for thy punishment, been justly limited to a portion of the whole, thou wouldest that whatsoever existeth at the present time should pass away, that so the whole might please thee more. For what we speak, also by the same sense of the flesh thou nearest; and yet wouldest not thou that the syllables should stay, but fly away, that others may come, and the whole be heard. Thus it is always, when any single thing is composed of many, all of which exist not together, all together would delight more than they do simply could all be perceived at once. But far better than these is He who made all; and He is our God, and He passeth not away, for there is nothing to succeed Him. If bodies please thee, praise God for them, and turn back thy love upon their Creator, lest in those things which please thee thou displease.

Chap. xii. Love is not condemned, but love in God, in whom there w rest through Jesus Christ, is to be preferred.

18. If souls please thee, let them be loved in God; for they also are mutable, but in Him are they firmly stablished, else would they pass, and pass away. In Him, then, let them be beloved; and draw unto Him along with thee as many souls as thou canst, and say to them, " Him let us love, Him let us love; He created these, nor is He far off. For He did not create them, and then depart; but they are of Him, and in Him. Behold, there is He wherever truth is known. He is within the very heart, but yet hath the heart wandered from Him. Eeturn to your heart, 3 ye transgres-

3 Augustine is never weary of pointing out that there is a lex occidta (in Ps. lvii. sec 1), a law written on the heart, which cries to those who have forsaken the written law, " Return to your hearts, ye transgressors." In like manner he interprets (De Serm. Dom. in Mon. ii. sec. 11) "Enter into thy closet," of the heart of man. The door is the gate of the senses through which carnal thoughts enter into the mind. We are to shut the door, because the devil (in Ps. cxli. 3) si clausum invenerit transit. In sec. 16, above, the figure is changed, and we are to fear lest these objects of sense render us "deaf in the ear of our heart " with the tumult of our folly. Men will not, he says, go back into their hearts, because the heart is full of sin, and they fear the reproaches ol conscience, just (in Ps. xxxiii. 5) "as those are unwilling to enter their houses sors, I and cleave fast unto Him that made you. Stand with Him, and you shall stand fast. Rest in Him, and you shall be at rest. Whither go ye in rugged paths? Whither go ye? The good that you love is from Him; and as it has respect unto Him it is both good and pleasant, and justly shall it be embittered, because whatsoever cometh from Him is unjustly loved if He be forsaken for it. Why, then, will ye wander farther and farther in these difficult and toilsome ways? There is no rest where ye seek it. Seek what ye seek; but it is not there where ye seek. Ye seek a blessed life in the land of death; it is not there. For could a blessed life be where life itself is not?"

19. But our very Life descended hither, and bore our death, and slew it, out of the abundance of His own life; and thundering He called loudly to us to return hence to Him into that secret place whence He came forth to us first into the Virgin's womb, where the human creature was married to Him, our mortal flesh, that it might not be for ever mortal, and thence "as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, rejoicing as a strong man to run a race." 3 For He tarried not, but ran crying out by words, deeds, death, life, descent, ascension, crying aloud to us to return to Him. And He departed from our sight, that we might return to our heart, and there find Him. For He departed, and behold, He is here. He would not be long with us, yet left us not; for He departed thither, whence He never departed, because "the world was made by Him." 4 And in this world He was, and into this world He came to save sinners, 5 unto whom my soul doth confess, that He may heal it, for it hath sinned against Him. 6 ye sons of men, how long so slow of heart? 7 Even now, after the Life is descended to you, will who have troublesome wives." These outer things, which too often draw us away from Him, God intends should lift us up to Him who is better than they, though they could all be ours at once, since He made them all; and "woe," he says (Be Lib. Arb. ii. 16), "to them who love the indications of Thee rather than Thee, and remember not what these indicated."

ye not ascend and live? 1 But whither ascend ye, when yeare on high, and set your mouth against the heavens? 2 Descend that ye may ascend, 3 and ascend to God. For ye have fallen by "ascending against Him." Tell them this, that they may weep in the valley of tears * and so draw them with thee to God, because it is by His Spirit that thou speakest thus unto them, if thou speakest burning with the fire of love.

Chap. xiii. Love originates from grace and beauty enticing us.

20. These things I knew not at that time, and I loved these lower beauties, and I was sinking to the very depths; and I said to my friends, "Do we love anything but the beautiful? What, then, is the beautiful? And what is beauty? What is it that allures and unites us to the things we love; for unless there were a grace and beauty in them, they could by no means attract us to them?" And I marked and perceived that in bodies themselves there was a beauty from their forming a kind of whole, and another from mutual fitness, as one part of the body with its whole, or a shoe with a foot, and so on. And this consideration sprang up in my mind out of the recesses of my heart, and I wrote books (two or three, I think) "on the fair and fit." Thou knowest, Lord, for it has escaped me; for I have them not, but they have strayed from me, I know not how.

1 "The Son of God," says Augustine in another place, "became a son of man, that the sons of men might be made sons of God." He put off the form of God that by which He manifested His divine glory in heaven and put on the "form of a servant" (Phil. ii. 6, 7), that as the outshining [a.\ua\ya\ry,a] of the Father's glory (Heb. i. 3) He might draw us to Himself. He descended and emptied Himself of His dignity that we might ascend, giving an example for all time (in Ps. xxxiii. sec. 4); for, "lest man should disdain to imitate a humble man, God humbled Himself, so that the pride of the human race might not disdain to walk in the footsteps of God." See also v. sec. 5, note, below.

2 Ps. lxxiii. 9.

3 "There is something in humility which, strangely enough, exalts the heart, and something in pride which debases it. This seems, indeed, to be contradictory, that loftiness should debase and lowliness exalt. But pious humility enables us to submit to what is above us; and nothing is more exalted above us than God; and therefore humility, by making us subject to God, exalts us." De Giv. Dei, xiv. sec. 13.

CHAP. XIV.] HE WISHES FOR THE APPROBATION OF HERITIJS. 73

Chap. xiv. Concerning the book which he wrote "on the Fair and Fit," dedicated to Hierim.

21. But what was it that prompted me, Lord my God, to dedicate these books to Hierius, an orator of Home, whom I knew not by sight, but loved the man for the fame of his learning, for which he was renowned, and some words of his which I had heard, and which had pleased me? But the more did he please me in that he pleased others, who highly extolled him, astonished that a native of Syria, instructed first in Greek eloquence, should afterwards become a wonderful Latin orator, and one so well versed in studies pertaining unto wisdom. Thus a man is commended and loved when absent. Doth this love enter into the heart of the hearer from the mouth of the commender? Not so. But through one who loveth is another inflamed. For hence he is loved who is commended when the commender is believed to praise him with an unfeigned heart; that is, when he that loves him praises him.

22. Thus, then, loved I men upon the judgment of men, not upon Thine, my God, in which no man is deceived. But yet why not as the renowned charioteer, as the huntsman, I known far and wide by a vulgar popularity but far otherwise, and seriously, and so as I would desire to be myself commended? For I would not that they should commend and love me as actors are, although I myself did commend and love them, but I would prefer being unknown than so known, and even being hated than so loved. Where now are these influences of such various and divers kinds of loves distributed in one soul? What is it that I am in love with in another, which, if I did not hate, I should not detest and repel from myself, seeing we are equally men? For it does not follow that because a good horse is loved by him who would not, though he might, be that horse, the same should therefore be affirmed by an actor, who partakes of our nature. D^ I then love in a man that which I, who am a man, hate to be? Man himself is a great deep, whose very hairs Thou numberest, Lord, and they fall not to the ground without Thee. And yet are the hairs of his head more readily numbered than are his affections and the movements of his heart.

1 See vi. sec. 13, below 2 Matt. x. 29, 30.

23. But that orator was of the kind that I so loved as I wished myself to be such a one; and I erred through an inflated pride, and was "carried about with every wind," 1 but yet was piloted by Thee, though very secretly. And whence know I, and whence confidently confess I unto Thee that I loved him more because of the love of those who praised him, than for the very things for which they praised him?
Because had he been unpraised, and these self-same men had dispraised him, and with dispraise and scorn told the same things of him, I should never have been so inflamed and provoked to love him. And yet the things had not been different, nor he himself different, but only the affections of the narrators. See where lieth the impotent soul that is not yet sustained by the solidity of truth! Just as the blasts of tongues blow from the breasts of conjecturers, so is it tossed this way and that, driven forward and backward, and the light is obscured to it and the truth not perceived. And behold it is before us. And to me it was a great matter that my style and studies should be known to that man; the which if he approved, I were the more stimulated, but if he disapproved, this vain heart of mine, void of Thy solidity, had been offended.
And yet that "fair and fit," about which I wrote to him, I reflected on with pleasure, and contemplated it, and admired it, though none joined me in doing so.

Chap. XV. While writing, being blinded by corporeal images, he failed to recognise the spiritual nature of God.

24. But not yet did I perceive the hinge on which this impotent matter turned in Thy wisdom, Thou Omnipotent, " who alone doest great wonders; " and my mind ranged through corporeal forms, and I defined and distinguished as "fair," that which is so in itself, and "fit," that which is beautiful as it corresponds to some other thing; and this I supported by corporeal examples. And I turned my attention to the nature of the mind, but the false opinions which I entertained of spiritual things prevented me from seeing the truth. Yet the very power of truth forced itself on my gaze, and I turned away my throbbing soul from incorporeal substance, to lineaments, and colours, and bulky magnitudes.

And not being able to perceive these in the mind, I thought I could not perceive my mind. And whereas in virtue I loved peace, and in viciousness I hated discord, in the former I distinguished unity, but in the latter a kind of division. And in that unity I conceived the rational soul and the nature of truth and of the chief good I to consist. But in this division I, unfortunate one, imagined there was I know not what substance of 1 Augustine tells us (Be Civ. Dei, xix. 1) that Varro, in his lost book De Philosophia, gives two hundred and eighty-eight different opinions as regards the chief good, and shows us how readily they may be reduced in number. Now, as then, philosophers ask the same questions. We have our hedonists, whose "good" is their own pleasure and happiness; our materialists, who would seek the common good of all; and our intuitionists, who aim at following the dictates of conscience. When the pretensions of these various schools are examined without prejudice, the conclusion is forced upon us that we must have recourse to Revelation for a reconciliation of the difficulties of the various systems; and that the philosophers, to employ Davidson's happy illustration (Prophecies, Introd.), forgetting that their faded taper has been insensibly kindled by gospel light, are attempting now, as in Augustine's time (ibid. sec. 4), "to fabricate for themselves a happiness in this life based upon a virtue as deceitful as it is proud." Christianity gives the golden key to the attainment of happiness, when it declares that "godliness is profitable for all things, having the promise of the life which now is, and of that which is to come" (1 Tim. iv. 8). It was a saying of Bacon (Essay on Adversity), that while "prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament, adversity is the blessing of the New." He would have been nearer the truth had he said that while temporal rewards were the special promise of the Old Testament, spiritual rewards are the special promise of the New. For though Christ's immediate followers had to suffer "adversity" in the planting of our faith, adversity cannot properly be said to be the result of following Christ. It has yet to be shown that, on the whole, the greatest amount of real happiness does not result, even in this life, from a Christian life, for virtue is, even here, its own reward. The fulness of the reward, however, will only be received in the life to come. Augustine's remark, therefore, still holds good that "life eternal is the supreme good, and death eternal the supreme evil, and that to obtain the one and escape the other we must live rightly" (ibid. sec. 4); and again, that even in the midst of the troubles of life, "as we are saved, so we are made happy, by hope. And as we do not as yet possess a present, but look for a future salvation, so it is with our happiness, ... we ought patiently to endure till we come to the ineffable enjoyment of unmixed good." See Abbe Anselme, Sur le Sonverain Bien, vol. v. serm. 1; and the last chapter of Professor Sidgwick's Methods of Ethics, for the conclusions at which a mind at once lucid and dispassionate has arrived on this question.

irrational life, and the nature of the chief evil, which should not be a substance only, but real life also, and yet not emanating from Thee, my God, from whom are all things. And yet the first I called a Monad, as if it had been a soul without sex, 1 but the other a Duad, anger in deeds of violence, in deeds of passion, lust, not knowing of what I talked. For I had not known or learned that neither was evil a substance, nor our soul that chief and unchangeable good.

25. For even as it is in the case of deeds of violence, if that emotion of the soul from whence the stimulus comes be depraved, and carry itself insolently and mutinously; and in acts of passion, if that affection of the soul whereby carnal pleasures are imbibed is unrestrained, so do errors and false opinions contaminate the life, if the reasonable soul itself be depraved, as it was at that time in me, who was ignorant that it must be enlightened by another light that it may be partaker of truth, seeing that itself is not that nature of truth.

"For Thou wilt light my candle; the Lord my God will enlighten my darkness;" 2 and "of His fulness have all we received," 3 for "that was the true Light which lighted every man that cometh into the world;" 4 for in Thee there is "no variableness, neither shadow of turning." *

26. But I pressed towards Thee, and was repelled by Thee that I might taste of death, for Thou "resistest the proud." 6

But what prouder than for me, with a marvellous madness, to assert myself to be that by nature which Thou art? For

1 'Or 'an unintelligent soul;' very good mss. reading 'sensu,' the majority, it appears, 'sexu.' If we read 'sexu,' the absolute unity of the first principle, or Monad, may he insisted upon, and in the inferior principle, divided into 'violence' and 'lust,' 'violence,' as implying strength, may be looked on as the male, 'lust' was, in mythology, represented as female; if we take 'sensu,' it will express the living but unintelligent soul of the world in the Manichæan, as a pantheistic system." 2 Ps. xviii. 28. Augustine constantly urges our recognition of the truth that God is the "Father of lights." From Him as our central sun, all light, whether of wisdom or knowledge, proceedeth, and if, changing the figure, our candle which He hath lighted be blown out, He again must light it. Compare Enar, in Ps. xciii. 147; and Sermons, 67 and 341.

whereas I was mutable, so much being clear to me, for my very longing to become wise arose from the wish from worse to become better, yet chose I rather to think Thee mutable, than myself not to be that which Thou art. Therefore was I repelled by Thee, and Thou resistedst my changeable stiffneckedness; and I imagined corporeal forms, and, being flesh, I accused flesh, and, being "a wind that passeth away," 1 I returned not to Thee, but went wandering and wandering on towards those things that have no being, neither in Thee, nor in me, nor in the body. Neither were they created for me by Thy truth, but conceived by my vain conceit out of corporeal things. And I used to ask Thy faithful little ones, my fellow-citizens, from whom I unconsciously stood exiled, I used flippantly and foolishly to ask, "Why, then, doth the soul which God created err?"
But I would not permit any one to ask me, "Why, then, doth God err?" And I contended that Thy immutable substance erred of constraint, rather than admit that my mutable substance had gone astray of free will, and erred as a punishment. 2 1 Ps. lxxviii. 39.

* It may assist those unacquainted with Augustine's writings to understand the last three sections, if we set before them a brief view of the Manichæan speculations as to the good and evil principles, and the nature of the human soul: (1) The Manichæans believed that there were two principles or substances, one good and the other evil, and that both were eternal and opposed one to the other. The good principle they called God, and the evil, matter or Hyle (Con. Faust, xxi. 1, 2). Faustus, in his argument with Augustine, admits that they sometimes called the evil nature "God," but simply as a conventional usage. Augustine says thereon (ibid. sec. 4): "Faustus glibly defends himself by saying, 'We speak not of two gods, but of God and Hyle;' but when you ask for the meaning of Hyle, you find that it is in fact another god. If the Manichreans gave the name of Hyle, as the ancients did, to the unformed matter which is susceptible of bodily forms, we should not accuse them of making two gods. But it is pure folly and madness to give to matter the power of forming bodies, or to deny that what has this power is God." Augustine alludes in the above passage to the Platonic theory of matter, which, as the late Dean Mansel has shown us (Gnostic Heresies, Basilides, etc.), resulted after his time in Pantheism, and which was entirely opposed to the dualism of Manichæus. It is to this "power of forming bodies" claimed for matter, then, that Augustine alludes in our text (sec. 24) as "not only a substance but real life also."

(2) The human soul the Manichæans declared to be of the same nature as God, though not created by Him it having originated in the intermingling of part of His being with the evil principle, in the conflict between the kingdoms of

27. I was abcut six or seven and twenty years of age when I wrote those volumes meditating upon corporeal fictions, which clamoured in the ears of my heart. These I directed, sweet Truth, to Thy inward melody, pondering on the "fair and fit," and longing to stay and listen to Thee, and to rejoice greatly at the Bridegroom's voice, 1 and I could not; for by the voices of my own errors was I driven forth, and by the weight of my own pride was I sinking into the lowest pit.
For Thou didst not "make me to hear joy and gladness;" nor did the bones which were not yet humbled rejoice. 2
Chap. xvi. He very easily understood the liberal arts and the categories of Aristotle, but without true fruit.

28. And what did it profit me that, when scarce twenty years old, a book of Aristotle's, entitled The Ten Predicaments, fell into my hands, on whose very name I hung as on something great and divine, when my rhetoric master of Carthage, and others who were esteemed learned, referred to it with cheeks swelling with pride, I read it alone and understood it? And on my conferring with others, who said that with the assistance of very able masters who not only explained it orally, but drew many things in the dust they scarcely understood it, and could tell me no more about it than I had acquired in reading it by myself alone? And the book light and darkness (in Ps. cxi. sec. 10). Augustine says to Faustus: "You generally call your soul not a temple, but a part or member of God" (Con. Faust, xx. 15); and thus, "identifying themselves with the nature and substance of God" (ibid. xii. 13), they did not refer their sin to themselves, but to the race of darkness, and so did not "prevail over their sin." That is, they denied original sin, and asserted that it necessarily resulted from the soul's contact with the body. To this Augustine steadily replied, that as the soul was not of the nature of God, but created by Him and endowed with free will, man was responsible for his transgressions. Again, referring to the Confessions, we find Augustine speaking consistently with his then belief, when he says that he had not then learned that the soul was not a "chief and unchangeable good" (sec. 24), or that "it was not that nature of truth" (sec. 25); and that when he transgressed he accused flesh rather than himself; and, as a result of his Manichæan errors (sec. 26), "contended that God's immutable substance erred of constraint, rather than admit that his mutable substance had gone astray of free will, and erred as a punishment."

appeared to me to speak plainly enough of substances, such as man is, and of their qualities, such as the figure of a man, of what kind it is; and his stature, how many feet high; and his relationship, whose brother he is; or where placed, or when born; or whether he stands or sits, or is shod or armed, or does or suffers anything; and whatever innumerable things might be classed under these nine categories, 1 of which I have given some examples, or under that chief category of substance.

29. What did all this profit me, seeing it even hindered me, when, imagining that whatsoever existed was comprehended in those ten categories, I tried so to understand, O my God, Thy wonderful and unchangeable unity as if Thou also hadst been subjected to Thine own greatness or beauty, so that they should exist in Thee as their subject, like as in bodies, whereas Thou Thyself art Thy greatness and beauty? But a body is not great or fair because it is a body, seeing that, though it were less great or fair, it should nevertheless be a body. But that which I had conceived of Thee was falsehood, not truth, fictions of my misery, not the supports of Thy blessedness.

For Thou hadst commanded, and it was done in me, that the earth should bring forth briars and thorns to me, and that with labour I should get my bread.

30. And what did it profit me that I, the base slave of vile affections, read unaided, and understood, all the books that I could get of the so-called liberal arts? And I took delight in them, but knew not whence came whatever in them was true and certain. For my back then was to the light, and my face towards the things enlightened; whence my face, with which I discerned the things enlightened, was not itself enlightened. Whatever was written either on rhetoric or logic, geometry, music, or arithmetic, did I, without any great difficulty, and without the teaching of any man, understand, as Thou knowest, O Lord my God, because both quickness of comprehension and acuteness of perception are Thy gifts. Yet did I not thereupon sacrifice to Thee. So, then, it served not to my use, but rather to my destruction, since I went about to get so good a portion of my substance into my own power; and I kept not my strength for Thee, but went away from Thee into a far country, to waste it upon harlotries. 3 For what did good abilities profit me, if I did not employ them to good uses? For I did not perceive that those arts were acquired with great difficulty, even by the studious and those gifted with genius, until I endeavoured to explain them to such; and he was the most proficient in them who followed my explanations not too slowly.

1 "The categories enumerated by Aristotle are ivn'ia, -rlo-ov, *7i>y, -rpio-Tt, rod, Tore, xtiafai, ix<.iv, 9t>u7m, -xutrxuv; which are usually rendered, as adequately as perhaps they can be in our language, substance, quantity, quality, relation, place, time, situation, possession, action, suffering. The catalogue (which certainly is but a very crude one) has been by some writers enlarged, as it is evident may easily be done by subdividing some of the heads; and by others curtailed, as it is no less evident that all may ultimately be referred to the two heads of substance and attribute, or, in the language of some logicians, 'accident'" (Whately's Logic, iv. 2, sec. 1, note). "These are called in Latin the prcedicamerits, because they can be said or predicated in the same sense of all other terms, as well as of all the objects denoted by them, whereas no other term can be correctly said of them, because no other is employed to express the full extent of their meaning" (Gillies, Analysis of Aristotle, c. 2).

31. But what did this profit me, supposing that Thou, Lord God, the Truth, wert a bright and vast body, 4 and I a piece of that body? Perverseness too great! But such was I. Nor do I blush, my God, to confess to Thee Thy mercies towards me, and to call upon Thee I, who blushed not then to avow before men my blasphemies, and to bark against Thee. What profited me then my nimble wit in those sciences and all those knotty volumes, disentangled by me without help from a human master, seeing that I erred so odiously, and with such sacrilegious baseness, in the doctrine of piety? Or what impediment was it to Thy little ones to have a far slower wit, seeing that they departed not far from Thee, that in the nest of Thy Church they might safely become fledged, and nourish the wings of charity by the food of a sound faith? O Lord our God, under the shadow of Thy wings let us hope, 5 defend us, and carry us. Thou wilt carry us both when little, md even to grey hairs wilt Thou carry us; I for our firmness, when it is Thou, then is it firmness; but when it is our own, then it is infirmity. Our good lives always with Thee, from which when we are averted we are perverted. Let as now, Lord, return, that we be not overturned, because with Thee our good lives without any eclipse, which good Thou Thyself art. 2 And we need not fear lest we should find no place unto which to return because we fell away from it; for when we were absent, our home Thy Eternity fell not.

HE DESCRIBES THE TWENTY-NINTH YEAR OF HIS AGE, IN WHICH, HAVING DISCOVERED THE FALLACIES OF THE MANICHVEANS, HE PROFESSED RHETORIC AT ROME AND MILAN. HAVING HEARD AMBROSE, HE BEGINS TO COME TO HIMSELF.

Chap. I. That it becomes the soul to praise God, and to confess unto Him.

1. A CCEPT the sacrifice of my confessions by the agency XI of my tongue, which Thou hast formed and quickened, that it may confess to Thy name; and heal Thou all my hones, and let them say, " Lord, who is like unto Thee? " x For neither does he who confesses to Thee teach Thee what may be passing within him, because a closed heart doth not exclude Thine eye, nor does man's hardness of heart repulse Thine hand, but Thou dissolvest it when Thou wiliest, either in pity or in vengeance, " and there is no one who can hide himself from Thy heat." 2 But let my soul praise Thee, that it may love Thee; and let it confess Thine own mercies to Thee, that it may praise Thee. Thy whole creation ceaseth not, nor is it silent in Thy praises neither the spirit of man, by the voice directed unto Thee, nor animal nor corporeal things, by the voice of those meditating thereon f so that our souls may

1 Ps. xxxv. 10. 2 Ps. xix. 6.

3 St. Paul speaks of a "minding of the flesh" and a "minding of the spirit" (Rom. viii. 6, margin), and we are prone to be attracted and held by the carnal surroundings of life; that is, " quae per carnem sentiri queruntid est per oculos, per aures, ceterosque corporis sensus" (De Vera Relig. xxiv.). But God would have us, as we meditate on the things that enter by the gates of the senses, to arise towards Him, through these His creatures. Our Father in heaven might have ordered His creation simply in a utilitarian way, letting, for example, hunger be satisfied without any of the pleasures of taste, and so of the other senses. But He has not so done. To every sense He has given its appropriate pleasure as well as its proper use. And though this presents to us a source of temptation, still ought we for it to praise His goodness to the full, and that corde or<i opere. Brad ward, ii. c. 23. from their weariness arise towards Thee, leaning on those things which Thou hast made, and passing on to Thee, who hast made them wonderfully and there is there refreshment and true strength.
Chap. ii. On the vanity of those who ivish to escape the Omnipotent Ood.

2. Let the restless and the unjust depart and flee from Thee. Thou both seest them and distinguishest the shadows.

And lo! all things with them are fair, yet are they themselves foul. 1 And how have they injured Thee? 2 Or in what have they disgraced Thy government, which is just and perfect from heaven even to the lowest parts of the earth. For whither fled they when they fled from Thy presence? 3 Or where dost Thou not find them? 4 But they fled that they might not see Thee seeing them, and blinded might stumble against Thee; since Thou forsakest nothing that Thou hast made that the unjust might stumble against Thee, and justly be hurt, with-

1 Augustine frequently recurs to the idea, that in God's overruling Providence, the foulness and sin of man does not disturb the order and fairness of the universe. He illustrates the idea by reference to music, painting, and oratory. " For as the beauty of a picture is increased by well-managed shadows, so, to the eye that has skill to discern it, the universe is beautified even by sinners, though, con-

2 Bidered by themselves, their deformity is a sad blemish " (De Civ. Dei. xi. 23). So again, he says, God would never have created angels or men whose future wickedness He foreknew, unless He could turn them to the use of the good, "thus embellishing the course of the ages as it were an exquisite poem set off with antitheses " (ibid. xi. 18); and further on, in the same section, " as the oppositions of contraries lend beauty to language, so the beauty of the course of this world is achieved by the opposition of contraries, arranged, as it were, by an eloquenue not of words, but of things." These reflections affected Augustine's views as to the last things. They seemed to him to render the idea entertained by Origen (De Princ. i. 6) and other Fathers as to a general restoration [a^oxec rd, <rraai;) unnecessary. See Hagenbach's Hist. of Doct. etc. i. 383 (Clark).

3 "In Scripture they are called God's enemies who oppose His rule not by nature but by vice, having no power to hurt Him, but only themselves. For they are His enemies not through their power to hurt, but by their will to oppose Him. For God is unchangeable, and wholly proof against injury " (De Civ. Dei. xii. 3).

4 Ps. exxxix. 7. 4 Gen. xvi. 13, 14. 5 Wisd. ii. 2f. Old ver.

6 He also refers to the injury man does himself by sin in ii. sec. 13, above; and elsewhere he suggests the law which underlies it: "The vice which makes those who are called God's enemies resist Him, is an evil not to God but to themselves. And to them it is an evil solely because it corrupts the good of their nature. " And drawing themselves from Thy gentleness, and stumbling against Thine uprightness, and falling upon their own roughness. Forsooth, they know not that Thou art everywhere whom no place encompasseth, and that Thou alone art near even to those that remove far from Thee. Let them, then, be converted and seek Thee; because not as they have forsaken their Creator hast Thou forsaken Thy creature. Let them be converted and seek Thee; and behold, Thou art there in their hearts, in the hearts of those who confess to Thee, and cast themselves upon Thee, and weep on Thy bosom after their obdurate ways, even Thou gently wiping away their tears. And they weep the more, and rejoice in weeping, since Thou, O Lord, not man, flesh and blood, but Thou, Lord, who didst make, remakest and comfortest them. And where was I when I was seeking Thee? Aud Thou wert before me, but I had gone away even from myself; nor did I find myself, much less Thee!

Chap. hi. Having heard Faustus, the most learned bishop of the Manichaians, he discerns that God, the Author both of things animate and inanimate, chiefly has care for the humble.

3. Let me lay bare before my God that twenty-ninth year of my age. There had at this time come to Carthage a certain bishop of the Manichseans, by name Faustus, a great snare of the devil, and many were entangled by him through the allurement of his smooth speech; the which, although I did commend, yet could I separate from the truth of those things which I was eager to learn. Nor did I esteem the small dish of oratory so much as the science, which this their so praised Faustus placed before me to feed upon. Fame, indeed, had before spoken of him to me, as most skilled in all becoming learning, and pre-eminently skilled in the liberal sciences. And as I had read and retained in memory many injunctions of the philosophers, I used to compare some teachings when we suffer for our sins we should thank God that we are not unpunished (De Civ. Dei. xii. 3). But if, when God punishes us, we still continue in our sin, we shall be more confirmed in habits of sin, and then, as Augustine in another place (in Ps. vii. 15) warns us, "our facility in sinning will be the punishment of God for our former yieldings to sin." See also Butler's Analogy, Pt. i. ch. 5, "On a state of probation as intended for moral discipline and improvement."

1 Ps. lxxiii. 27.
The proud Thou knowest afar off." 2 Nor dost Thou draw near but to the contrite heart, 3 nor art Thou found by the Droud, 4 not even could they number by cunning skill the stars and the sand, and measure the starry regions, and trace the courses of the planets.

4. For with their understanding and the capacity which Thou hast bestowed upon them they search out these things; md much have they found out, and foretold many years before, the eclipses of those luminaries, the sun and moon, on what lay, at what hour, and from how many particular points they were likely to come. Nor did their calculation fail them; and it came to pass even as they foretold. And they wrote down the rules found out, which are read at this day; and from these others foretell in what year, and in what month of the year, and on what day of the month, and at what hour of the day, and at what quarter of its light, either moon or sun to be eclipsed, and thus it shall be even as it is foretold.

ind men who are ignorant of these things marvel and are amazed, and they that know them exult and are exalted; and by an impious pride, departing from Thee, and forsaking Thy light, they foretell a failure of the sun's light which is likely to occur so long before, but see not their own, which is now present. For they seek not religiously whence they have the ability wherewith they seek out these things. And finding that Thou hast made them, they give not themselves up to thee, that Thou mayest preserve what Thou hast made, noracrifice themselves to Thee, even such as they have made themselves to be; nor do they slay their own pride, as fowlsifth the air, 5 nor their own curiosities, by which (like the fishes of the sea) they wander over the unknown paths of the abyss, nor their own extravagance, as the " beasts of the field," * that Thou, Lord, "a consuming fire," 2 mayest burn up their lifeless cares and renew them immortally.

5. But the way Thy Word, 3 by whom Thou didst make these things which they number, and themselves who number, and the sense by which they perceive what they number, and the judgment out of which they number they knew not, and that of Thy wisdom there is no number. 4 But the Onlybegotten has been " made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification," 5 and has been numbered amongst us, and paid tribute to Cæsar. 6 This way, by which they might descend to Him from themselves, they knew not; nor that through Him they might ascend unto Him. 7 This way they knew not, and they think themselves exalted with the stars 8 and shining, and lo! they fell upon the earth, 9 and "their foolish heart was darkened." 10 They say many true things concerning the creature; but Truth, the Artificer of the creature, they seek not with devotion, and hence they find Him not.

Or if they find Him, knowing that He is God, they glorify Him not as God, neither are they thankful, 11 but become vain in their imaginations, and say that they themselves are wise, 1 attributing to themselves what is Thine; and by this, with most perverse blindness, they desire to impute to Thee what is their own, forging lies against Thee who art the Truth, and changing the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things, 13 changing Thy truth into a lie, and worshipping and serving the creature more than the Creator. 14

6. Many truths, however, concerning the creature did I retain will be seen that there is a correspondence between them and the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, in 1 John ii. 16. See also above, Book iii. sec. 16; and below, Book x. sec. 41, etc.

from these men, and the cause appeared to me from calculations, the succession of seasons, and the visible manifestations of the stars; and I compared them with the sayings of Manichæus, who in his frenzy has written most extensively on these subjects, but discovered not any account either of the solstices, or the equinoxes, the eclipses of the luminaries, or anything of the kind I had learned in the books of secular philosophy. But therein I was ordered to believe, and yet it corresponded not with those rules acknowledged by calculation and my own sight, but was far different.
Chap. iv. That the knowledge of terrestrial and celestial things does not give happiness, but the knowledge of God only.

7. Doth, then, Lord God of truth, whosoever knoweth those things therefore please Thee? For unhappy is the man who knoweth all those things, but knoweth Thee not; but happy is he who knoweth Thee, though these he may not know. 1 But he who knoweth both Thee and them is not the happier on account of them, but is happy on account of Thee only, if knowing Thee he glorify Thee as God, and gives thanks, and becomes not vain in his thoughts. 2 But as he is happier who knows how to possess a tree, and for the use thereof renders thanks to Thee, although he may not know how many cubits high it is, or how wide it spreads, than he that measures it and counts all its branches, and neither owns it nor knows or loves its Creator; so a just man, whose is the entire world of wealth, 3 and who, as having nothing, yet possesseth all things 4 by cleaving unto Thee, to whom all things

1 What a contrast does his attitude here present to his supreme regard for secular learning before his conversion! We have constantly in his writings expressions of the same kind. On Psalm ciii. he dilates lovingly on the fount of happiness the word of God is, as compared with the writings of Cicero, Tully, and Plato; and again on Psalm xxxviii. he shows that the word is- the source of all true joy. So likewise in De Trin. iv. 1: "That mind is more praiseworthy which knows even its own weakness, than that which, without regard to this, searches out and even comes to know the ways of the stars, or which holds fast such knowledge already acquired, while ignorant of the way by which itself to enter into its own proper health and strength. . . . Such a one has preferred to know his own weakness, rather than to know the walls of the world, the foundations of the earth, and the pinnacles of heaven." are subservient, though he know not even the circles of -the Great Bear, yet it is foolish to doubt but that he may verily be better than he who can measure the heavens, and number the stars, and weigh the elements, but is forgetful of Thee, "who hast set in order all things in number, weight, and measure." 1

Chap. v. Of Manichis pertinaciously teaching false doctrines, and proudly arrogating to himself the Holy Spirit.
8. But yet who was it that ordered Manichaeus to write on these things likewise, skill in which was not necessary to piety? For Thou hast told man to behold piety and wisdom, of which he might be in ignorance although having a complete knowledge of these other things; but since, knowing not these things, he yet most impudently dared to teach them, it is clear that he had no acquaintance with piety. For even when we have a knowledge of these worldly matters, it is folly to make a profession of them; but confession to Thee is piety. It was therefore with this view that this straying one spake much of these matters, that, standing convicted by those who had in truth learned them, the understanding that he really had in those more difficult things might be made plain. For he wished not to be lightly esteemed, but went about trying to persuade men that the Holy Ghost, the Comforter and Enricher of Thy faithful ones, was with full authority personally resident in him. 3 When, therefore, it was dis-

1 Wisd. xi. 20. 2 Job xxviii. 28 in LXX. reads: 'Isoi> k haa'ifrud. Un <r<pix.

3 This claim of Manichseus was supported by referring to the Lord's promise (John xvi. 12, 13) to send the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, to guide the apostles into that truth which they were as yet "not able to bear." The Manichseans used the words "Paraclete" and "Comforter," as indeed the names of the other two persons of the blessed Trinity, in a sense entirely different from that of the gospel. These terms were little more than the bodily frame, the soul of which was his own heretical belief. Whenever opposition appeared between that belief and the teaching of Scripture, their ready answer was that the Scriptures had been corrupted (De Mor. Ecc. Cath. xxviii. and xxix. ); and in such a case, as we find Faustus contending (Con. Faust, xxxii. 6), the Paraclete taught them what part to receive and what to reject, according to the promise of Jesus that He should "guide them into all truth," and much more to the same effect. Augustine's whole argument in reply is well worthy of attention. Amongst other things, he points out that the Manichsean pretension to having received the promised Paraclete was precisely the same as that of the covered that his teaching concerning the heavens and stars, and the motions of sun and moon, was false, though these things do not relate to the doctrine of religion, yet his sacrilegious arrogance would become sufficiently evident, seeing that not only did he affirm things of which he knew nothing, but also perverted them, and with such egregious vanity of pride as to seek to attribute them to himself as to a divine being.

9. For when I hear a Christian brother ignorant of these things, or in error concerning them, I can bear with patience to see that man hold to his opinions; nor can I apprehend that any want of knowledge as to the situation or nature of this material creation can be injurious to him, so long as he does not entertain belief in anything unworthy of Thee, O Lord, the Creator of all. But if he conceives it to pertain to the form of the doctrine of piety, and presumes to affirm with great obstinacy that whereof he is ignorant, therein lies the injury. And yet even a weakness such as this in the dawn of faith is borne by our Mother Charity, till the new man may grow up "unto a perfect man," and not be "carried about with every wind of doctrine." I But in him who thus presumed to be at once the teacher, author, head, and leader of all whom he could induce to believe this, so that all who followed him believed that they were following not a simple man only, but Thy Holy Spirit, who would not judge that such great insanity, when once it stood convicted of false teaching, should be abhorred and utterly cast off? But I had not yet clearly ascertained whether the changes of longer and shorter days and nights, and day and night itself, with the eclipses of the greater lights, and whatever of the like kind I had read in other books, could be expounded consistently with his words. Should I have found myself able to do so, there would still have remained a doubt in my mind whether it were so or no, although I might, on the strength of his reputed godliness, rest my faith on his authority.

Montanists in the previous century. It should be observed that Beausobre (Histoire, i. 254, 264, etc.) vigorously rebuts the charge brought against Manichseus of claiming to be the Holy Ghost. An interesting examination of the claims of Montanus will be found in Kaye's Tertullian, pp. 13 to 33.

00 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK V.]

Chap. VI. Faustus was indeed an elegant speaker, but knew nothing of the liberal sciences.

10. And for nearly the whole of those nine years during which, with unstable mind, I had been their follower, I had been looking forward with but too great eagerness for the arrival of this same Faustus. For the other members of the sect whom I had chanced to light upon, when unable to answer the questions I raised, always bade me look forward to his coining, when, by discoursing with him, these, and greater difficulties if I had them, would be most easily and amply cleared away. When at last he did come, I found him to be a man of pleasant speech, who spoke of the very same things as they themselves did, although more fluently, and in better language. But of what profit to me was the elegance of my cup-bearer, since he offered me not the more precious draught for which I thirsted? My ears were already satiated with similar things; neither did they appear to me more conclusive, because better expressed; nor true, because oratorical; nor the spirit necessarily wise, because the face was comely and the language eloquent. But they who extolled him to me were not competent judges; and therefore, as he was possessed of suavity of speech, he appeared to them to be prudent and wise. Another sort of persons, however, was, I was aware, suspicious even of truth itself, if enunciated in smooth and flowing language. But me, my God, Thou hadst already instructed by wonderful and mysterious ways, and therefore I believe that Thou instructedst me because it is truth; nor of truth is there any other teacher where or whencesoever it may shine upon us * but Thee. From Thee, therefore, I had now learned, that because a thing is eloquently expressed, it should not of necessity seem to be true; nor, because uttered with stammering lips, should it be false; nor, again, perforce true, because unskilfully delivered; nor consequently untrue, because the language is fine; but that wisdom and folly are as food both wholesome and unwholesome, and courtly or simple words as town-made or rustic vessels, and both kinds of food may be served in either kind of dish.

11. That eagerness, therefore, with which I had so long waited for this man was in truth delighted with his action and feeling when disputing, and the fluent and apt words with which he clothed his ideas. I was therefore filled with joy, and joined with others (and even exceeded them)

, in exalting and praising him. It was, however, a source of annoyance to me that I was not allowed at those meetings of his auditors to introduce and impart 1 any of those questions that troubled me in familiar exchange of arguments with him. When I might speak, and began, in conjunction with my friends, to engage his attention at such times as it was not unseeming for him to enter into a discussion with me, and had mooted such questions as perplexed me, I discovered him first to know nothing of the liberal sciences save grammar, and that only in an ordinary way. Having, however, read some of Tully's Orations, a very few books of Seneca, and some of the poets, and such few volumes of his own sect as were written coherently in Latin, and being day by day practised in speaking, he so acquired a sort of eloquence, which proved the more delightful and enticing in that it was under the control of ready tact, and a sort of native grace. Is it not even as I recall, O Lord my God, Thou judge of my conscience ? My heart and my memory are laid before Thee, who didst at that time direct me by the inscrutable mystery of Thy Providence, and didst set before my face those vile errors of mine, in order that I might see and loathe them.

Chap. vii. Clearly seeing the fallacies of the Manichcean, he retires from them, being remarkably aided by God.

12. For when it became plain to me that he was ignorant of those arts in which I had believed him to excel, I began to despair of his clearing up and explaining all the 1 "This was the old fashion of the East, where the scholars had liberty to ask questions of their masters, and to move doubts as the professors were reading, or so soon as the lecture was done. 92 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK V.]

perplexities which harassed me: though ignorant of these, however, he might still have held the truth of piety, had he not been a Manichoean. For their books are full of lengthy fables concerning the heaven and stars, the sun and moon, and I had ceased to think him able to decide in a satisfactory manner what I ardently desired, whether, on comparing these things with the calculations I had read elsewhere, the explanations contained in the works of Manichseus were preferable, or at any rate equally sound? But when I proposed that these subjects should be deliberated upon and reasoned out, he

We have referred in the note on iii. sec. 10, above, to the way in which the Manichseans parodied Scripture names. In these "fables" this is remarkably evidenced. "To these filthy rags of yours," says Augustine (Con. Faust, xx. 6), "you would unite the mystery of the Trinity; for you say that the Father dwells in a secret light, the power of the Son in the sun, and His wisdom in the moon, and the Holy Spirit in the air." The Manichsean doctrine as to the mixture or the divine nature with the substance of evil, and the way in which that nature was released by the "elect," has already been pointed out (see note iii. sec. 18, above).

The part of sun and moon, also, in accomplishing this release, is alluded to in his De Mor. Manich. "This part of God," he says (c. xxxvi.), "is daily being set free in all parts of the world, and restored to its own domain. But in its passage upwards as vapour from earth to heaven, it enters plants, because their roots are fixed in the earth, and so gives fertility and strength to all herbs and shrubs."

These parts of God, arrested in their rise by the vegetable world, were released, as above stated, by the "elect." All that escaped from them in the act of eating, as well as what was set free by evaporation, passed into the sun and moon, as into a kind of purgatorial state they being purer light than the only recently emancipated good nature. In his letter to Januarius (Ep. iv. 6), he tells us that the moon's waxing and waning were said by the Manichseans to be caused by its receiving souls from matter as it were into a ship, and transferring them "into the sun as into another ship." The sun was called Christ, and was worshipped; and accordingly we find Augustine, after alluding to these monstrous doctrines, saying (Con. Faust, v. 11): "If your affections were set upon spiritual and intellectual good instead of material forms, you would not pay homage to the material sun as a divine substance and as the light of wisdom."

Many other interesting quotations might be added, but we must content ourselves with the following. In his Reply to Faustus (xx. 6), he says: "You call the sun a ship, so that you are not only astray worlds off, as the saying is, but adrift. Next, while every cue sees that the sun is round, which is the form corresponding from its perfection to his position among the heavenly bodies, you maintain that he is triangular [perhaps in allusion to the early symbol of the Trinity]; that is, that his light shines on the earth through a triangular window in heaven. Hence it is that you bend and bow your heads to the sun, while you worship not this visible sun, but some imaginary ship, which you suppose to be shining through a triangular opening."

very modestly did not dare to endure the burden. For he was aware that he had no knowledge of these things, and was not ashamed to confess it. For he was not one of those loquacious persons, many of whom I had been troubled with, who covenanted to teach me these things, and said nothing; but this man possessed a heart, which, though not right towards Thee, yet was not altogether false towards himself. For he was not altogether ignorant of his own ignorance, nor would he without due consideration be inveigled in a controversy, from which he could neither draw back nor extricate himself fairly. And for that I was even more pleased with him, for more beautiful is the modesty of an ingenuous mind than the acquisition of the knowledge I desired, and such I found him to be in all the more abstruse and subtle questions.

13. My eagerness after the writings of Manichreus having thus received a check, and despairing even more of their other teachers, seeing that in sundry things which puzzled me, he, so famous amongst them, had thus turned out, I began to occupy myself with him in the study of that literature which he also much affected, and which I, as Professor of Ehetoric, was then engaged in teaching the young Carthaginian students, and in reading with him either what he expressed a wish to hear, or I deemed suited to his bent of mind. But all my endeavours by which I had concluded to improve in that sect, by acquaintance with that man, came completely to an end: not that I separated myself altogether from them, but, as one who could find nothing better, I determined in the meantime upon contenting myself with what I had in any way lighted upon, unless, by chance, something more desirable should present itself. Thus that Faustus, who had entrapped so many to their death, neither willing nor witting it, now began to loosen the snare in which I had been taken. For Thy hands, O my God, in the hidden design of Thy Providence, did not desert my soul; and out of the blood of my mother's heart, through the tears that she poured out by day and by night, was a sacrifice offered unto Thee for me; and by marvellous ways didst Thou deal with me. 1 It was Thou, O my God, who didst it, for the steps of a man are ordered by the Lord, and He shall dispose his way. 1 Or how can we procure salvation but from Thy hand, remaking what it hath made?

Chap. viii. He sets out for Rome, his mother in vain lamenting it.

14. Thou dealest with me, therefore, that I should be persuaded to go to Rome, and teach there rather what I was then teaching at Carthage. And how I was persuaded to do this, I will not fail to confess unto Thee; for in this also the profoundest workings of Thy wisdom, and Thy ever present mercy to usward, must be pondered and avowed. It was not my desire to go to Rome because greater advantages and dignities were guaranteed me by the friends who persuaded me into this, although even at this period I was influenced by these considerations, but my principal and almost sole motive was, that I had been informed that the youths studied more quietly there, and were kept under by the control of more rigid discipline, so that they did not capriciously and impudently rush into the school of a master not their own, into whose presence they were forbidden to enter unless with his consent. At Carthage, on the contrary, there was amongst the scholars a shameful and intemperate license. They burst in rudely, and, with almost furious gesticulations, interrupt the system which any one may have instituted for the good of his pupils. Many outrages they perpetrate with astounding phlegm, which would be punishable by law were they not sustained by custom; that custom showing them to be the more worthless, in that they now do, as according to law, what by Thy unchangeable law will never be lawful. And they fancy they do it with impunity, whereas the very blindness whereby they do it is their punishment, and they suffer far greater things than they do. The manners, then, which as a student I would not adopt, I was compelled as a teacher to submit to from others; and so I was too glad to go where all who knew anything about it assured me that similar things were not done. But Thou, "my refuge 1 Ps. xxxvii. 23. s See iii. sec. 6, note, above.

and my portion in the land of the living," * didst while at Carthage goad me, so that I might thereby be withdrawn from it, and exchange my worldly habitation for the preservation of my soul; whilst at Rome Thou didst offer me enticements by which to attract me there, by men enchanted with this dying life, the one doing insane actions, and the other making assurances of vain things; and, in order to correct my footsteps, didst secretly employ their and my perversity. For both they who disturbed my tranquillity were blinded by a shameful madness, and they who allured me elsewhere smacked of the earth. And I, who hated real misery here, sought fictitious happiness there.

15. But the cause of my going thence and going thither, Thou, God, knewest, yet revealedst it not, either to me or to my mother, who grievously lamented my journey, and went with me as far as the sea. But I deceived her, when she violently restrained me either that she might retain me or accompany me, and I pretended that I had a friend whom I could not quit until he had a favourable wind to set sail.
And I lied to my mother and such a mother! and got away. For this also Thou hast in mercy pardoned me, saving me, thus replete with abominable pollutions, from the waters of the sea, for the water of Thy grace, whereby, when I was purified, the fountains of my mother's eyes should be dried, from which for me she day by day watered the ground under her face. And yet, refusing to go back without me, it was with difficulty I persuaded her to remain that night in a place quite close to our ship, where there was an oratory in memory of the blessed Cyprian. That night I secretly left, but she was not backward in prayers and weeping. And what was it, Lord, that she, with such an abundance of tears, was asking of Thee, but that Thou wouldest not permit me to sail? But Thou, mysteriously counselling and hearing the real purpose of her desire, granted not what she then asked, in order to make me what she was ever asking. The wind blew and filled our sails, and withdrew the shore from our sight; and she, wild with grief, was there on the morrow, and filled Thine ears with complaints and groans, which Thou didst disregard; whilst, by the means of my longings, Thou wert hastening me on to the cessation of all longing, and the gross part of her love to me was whipped out by the just lash of sorrow. But, like all mothers, though even more than others, she loved to have me with her, and knew not what joy Thou wert preparing for her by my absence. Being ignorant of this, she did weep and mourn, and in her agony was seen the inheritance of Eve, seeking in sorrow what in sorrow she had brought forth. And yet, after accusing my perfidy and cruelty, she again continued her intercessions for me with Thee, returned to her accustomed place, and I to Rome.

Chap. ix. Being attacked by fever, he is in great danger.

16. And behold, there was I received by the scourge of bodily sickness, and I was descending into hell burdened with all the sins that I had committed, both against Thee, myself, and others, many and grievous, over and above that bond of original sin whereby we all die in Adam. 1 For none of these things hadst Thou forgiven me in Christ, neither had He " abolished " by His cross " the enmity " 2 which, by my sins, I had incurred with Thee. For how could He, by the crucifixion of a phantasm, 3 which I supposed

1 1 Cor. xv. 22. 2 Eph. ii. 15, and Col. i. 20, etc.

3 The Manichsean belief in regard to the unreal nature of Christ's body may be gathered from Augustine's Reply to Faustus: "You ask," argues Faustus (xxvi. i.), "if Jesus was not born, how did He die? ... In return I ask you, how did Elias not die, though he was a man? Could a mortal encroach upon the limits of immortality, and could not Christ add to His immortality whatever experience of death was required?
Accordingly, if it is a good argument that Jesus was a man because He died, it is an equally good argument that Elias was not a man because he did not die. As, from the outset of His taking the likeness of man, He underwent in appearance all the experiences of humanity, it was quite consistent that He should complete the system by appearing to die.” So that with him the whole life of Jesus was a “phantasm.” His birth, circumcision, crucifixion, baptism, and temptation were (ibid, xxxii. 7) the mere result of the interpolation of crafty men, or sprung from the ignorance of the apostles, when as yet they had not reached perfection in knowledge. It is noticeable that Augustine, referring to Eph. ii. 15, substitutes His cross for His flesh, he, as a Manichaean, not believing in the real humanity of the Son of God. See iii. sec. 9, note, above.

CHAP. IX.] HOW HIS MOTHER YEARNS FOR HIM. 97

Him to be? As true, then, was the death of my soul, as that of His flesh appeared to me to be untrue; and as true the death of His flesh as the life of my soul, which believed it not, was false. The fever increasing, I was now passing away and perishing. For had I then gone hence, whither should I have gone but into the fiery torments meet for my misdeeds, in the truth of Thy ordinance? She was ignorant of this, yet, while absent, prayed for me. But Thou, everywhere present, hearkened to her where she was, and hadst pity upon me where I was, that I should regain my bodily health, although still frenzied in my sacrilegious heart. For all that peril did not make me wish to be baptized, and I was better when, as a lad, I entreated it of my mother's piety, as I have already related and confessed. But I had grown up to my own dishonour, and all the purposes of Thy medicine I madly derided, 2 who wouidst not suffer me, though such a one, to die a double death. Had my mother's heart been smitten with this wound, it never could have been cured. For I cannot sufficiently express the love she had for me, nor how she now travailed for me in the spirit with a far keener anguish than when she bore me in the flesh.

17. I cannot conceive, therefore, how she could have been healed if such a death of mine had transfixed the bowels of her love. Where then would have been her so earnest, frequent, and uninterrupted prayers to Thee alone? But couldst Thou, most merciful God, despise the "contrite and humble heart" 8 of that pure and prudent widow, so constant in alms-deeds, so gracious and attentive to Thy saints, not permitting one day to pass without oblation at Thy altar, twice a day, at morning and even-tide, coming to Thy church without intermission not for vain gossiping, nor old wives' "fables," * but in order that she might listen to Thee in Thy sermons, and Thou to her in her prayers? 5 Couldst Thou Thou by whose gift she was such despise and disregard without succouring the tears of such a one, wherewith she entreated Thee not for gold or silver, nor for any changing or fleeting good, but for the salvation of the soul of her son? By no means, Lord. Assuredly Thou wert near, and wert hearing and doing in that method in which Thou hadst predetermined that it should be done. Far he it from Thee that Thou shouldst delude her in those visions and the answers she had from Thee, some of which I have spoken of, 1 and others not, 2 which she kept 3 in her faithful breast, and, always where it was received by the deacons, who presented them to the priest or bishop.

Here note: (1) They communicated daily; (2) they had service morning and evening, and two sermons a day many times," etc. An interesting trace of an old use in this matter of oblations is found in the Queen's Coronation Service.

After other oblations had been offered, the Queen knelt before the Archbishop and presented to him "oblations" of bread and wine for the Holy Communion. See also Palmer's Orhjines Liturgiece, iv. 8, who demonstrates by reference to patristic writers that the custom was universal in the primitive Church: " But though all the churches of the East and West agreed in this respect, they differed in appointing the time and place at which the oblations of the people were received. " It would appear from the following account of early Christian worship, that in the time of Justin Martyr the oblations were collected after the reception of the Lord's Supper. In his First Apology we read (c. lxvii.): "On the day called Sunday [mv falov Xyol/tivn ipigf] all who live in cities or in the country gather together to one place, and the memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets are read, as long as time permits them. When the reader has ceased, the president ['rpoio-rusi verbally instructs, and exhorts to the imitation of these good things. Then we all rise together and pray [tv%us Trififofiv], and, as we before said, when our prayer is ended, bread and wine and water are brought, and the president in like manner offers prayers and thanksgivings according to his ability [Kaye renders (p. 89) iv%&s opo'ivs *J ivxapio-Tictf, oa-ti luvapts eturaj, uvetwitiirm, "with his utmost power"], and the people assent, saying Amen; and there is a distribution to each, and a participation of that over which thanks had been given, and to those who are absent a portion is sent by the deacons. And they who are well-to-do, and willing, give what each thinks fit; and what is collected [to o-vWiypnov] is deposited with the president, who succours the orphans and widows, and those who, through sickness or any other cause, are in want, and those who are in bonds, and the strangers sojourning among us, and, in a word, takes care of all who are in need."
The whole passage is given, as portions of it will be found to have a bearing on other parts of the Confessions. Bishop Kaye's Justin Martyr, c. iv., may be referred to for his view of the controverted points in the passage. petitioning, pressed upon Thee as Thine autograph. For Thou, " because Thy mercy endureth for ever," * condescendest to those whose debts Thou hast pardoned, to become likewise a debtor by Thy promises.

Chap. x. When he had left the Manichceans, he retained his depraved opinions concerning sin and the origin of the Saviour.

18. Thou restoredst me then from that illness, and made sound the son of Thy handmaid meanwhile in body, that he might live for Thee, to endow him with a higher and more enduring health. And even then at Borne I joined those deluding and deluded "saints;" not their "hearers" only, of the number of whom was he in whose house I had fallen ill, and had recovered, but those also whom they designate " The Elect." 2 For it still seemed to me "that it was not we that sin, but that I know not what other nature sinned in us." 3 And it gratified my pride to be free from blame, and, after I had committed any fault, not to acknowledge that I had done any, "that Thou mightest heal my soul because it had sinned against Thee;" 4 but I loved to excuse it, and to accuse something else (I wot not what) which was with me, but was not I. But assuredly it was wholly I, and my impiety had divided me against myself; and that sin was all the more incurable in that I did not deem myself a sinner. And execrable iniquity it was,

God omnipotent, that I would rather have Thee to be overcome in me to my destruction, than myself of Thee to salvation !

Not yet, therefore, hadst Thou set a watch before my mouth, and kept the door of my lips, that my heart might not incline to wicked speeches, to make excuses of sins, with men that work iniquity 5 and, therefore, was I still united with their "Elect."

19. But now, hopeless of making proficiency in that false doctrine, even those things with which I had decided upon contenting myself, providing that I could find nothing better, I now held more loosely and negligently. For I was hall inclined to believe that those philosophers whom they call

" Academics " 1 were more sagacious than the rest, in that they held that we ought to doubt everything, and ruled that man had not the power of comprehending any truth; for so,

1 "Amongst these philosophers," i.e. those who have founded their systems on denial, " some are satisfied with denying certainty, admitting at the same time probability, and these are the New Academics; the others, who are the Pyrrhonists, have denied even this probability, and have maintained that all things are equally certain and uncertain " (Port. Boy. Log. iv. 1). There are, according to the usual divisions, three Academies, the old, the middle, and the new; and some subdivide the middle and the new each into two schools, making five schools of thought in all. These begin with Plato, the founder (387 B.C.), and continue to the fifth school, founded by Antiochus (83 B.C.), who, by combining his teachings with that of Aristotle and Zeno, prepared the way for Neo-Platonism and its development of the dogmatic side of Plato's teaching. In the second Academic school, founded by Arcesilas, of whom Aristo, the Stoic, parodying the line in the Iliad (vi. 181), Up'oafa Xt&m, TThv 8s Ipaxa/*, (tXviry li x'lpaipa, said sarcastically he was ' ' Plato in front, Pyrrho behind, and Diodorus in the middle," the " sceptical " tendency in Platonism began to develope itself, which, under Carneades, was expanded into the doctrine of the third Academic school. Arcesilas had been a pupil of Polemo when he was head of the old Academy. Zeno also, dissatisfied with the cynical philosophy of Crates, had learnt Platonic doctrine from Polemo, and was, as Cicero tells us (De Fin. iv. 16), greatly influenced by his teaching. Zeno, however, soon founded his own school of Stoical philosophy, which was violently opposed by Arcesilas (Cicero, Acad. Post. i. 12). Arcesilas, according to Cicero (ibid.), taught his pupils that we cannot know anything, not even that we are unable to know. It is exceedingly probable, however, that he taught esoterically the doctrines of Plato to those of his pupils he thought able to receive them, keeping them back from the multitude because of the prevalence of the new doctrine.

This appears to have been Augustine's view when he had arrived at a fuller knowledge of their doctrines than that he possessed at the time referred to in his Confessions. In his treatises against the Academicians (iii. 17) he maintains the wisdom of Arcesilas in this matter. He says: "As the multitude are prone to rush into false opinions, and, from being accustomed to bodies, readily, but to their hurt, believe everything to be corporeal, this most acute and learned man determined rather to unteach those who had suffered from bad teaching, than to teach those whom he did not think teachable. " Again, in the first of his Letters, alluding to these treatises, he says: " It seems to me to be suitable enough to the times in which they flourished, that whatever issued pure from the fountainhead of Platonic philosophy should be rather conducted into dark and thorny thickets for the refreshment of a very few men, than left to flow in open meadowland, where it would be impossible to keep it clear and pure from the inroads of the vulgar herd. I use the word ' herd ' advisedly, for what is more brutish than the opinion that the soul is material ? " and more to the same purpose.

In his De Civ. Dei, xix. 18, he contrasts the uncertainty ascribed to the doctrines of these teachers with the certainty of the Christian faith. See Burton's Bampton Lectures, note 33, and Archer Butler's Ancient Philosophy, ii. 313, 348, etc. See also vii. sec. 13, note, below.

CHAP. X.] HIS ERRONEOUS VIEWS AS TO CHRISTIANITY. 101

not yet realizing their meaning, I also was fully persuaded that they thought just as they are commonly held to do.

And I did not fail frankly to restrain in my host that assurance which I observed him to have in those fictions of which the works of Manichaeus are full. Notwithstanding, I was on terms of more intimate friendship with them than with others who were not of this heresy. Nor did I defend it with my former ardour; still my familiarity with that sect (many of them being concealed in Eome) made me slower 1 to seek any other way, particularly since I was hopeless of finding the truth, from which in Thy Church, Lord of heaven and earth, Creator of all things visible and invisible, they had turned me aside, and it seemed to me most unbecoming to believe Thee to have the form of human flesh, and to be bounded by the bodily lineaments of our members. And because, when I desired to meditate on my God, I knew no what to think of but a mass of bodies 2 (for what was not such did not seem to me to be), this was the greatest and almost sole cause of my inevitable error.

20. For hence I also believed evil to be a similar sort of substance, and to be possessed of its own foul and misshapen mass whether dense, which they denominated earth, or thin and subtle, as is the body of the air, which they fancy some malignant spirit crawling through that earth. And because a piety such as it was compelled me to believe that the good God never created any evil nature, I conceived two masses, the one opposed to the other, both infinite, but the evil the more contracted, the good the more expansive. And from this mischievous commencement the other profanities followed on me. For when my mind tried to revert to the Catholic faith, I was cast back, since what I had held to be the Catholic faith was not so. And it appeared to me more devout to look upon Thee, my God, to whom I make confession of Thy mercies, as infinite, at least, on other sides, although on that side where the mass of evil was in opposition to Thee 3 I was compelled to confess Thee finite, than if on every side I should conceive Thee to be confined by the form of a human body. And better did it seem to me to believe that no evil had been created by Thee which to me in my ignorance appeared not only some substance, but a bodily one, because I had no conception of the mind excepting as a subtle body, and that diffused in local spaces than to believe that anything could emanate from Thee of such a kind as I considered the nature of evil to be. And our very Saviour Himself, also, Thine onlybegotten, I believed to have been reached forth, as it were, for our salvation out of the lump of Thy most effulgent mass, so as to believe nothing of Him but what I was able to imagine in my vanity. Such a nature, then, I thought could not be born of the Virgin Mary without being mingled with the flesh; and how that which I had thus figured to myself could be mingled without being contaminated, I saw not. I was afraid, therefore, to believe Him to be born in the flesh, lest I should be compelled to believe Him contaminated by the flesh. 2 Now will Thy spiritual ones blandly and lovingly smile at me if they shall read these my confessions; yet such was I.

Chap. xi. Helpidius disputed well against the Manichcean as to the authenticity of the New Testament.

21. Furthermore, whatever they had censured 3 in Thy Scriptures I thought impossible to be defended; and yet sometimes, indeed, I desired to confer on these several points with some one well learned in those books, and to try what he thought of them. For at this time the words of one Helpidius,

- The dualistic belief of the Manichcean ever led him to contend that Christ only appeared in a resemblance of flesh, and did not touch its substance so as to be defiled. Hence Faustus characteristically speaks of the Incarnation (Con. Faust, xxxii. 7) as "the shameful birth of Jesus from a woman," and when pressed (ibid. xi. 1) with such passages as, Christ was "born of the seed of David according to the flesh " (Eom. i. 3), he would fall back upon what in these days we are familiar with as that " higher criticism," which rejects such parts of Scripture as it is inconvenient to receive. Paul, he said, then only " spoke as a child " (1 Cor. xiii. 11), but when he became a man in doctrine, he put away childish things, and then declared, " Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we Him no more." speaking and disputing face to face against the said Manichoeans, had begun to move me even at Carthage, in that he brought forth things from the Scriptures not easily withstood, to which their answer appeared to me feeble. And this answer they did not give forth publicly, but only to us in private, when they said that the writings of the New Testament had been tampered with by I know not whom, who were desirous of ingrafting the Jewish law upon the Christian faith; 1 but they themselves did not bring forward any uncorrupted copies. 2
But I, thinking of corporeal things, very much ensnared and in a measure stifled, was oppressed by those masses; 3 panting under which for the breath of Thy Truth, I was not able to breathe it pure and undefiled.

Chap. xii. Prof easing Rhetoric at Rome, he discovers the fraud of his scholars.

22. Then began I assiduously to practise that for which I came to Rome the teaching of rhetoric; and first to bring together at my home some to whom, and through whom, I had begun to be known; when, behold, I learnt that other offences were committed in Rome which I had not to bear in Africa. For those subvertings by abandoned young men were not practised here, as I had been informed; yet, suddenly, said they, to evade paying their master's fees, many of the youths conspire together, and remove themselves to another, breakers of faith, who, for the love of money, set a small value on justice. These also my heart " hated," though not with a " perfect hatred; " 4 for, perhaps, I hated them more in that I

2 They might well not like to give the answer in public, for, as Augustine remarks (De Mor. Eccles. Cath. sec. 14), every one could see "that this is all that is left for men to say when it is proved that they are wrong. " The astonishment that he experienced now, that they did ' ' not bring forward any uncorrupted copies, " had fast hold of him, and after his conversion he confronted them on this very ground. "You ought to bring forward," he says (ibid. sec. 61), " another manuscript with the same contents, but incorrupt and more correct, with only the passage wanting which you charge with being spurious. . . . You say you will not, lest you be suspected of corrupting it. This is your usual reply, and a true one." See also De Mor. Manich. sec. 55; and Con. was to suffer by them, than for the illicit acts they committed. Such of a truth are base persons, and they are unfaithful to Thee, loving these transitory mockeries of temporal things, and vile gain, which begrimes the hand that lays hold on it; and embracing the fleeting world, and scorning Thee, who abidest, and invitest to return, and pardonest the prostituted human soul when it returneth to Thee. And now I hate such crooked and perverse men, although I love them if they are to be corrected so as to prefer the learning they obtain to money, and to learning Thee, God, the truth and fulness of certain good and most chaste peace. But then was the wish stronger in me for my own sake not to suffer them evil, than was the wish that they should become good for Thine.

Chap. xiii. He is sent to Milan, that he, about to teach Rhetoric, may be known by Ambrose.

23. When, therefore, they of Milan had sent to Rome to the prefect of the city, to provide them with a teacher of rhetoric for their city, and to despatch him at the public expense, I made interest through those identical persons, drunk with Manichaean vanities, to be freed from whom I was going away, neither of us, however, being aware of it, that Symmachus, the then prefect, having proved me by proposing a subject, would send me. And to Milan I came, unto Ambrose the bishop, known to the whole world as among the best of men, Thy devout servant; whose eloquent discourse did at that time strenuously dispense unto Thy people the flour of Thy wheat, the " gladness " of Thy " oil," and the sober intoxication of Thy " wine." * To him was I unknowingly led by Thee, that by him I might knowingly be led to Thee. That man of God received me like a father, and looked with a benevolent and episcopal kindliness on my change of abode. And I began to love him, not at first, indeed, as a teacher of the truth, which I entirely despised in Thy Church, but as a man friendly to myself. And I studiously hearkened to him preaching to the people, not with the motive I should, but, as it were, trying to discover whether his eloquence came up to the fame thereof, or flowed fuller of lower than was asserted; and I hung on his words intently but of the matter I was but as a careless and contemptuous spectator; and I was delighted with the pleasantness of his speech, more erudite, yet less cheerful and soothing in manner, than that of Faustus. Of the matter, however, there could be no comparison; for the latter was straying amid Manichæan deceptions, whilst the former was teaching salvation most soundly. But " salvation is far from the wicked," * such as I then stood before him; and yet I was drawing nearer gradually and unconsciously.

Chap. xiv. Having heard the Bishop, lie perceives the force of (lie Catholic faith, yet doubts, after the manner of the modern Academics.

24. For although I took no trouble to learn what he spake, but only to hear how he spake (for that empty care alone remained to me, despairing of a way accessible for man to Thee), yet, together with the words which I prized, there came into my mind also the things about which I was careless; for I could not separate them. And whilst I opened my heart to admit " how skilfully he spake," there also entered with it, but gradually, " and how truly he spake ! " For first, these things also had begun to appear to me to be defensible; and the Catholic faith, for which I had fancied nothing could be said against the attacks of the Manichseans, I now conceived might be maintained without presumption; especially after I had heard one or two parts of the Old Testament explained, and often allegorically which when I accepted literally, I was " killed " spiritually. 2 Many places, then, of those books having been expounded to me, I now blamed my despair in having believed that no reply could be made to those who hated and derided 3 the Law and the Prophets. Yet I did not then see that for that reason the Catholic way was to be held

3 He frequently alludes to this scoffing spirit, so characteristic of these heretics. As an example, he says ( in Ps. cxlvi. 13): " There has sprung up a certain accursed sect of the Manichseans which derides the Scriptures it takes and reads. It wishes to censure what it does not understand, and by disturbing and censuring what it understands not, has deceived many." See also sec. 16, and iv. sec. 8, above.

because it had its learned advocates, who could at length, and not irrationally, answer objections; nor that what I held ought therefore to be condemned because both sides were equally defensible. For that way did not appear to me to be vanquished; nor yet did it seem to me to be victorious.

25. Hereupon did I earnestly bend my mind to see if in any way I could possibly prove the Manichseans guilty of falsehood. Could I have realized a spiritual substance, all their strongholds would have been beaten down, and cast utterly out of my mind; but I could not. But yet, concerning the body of this world, and the whole of nature, which the senses of the flesh can attain unto, I, now more and more considering and comparing things, judged that the greater part of the philosophers held much the more probable opinions. So, then, after the manner of the Academics (as they are supposed), I doubting of everything and fluctuating between all, I decided that the Manichseans were to be abandoned; judging that, even while in that period of doubt, I could not remain in a sect to which I preferred some of the philosophers; to which philosophers, however, because they were without the saving name of Christ, I utterly refused to commit the cure of my fainting soul. I resolved, therefore, to be a catechumen 2 in the Catholic Church, which my parents had commended to me, until something settled should manifest itself to me whither I might steer my course. 8

1 See above, sec. 19, and note. 2 See vi. sec. 2, note, below.

3 In his Benefit of Believing, Augustine adverts to the above experiences with a view to the conviction of his friend Honoratus, who was then a Manichaean.

CHAP. I] HIS MOTHERFOLLOWS HIM. 107

BOOK SIXTH.

ATTAINING HIS THIRTIETH YEAR, HE, UNDER THE ADMONITION OF THE DISCOURSES OF AMBROSE, DISCOVERED MORE AND MORE THE TRUTH OF THE CATHOLIC DOCTRINE, AND DELIBERATES AS TO THE BETTER REGULATION OF HIS LIFE.

Chap. I. His mother having followed him to Milan, declares that she will not die before her son shall have embraced the Catholic faith.

1. ~/\ THOU, my hope from my youth, I where wert Thou _/ to me, and whither hadst Thou gone? For in truth, hadst Thou not created me, and made a difference between me and the beasts of the field and fowls of the air? Thou hadst made me wiser than they, yet did I wander about in dark and slippery places, and sought Thee abroad out of myself, and found not the God of my heart; 2 and had entered the depths of the sea, and distrusted and despaired finding out the truth. By this time my mother, made strong by her piety, had come to me, following me over sea and land, in all perils feeling secure in Thee. For in the dangers of the sea she comforted the very sailors (to whom the inexperienced passengers, when alarmed, were wont rather to go for comfort), assuring them of a safe arrival, because she had been so assured by Thee in a vision. She found me in grievous danger, through despair of ever finding truth. But when I had disclosed to her that I was now no longer a Manichsean, though not yet a Catholic Christian, she did not leap for joy as at what was unexpected; although she was now reassured as to that part of my misery for which she had mourned me as one dead, but who would be raised to Thee, carrying me forth upon the bier of her thoughts, that Thou mightest say unto the widow's son, " Young man, I say unto Thee, arise," and he should revive, and begin to speak, and Thou shouldest deliver him to his mother. 1 Her heart, then, was not agitated with any violent exultation, when she had heard that to be already in so great a part accomplished which she daily, with tears, entreated of Thee might be done, that though I had not yet grasped the truth, I was rescued from falsehood. Yea, rather, for that she was fully confident that Thou, who hadst promised the whole, wouldst give the rest, most calmly, and with a breast full of confidence, she replied to me, " She believed in Christ, that before she departed this life, she would see me a Catholic believer." 2 And thus much said she to me; but to Thee, O Fountain of mercies, poured she out more frequent prayers and tears, that Thou wouldest hasten Thy aid, and enlighten my darkness; and she hurried 2 Fidelem Catholicum those who are baptized being usually designated Fiddles.

The following extract from Kaye's Tertullian (pp. 230, 231) is worthy of note:
"As the converts from heathenism, to use Tertullian's expression, were not born, but became Christians _fiunt, nonnascuntur, Christians\], they went through a course of instruction in the principles and doctrines of the gospel, and were subjected to a strict probation before they were admitted to the rite of baptism.
In this stage of their progress they were called catechumens, of whom, according to Suicer, there were two classes, one called 'Audientes,' who had only entered upon their course, and begun to hear the word of God; the other, auvairoZtrts, or ' Competentes, ' who had made such advances in Christian knowledge and practice as to be qualified to appear at the font. Tertullian, however, appears either not to have known or to have neglected this distinction, since he applies the names of ' Audientes ' and ' Auditores ' indifferently to all who had not partaken of the rite of baptism. When the catechumens had given full proof of the ripeness of their knowledge, and of the stedfastness of their faith, they were baptized, admitted to the table of the Lord, and styled Fiddes. The importance which Tertullian attached to this previous probation of the candidates for baptism, appears from the fact that he founds upon the neglect of it one of his charges against the heretics. 'Among them,' he says, 'no distinction is made between the catechumen and the faithful or confirmed Christian; the catechumen is pronounced fit for baptism before he is instructed; all come in indiscriminately; all hear, all pray together.' " There were certain peculiar forms used in the admission of catechumens; as, for example, anointing with oil, imposition of hands, and the consecration and giving of salt; and when, from the progress of Christianity, Tertullian's above description as to converts from heathenism had ceased to be correct, these forms were continued in many churches as part of the baptismal service, whether of infants or adults. See Palmer's Origines Liturgice, v. 1, and also i. sec. 17, above, where Augustine says: "I was signed with the sign of the cross, and was seasoned with His salt, even from the womb of my mother."

CHAP. II.] THE HONOUR DONE TO THE MARTYRS. 109

all the more assiduously to the church, and hung upon the words of Ambrose, praying for the fountain of water that springeth up into everlasting life. 1 For she loved that man as an angel of God, because she knew that it was by him that I had been brought, for the present, to that perplexing state of agitation 2 I was now in, through which she was fully persuaded that I should pass from sickness unto health, after an access, as it were, of a sharper fit, which doctors term the "crisis."

Chap. ii. She, on the prohibition of Ambrose, abstains from honouring the memory of the martyrs.

2. When, therefore, my mother had at one time as was her custom in Africa brought to the oratories built in the memory of the saints 3 certain cakes, and bread, and wine, and

1 John iv. 14.

2 "Sermons," says Goodwin in his Evangelical Communicant, "are, for the most part, as showers of rain that water for the instant; such as may tickle the ear and warm the affections, and put the soul into a posture of obedience. Hence it is that men are oftentimes sermon-sick, as some are sea-sick; very ill, much troubled for the present, but by and by all is well again as they were." 2

3 That is, as is explained further on in the section, the Martyrs. Tertullian gives us many indications of the veneration in which the martyrs were held towards the close of the second century. The anniversary of the martyr's death was called his natalitium, or natal day, as his martyrdom ushered him into eternal life, and oblationes for defunctis were then offered. (De Exhor. Cast. c. 11; De Coro. c. 3.) Many extravagant things were said about the glory of martyrdom, with the view, doubtless, of preventing apostasy in time of persecution. It was described (De Bap. c. 16; and De Pat. c. 13) as a second baptism, and said to secure for a man immediate entrance into heaven, and complete enjoyment of its happiness. These views developed in Augustine's time into all the wildness of Donatism. Augustine gives us an insight into the customs prevailing in his day, and their significance, which greatly illustrates the present section. In his De Civ. Dei, viii. 27, we read: "But, nevertheless, we do not build temples, and ordain priests, rites, and sacrifices for these same martyrs; for they are not our gods, but their God is our God. Certainly we honour their reliquaries, as the memorials of holy men of God, who strove for the truth even to the death of their bodies, that the true religion might be made known, and false and fictitious religions exposed. . . . But who ever heard a priest of the faithful, standing at an altar built for the honour and worship of God over the holy body of some martyr, say in the prayers, I offer to thee a sacrifice, Peter, or Paul, or Cyprian? For it is to God that sacrifices are offered at their tombs, the God who made them both men and martyrs, and associated them with holy angels in celestial honour; and the reason why we pay such honours to their memory is, that by so doing we may both give thanks to the true God for their victories, and, by recalling them afresh to remembrance, may stir our was forbidden by the door-keeper, so soon as she learnt that it was the bishop who had forbidden it, she so piously and obediently acceded to it, that I myself marvelled how readily she could bring herself to accuse her own custom, rather than question his prohibition. For wine-bibbing did not take possession of her spirit, nor did the love of wine stimulate her to hatred of the truth, as it doth too many, both male and female, who nauseate at a song of sobriety, as men well drunk at a draught of water. But she, when she had brought her basket with the festive meats, of which she would taste herself first and give the rest away, would never allow herself more than one little cup of wine, diluted according to her own temperate palate, which, out of courtesy, she would taste. And if there were many oratories of departed saints that ought to be honoured in the same way, she still carried round with her the selfsame cup, to be used everywhere; and this, which was not only very much watered, but was also very tepid with carrying about, she would distribute by small sips to those around; for she sought their devotion, not pleasure. As soon, therefore, as she found this custom to be forbidden by that famous preacher and most pious prelate, even to those who would use it with moderation, lest thereby an occasion of excess I might be given to such as were drunken, and because selves up to imitate them by seeking to obtain like crowns and palms, calling to our help that same God on whom they called. Therefore, whatever honours the religious may pay in the places of the martyrs, they are but honours rendered to their memory [ornamenta memoriae], not sacred rites or sacrifices offered to dead men as to gods. And even such as bring thither food which, indeed, is not done by the better Christians, and in most places of the world is not done at all do so in order that it may be sanctified to them through the merits of the martyrs, in the name of the Lord of the martyrs, first presenting the food and offering prayer, and thereafter taking it away to be eaten, or to be in part bestowed upon the needy. But he who knows the one sacrifice of Christians, which is the sacrifice offered in those places, also knows that these are not sacrifices offered to the martyrs. " He speaks to the same effect in Book xxii.

sec. 10; and in his Reply to Faustus (xx. 21), who had charged the Christians with imitating the Pagans, "and appeasing the 'shades' of the departed with wine and food." See v. sec. 17, note.

1 Following the example of Ambrose, Augustine used all his influence and eloquence to correct such shocking abuses in the churches. In his letter to Alypius, Bishop of Thagaste (when as yet only a presbyter assisting the venerable Valerius), he gives an account of his efforts to overcome them in the church

CHAP. II.] MONICA'S OBEDIENCE TO AMBROSE. III

these, so to say, festivals in honour of the dead were very like unto the superstition of the Gentiles, she most willingly abstained from it. And in lieu of a basket filled with fruits of the earth, she had learned to bring to the oratories of the martyrs a heart full of more purified petitions, and to give all that she could to the poor; that so the communion of the Lord's body might be rightly celebrated there, where, after the example of His passion, the martyrs had been sacrificed and crowned. But yet it seems to me, Lord my God, and thus my heart thinks of it in thy sight, that my mother perhaps would not so easily have given way to the relinquishment of this custom had it been forbidden by another whom she loved not as Ambrose, 2 whom, out of regard for my salvation, she loved most dearly; and he loved her truly, on account of her most religious conversation, whereby, in good works so fervent in spirit," 3 she frequented the church; so that he of Hippo. The following passage is instructive (Ep. xxix. 9): "I explained to them the circumstances out of which this custom seems to have necessarily risen in the Church, namely, that when, in the peace which came after such numerous and violent persecutions, crowds of heathen who wished to assume the Christian religion were kept back, because, having been accustomed to celebrate the feasts connected with their worship of idols in revelling and drunkenness, they could not easily refrain from pleasures so hurtful and so habitual, it had seemed good to our ancestors, making for the time a concession to this infirmity, to permit them to celebrate, instead of the festivals which they renounced, other feasts in honour of the holy martyrs, which were observed, not as before with a profane design, but with similar self-indulgence."

2 On another occasion, when Monica's mind was exercised as to non-essentials, Ambrose gave her advice which has perhaps given origin to the proverb, "When at Rome, do as Rome does." It will be found in the letter to Casulanus (Ep. xxxvi. 32), and is as follows: "When my mother was with me in that city, I, as being only a catechumen, felt no concern about these questions; but it was to her a question causing anxiety, whether she ought, after the custom of our own town, to fast on the Saturday, or, after the custom of the church of Milan, not to fast. To deliver her from perplexity, I put the question to the man of God whom I have first named. He answered, * What else can I recommend to others than what I do myself?’ When I thought that by this he intended simply to prescribe to us that we should take food on Saturdays, for I knew this to be his own practice, he, following me, added these words: ‘When I am here I do not fast on Saturday, but when I am at Rome I do; whatever church you may come to, conform to its custom, if you would avoid either receiving or giving offence.’ " We find the same incident referred to in Ep. liv. 3.

would often, when he saw me, burst forth into her praises, congratulating me that I had such a mother little knowing what a son she had in me, who was in doubt as to all these things, and did not imagine the way of life could be found out.

Chap. hi. As Ambrose was occupied with business and study, Augustine could seldom consult him concerning the Holy Scriptures.

3. Nor did I now groan in my prayers that Thou wouldest help me; but my mind was wholly intent on knowledge, and eager to dispute. And Ambrose himself I esteemed a happy man, as the world counted happiness, in that such great personages held him in honour; only his celibacy appeared to me a painful thing. But what hope he cherished, what struggles he had against the temptations that beset his very excellences, what solace in adversities, and what savoury joys Thy bread possessed for the hidden mouth of his heart when ruminating * on it, I could neither conjecture, nor had I experienced. Nor did he know my embarrassments, nor the pit of my danger. For I could not request of him what I wished as I wished, in that I was debarred from hearing and speaking to him by crowds of busy people, whose infirmities he devoted himself to. With whom when he was not engaged (which was but a little time), he either was refreshing his body with necessary sustenance, or his mind with reading. But while reading, his eyes glanced over the pages, and his heart

1 In his Seply to Faustus (vi. 7), he, conformably with this idea, explains the division into clean and unclean beasts under the Levitical law symbolically.
" No doubt," he says, "the animal is pronounced unclean by the law because it does not chew the cud, which is not a fault, but its nature. But the men of whom this animal is a symbol are unclean, not by nature, but from their own fault; because, though they gladly hear the words of wisdom, they never reflect on them afterwards. For to recall, in quiet repose, some useful instruction from the stomach of memory to the mouth of reflection, is a kind of spiritual rumination. The animals above mentioned are a symbol of those people who do not do this. And the prohibition of the flesh of these animals is a warning against this fault. Another passage of Scripture. (Prov. xxi. 20) speaks of the precious treasure of wisdom, and describes ruminating as clean, and not ruminating as unclean: ' A precious treasure resteth in the mouth of a wise man, but a foolish man swallows it up.' Symbols of this kind, either in words or in things, give useful and pleasant exercise to intelligent minds in the way of inquiry and comparison,"

CHAP. III.] AMBROSE IN HIS STUDY. 113

searched out the sense, but his voice and tongue were silent.
Ofttimes, when we had come (for no one was forbidden to enter, nor was it his custom that the arrival of those who came should be announced to him), we saw him thus reading to himself, and never otherwise; and, having long sat in silence (for who durst interrupt one so intent ?), we were fain to depart, inferring that in the little time he secured for the recruiting of his mind, free from the clamour of other men's business, he was unwilling to be taken off. And perchance he was fearful lest, if the author he studied should express aught vaguely, some doubtful and attentive hearer should ask him to expound it, or to discuss some of the more abstruse questions, as that, his time being thus occupied, he could not turn over as many volumes as he wished; although the preservation of his voice, which was very easily weakened, might be the truer reason for his reading to himself. But whatever was his motive in so doing, doubtless in such a man was a good one.

A. But verily no opportunity could I find of ascertaining what I desired from that Thy so holy oracle, his breast, unless the thing might be entered into briefly. But those surgings in me required to find him at full leisure, that I might pour them out to him, but never were they able to find him so; and I heard him, indeed, every Lord's day, " rightly dividing the word of truth" 1 among the people; and I was all the more convinced that all those knots of crafty calumnies, which those deceivers of ours had knit against the divine books, could be unravelled. But so soon as I understood, withal, that man made " after the image of Him that created him" 2 was not so understood by Thy spiritual sons (whom of t*e Catholic mother Thou hadst begotten again through grace), as though they believed and imagined Thee to be bounded by

1 2 Tim. ii. 15.

2 Col. iii. 10, and Gen. i. 26, 27. And because we are created in the image of God, Augustine argues (Serm. lxxxviii. 6), we have the ability to see and know Him, just as, having eyes to see, we can look upon the sun. And hereafter, too (Up. xcii. 3), " We shall see Him according to the measure in which we shall be like Him; because now the measure in which we do not see Him is according to the measure of our unlikene.ss to human form, although what was the nature of a spiritual substance I had not the faintest or dimmest suspicion, yet rejoicing, I blushed that for so many years I had barked, not against the Catholic faith, but against the fables of carnal imaginations. For I had been both impious and rash in this, that what I ought inquiring to have learnt, I had pronounced on condemning. For Thou, most high and most near, most secret, yet most present, who hast not limbs some larger some smaller, but art wholly everywhere, and nowhere in space, nor art Thou of such corporeal form, yet hast Thou created man after Thine own image, and, behold, from head to foot is he confined by space.

Chap. iv. He recognises the falsity of his own opinions, and commits to memory the saying of Ambrose.

5. As, then, I knew not how this image of Thine should subsist, I should have knocked and propounded the doubt how it was to be believed, and not have insultingly opposed it, as if it were believed. Anxiety, therefore, as to what to retain as certain, did all the more sharply gnaw into my soul, the more shame I felt that, having been so long deluded and deceived by the promise of certainties, I had, with puerile error and petulance, prated of so many uncertainties as if they were certainties. For that they were falsehoods became apparent to me afterwards. However, I was certain that they were uncertain, and that I had formerly held them as certain when with a blind contentiousness I accused Thy Catholic Church, which though I had not yet discovered to teach truly, yet not to teach that of which I had so vehemently accused her. In this manner was I confounded and converted, and I rejoiced, my God, that the one Church, the body of Thine only Son (wherein the name of Christ had been set upon me when an infant), did not appreciate these infantile trifles, nor maintained, in her sound doctrine, any tenet that would confine Thee, the Creator of all, in space though ever so great and wide, yet bounded on all sides by the restraints of a human form.

6. I rejoiced also that the old Scriptures of the law and recommend this text as a rule, "The letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life;" whilst, drawing aside the mystic veil, he spiritually laid

1 2 Cor. iii. 6. The spiritual or allegorical meaning here referred to is one that Augustine constantly sought, as did many of the early Fathers, both Greek and Latin. He only employs this method of interpretation, however, in a qualified way never going to the lengths of Origen or Clement of Alexandria. He does not depreciate the letter of Scripture, though, as we have shown above (iii. sec. 14, note), he went as far as he well could in interpreting the history spiritually. He does not seem, however, quite consistent in his statements as to the relative prominence to be given to the literal and spiritual meanings, as may be seen by a comparison of the latter portions of secs. 1 and 3 of book xvii. of the City of God. His general idea may be gathered from the following passage in the 21st sec. of book xiii.: "Some allegorize all that concerns paradise itself, where the first men, the parents of the human race, are, according to the truth of Holy Scripture, recorded to have been; and they understand all its trees an fruit-bearing plants as virtues and habits of life, as if they had no existence in the external world, but were only so spoken of or related for the sake of spiritual meanings. As if there could not be a real terrestrial paradise! As if there never existed these two women, Sarah and Hagar, nor the two sons who were born to Abraham, the one of the bondwoman, the other of the free, because the apostle says that in them the two covenants were prefigured! or as if water never flowed from the rock when Moses struck it, because therein Christ can be seen in a figure, as the same apostle says: "Now that rock was Christ' (1 Cor. x. 4). . . .

These and similar allegorical interpretations may be suitably put upon paradise without giving offence to any one, while yet we believe the strict truth of the history, confirmed by its circumstantial narrative of facts." The allusion in the above passage to Sarah and Hagar invites the remark, that in Galatians iv. 24, the words in our version rendered, "which things are an allegory," should be, "which things are such as may be allegorized." ["Avtvd i<rriv aXknyapautftiva. See Jelf, 398, sec. 2.] It is important to note this, as the passage has been quoted in support of the more extreme method of allegorizing, though it could clearly go no further than to sanction allegorizing by way of spiritual meditation upon Scripture, and not in the interpretation of it which first, as Waterland thinks ( Works, vol. v. p. 311), was the end contemplated by most of the Fathers. Thoughtful students of Scripture will feel that we have no right to make historical facts typical or allegorical, unless (as in the case of the manna, the brazen serpent, Jacob's ladder, etc.) we have divine authority for so doing; and few such will dissent from the opinion of Bishop Marsh (Lecture vi.) that the type must not only resemble the antitype, but must have been designed to resemble it, and further, that we must have the authority of Scripture for the existence of such design. open that which, accepted according to the "letter," seemed to teach perverse doctrines teaching herein nothing that offended me, though he taught such things as I knew not as yet whether they were true. For all this time I restrained my heart from assenting to anything, fearing to fall headlong; but by hanging in suspense I was the worse killed. For my desire was to be as well assured of those things that I saw not, as I was that seven and three are ten. life, "as a perusal of the context will show, has nothing whatever to do with either 'literal' or 'spiritual' meanings. Augustine himself interprets it in one place (De Spir. et Lit. cc. 4, 5) as meaning the killing letter of the law, as compared with the quickening power of the gospel. 'An opinion," to conclude with the thoughtful words of Alfred Morris on this chapter (Words for the Heart and Life, p. 203), 'once common must therefore he rejected. Some still talk of 'letter' and 'spirit' in a way which has no sanction here. The 'letter' with them is the literal meaning of the text, the 'spirit' is its symbolic meaning. And, as the 'spirit' possesses an evident superiority to the 'letter,' they fly away into the region of secret senses and hidden doctrines, find types where there is nothing typical, and allegories where there is nothing allegorical; make Genesis more evangelical than the Epistle to the Romans, and Leviticus than the Epistle to the Hebrews; mistaking lawful criticism for legal Christianity, they look upon the exercise of a sober judgment as a proof of a depraved taste, and forget that diseased as well as very powerful eyes may see more than others. It is not the obvious meaning and the secret meaning that are intended by 'letter' and 'spirit,' nor any two meanings of Christianity, nor two meanings of any thing or things, but the two systems of Moses and of Christ." Reference may be made on this whole subject of allegorical interpretation in the writings of the Fathers to Blunt's Right Use of the Early Fathers, series i. lecture 9.

1 Augustine frequently dilates on this idea. In sermon 88 (cc. 5, 6, etc.), he makes the whole of the ministries of religion subservient to the clearing of the inner eye of the soul; and in his De Trin. i. 3, he says: "And it is necessary to purge our minds, in order to be able to see ineffably that which is ineffable [i.e. the Godhead], whereunto not having yet attained, we are to be nourished by faith, and led by such ways as are more suited to our capacity, that we may be rendered apt and able to comprehend it."

CHAP. V.] REASON AND FAITH. 117
himself with a good one, so was it with the health of my soul, which could not be healed but by believing, and, lest it should believe falsehoods, refused to be cured resisting Thy hands, who hast prepared for us the medicaments of faith, and hast applied them to the maladies of the whole world, and hast bestowed upon them so great authority.

Chap. v. Faith is the basis of human life; man cannot discover that truth which Holy Scripture has disclosed.

7. From this, however, being led to prefer the Catholic doctrine, I felt that it was with more moderation and honesty that it commanded things to be believed that were not demonstrated (whether it was that they could be demonstrated, but not to any one, or could not be demonstrated at all), than was the method of the Manichreans, where our credulity was mocked by audacious promise of knowledge, and then so many most fabulous and absurd things were forced upon belief because they were not capable of demonstration. 1 After that, Lord, Thou, by little and little, with most gentle and most merciful hand, drawing and calming my heart, didst persuade me, taking into consideration what a multiplicity of things which I had never seen, nor was present when they were enacted, like so many of the things in secular history, and so many accounts of places and cities which I had not seen; so many of friends, so many of physicians, so many now of these men, now of those, which unless we should believe, we should do nothing at all in this life; lastly, with how un-

1 He similarly exalts the claims of the Christian Church over Manichseanism in his Reply to Faustus (xxxii. 19): "If you submit to receive a load of endless fictions at the bidding of an obscure and irrational authority, so that you believe all those things because they are written in the books which your misguided judgment pronounces trustworthy, though there is no evidence of their truth, why not rather submit to the evidence of the gospel, which is so well-founded, so confirmed, so generally acknowledged and admired, and which has an unbroken series of testimonies from the apostles down to our own day, that so you may have an intelligent belief, and may come to know that all your objections are the fruit of folly and perversity? " And again, in his Reply to Manichees' Fundamental Epistle (sec. 8), alluding to the credulity required in those who accept Manichsean teaching on the mere authority of the teacher:

"Whoever thoughtlessly yields this becomes a Manichsean, not by knowing undoubted truth, but by believing doubtful statements. Such were we when in our inexperienced youth we were deceived."

alterable an assurance I believed of what parents I was born, which it would have been impossible for me to know otherwise than by hearsay, taking into consideration all this, Thou persuadest me that not they who believed Thy books (which, with so great authority, Thou hast established among nearly all nations), but those who believed them not were to be blamed; * and that those men were not to be listened unto who should say to me, "How dost thou know that those Scriptures were imparted unto mankind by the Spirit of the one true and most true God? " For it was this same thing that was most of all to be believed, since no wranglings of blasphemous questions, whereof I had read so many amongst the selfcontradicting philosophers, could once wring the belief from me that Thou art, whatsoever Thou wert, though what I knew not, or that the government of human affairs belongs to Thee.

8. Thus much I believed, at one time more strongly than another, yet did I ever believe both that Thou wert, and hadst a care of us, although I was ignorant both what was to be thought of Thy substance, and what way led, or led back to Thee. Seeing, then, that we were too weak by unaided reason to find out the truth, and for this cause needed the authority of the holy writings, I had now begun to believe that Thou wouldest by no means have given such excellency of authority to those Scriptures throughout all lands, had it not been Thy will thereby to be believed in, and thereby

1 He has a like train of thought in another place (Be Fide Her. qua, non Vid. sec. 4): "If, then (harmony being destroyed), human society itself would not stand if we believe not that we see not, how much more should we have faith in divine things, though we see them not; which if we have it not, we do not violate the friendship of a few men, but the profoundest religion so as to have as its consequence the profoundest misery." Again, referring to belief in Scripture, he argues {Con. Faust, xxxiii. 6) that, if we doubt its evidence, we may equally doubt that of any book, and asks, "How do we know the authorship of the works of Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Varro, and other similar writers, but by the unbroken chain of evidence? " And once more he contends (Be Mor. Cath. Eccles.
xxix. 60) that, "The utter overthrow of all literature will follow, and there will be an end to all books handed down from the past, if what is supported by such a strong popular belief, and established by the uniform testimony of so many men and so many times, is brought into such suspicion that it is not allowed to have the credit and the authority of common history."

sought. For now those things which heretofore appeared incongruous to me in the Scripture, and used to offend me, having heard divers of them expounded reasonably, I referred to the depth of the mysteries, and its authority seemed to me all the more venerable and worthy of religious belief, in that, while it was visible for all to read it, it reserved the majesty of its secret within its profound significance, stooping to all in the great plainness of its language and lowliness of its style, yet exercising the application of such as are not light of heart; that it might receive all into its common bosom, and through narrow passages waft over some few towards Thee, yet many more than if it did not stand upon such a height of authority, nor allured multitudes within its bosom by its holy humility. These things I meditated upon, and Thou wert with me; I sighed, and Thou hearkest me; I vacillated, and Thou didst guide me; I roamed through the broad way of the world, and Thou didst not desert me.

Chap. vi. On the source and cause of true joy, the example of the joyous beggar being adduced.

9. I longed for honours, gains, wedlock; and Thou mockedst me. In these desires I underwent most bitter hardships, Thou being the more gracious the less Thou didst suffer anything which was not Thou to grow sweet to me. Behold my heart, Lord, who wouldest that I should recall all this, and confess unto Thee. Now let my soul cleave to Thee, which Thou hast freed from that fast-holding bird-lime of death. How wretched was it! And Thou didst irritate the feeling of its wound, that, forsaking all else, it might be converted unto Thee, who art above all, and without whom all things would be naught, be converted and be healed. How wretched was I at that time, and how didst Thou deal with me, to make me sensible of my wretchedness on that day wherein I was preparing to recite a panegyric on the Emperor, 3

1 See i. sec. 10, note, above. - Matt. vii. 13.

3 In the Benedictine edition it is suggested that this was probably Valentinian the younger, whose court was, according to Possidius (c. i.), at Milan when Augustine was professor of rhetoric there, who writes (Con. Litt. Petil. iii. 25) that he in that city recited a panegyric to Bauto, the consul, on the first of January, according to the requirement of his profession of rhetoric.
120 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK VI.]

wherein I was to deliver many a lie, and lying was to be applauded by those who knew I lied; and my heart panted with these cares, and boiled over with the feverishness of consuming thoughts. For, while walking along one of the streets of Milan, I observed a poor mendicant, then, I imagine, with a full belly, joking and joyous; and I sighed, and spake to the friends around me of the many sorrows resulting from our madness, for that by all such exertions of ours, as those wherein I then laboured, dragging along, under the spur of desires, the burden of my own unhappiness, and by dragging increasing it, we yet aimed only to attain that very joyousness which that mendicant had reached before us, who, perchance, never would attain it! For what he had obtained through a few begged pence, the same was I scheming for by many a wretched and tortuous turning, the joy of a temporary felicity. For he verily possessed not true joy, but yet I, with these my ambitions, was seeking one much more untrue. And in truth he was joyous, I anxious; he free from care, I full of alarms. But should any one inquire of me whether I would rather be merry or fearful, I would reply, Merry. Again, were I asked whether I would rather be such as he was, or as I myself then was, I should elect to be myself, though beset with cares and alarms, but out of perversity; for was it so in truth? For I ought not to prefer myself to him because I happened to be more learned than he, seeing that I took no delight therein, but sought rather to please men by it; and that not to instruct, but only to please. Wherefore also didst Thou break my bones with the rod of Thy correction. 1

10. Away with those, then, from my soul, who say unto it, "It makes a difference from whence a man's joy is derived. That mendicant rejoiced in drunkenness; thou longedst to rejoice in glory." What glory, Lord? That which is not in Thee. For even as his was no true joy, so was mine no true glory; 2 and it subverted my soul more. He would digest his drunkenness that same night, but many a night had I slept with mine, and risen again with it, and was to sleep again and again to rise with it, I know not how oft. It does indeed " make a difference whence a man's joy is derived." I know it is so, and that the joy of a faithful hope is incomparably beyond such vanity. Yea, and at that time was he beyond me, for he truly was the happier man; not only for that he was thoroughly steeped in mirth, I torn to pieces with cares, but he, by giving good wishes, had gotten wine, I, by lying, was following after pride. Much to this effect said I then to my dear friends, and I often marked in them how it fared with me; and I found that it went ill with me, and fretted, and doubled that very ill. And if any prosperity smiled upon me, I loathed to seize it, for almost before I could grasp it it flew away.

Chap. vii. He leads to reformation Ms friend Alypius, seized with madness for the Circensian games.

11. These things we, who lived like friends together, jointly deplored, but chiefly and most familiarly did I discuss them with Alypius and Nebridius, of whom Alypius was born in the same town as myself, his parents being of the highest rank there, but he being younger than I. For he had studied under me, first, when I taught in our own town, and afterwards at Carthage, and esteemed me highly, because I appeared to him good and learned; and I esteemed him for his innate love of virtue, which, in one of no great age, was sufficiently eminent. But the vortex of Carthaginian customs (amongst whom these frivolous spectacles are hotly followed) had inveigled him into the madness of the Circensian games.

But while he was miserably tossed about therein, I was professing rhetoric there, and had a public school. As yet he did not give ear to my teaching, on account of some ill-feeling that had arisen between me and his father. I had then found how fatally he doted upon the circus, and was deeply grieved that he seemed likely if, indeed, he had not already done so to cast away his so great promise. Yet had I no means of advising, or by a sort of restraint reclaiming him, either by the kindness of a friend or by the authority of a master. For

I imagined that his sentiments towards me were the same as his father's; but he was not such. Disregarding, therefore, his father's will in that matter, he commenced to salute me, and, coming into my lecture-room, to listen for a little and depart.

12. But it slipped my memory to deal with him, so that he should not, through a blind and headstrong desire of empty pastimes, undo so great a wit. But Thou, Lord, who governest the helm of all Thou hast created, hadst not forgotten him, who was one day to be amongst Thy sons, the President of Thy sacrament; x and that his amendment might plainly be attributed to Thyself, Thou broughtest it about through me, but I knowing nothing of it. For one day, when I was sitting in my accustomed place, with my scholars before me, he came in, saluted me, sat himself down, and fixed his attention on the subject I was then handling. It so happened that I had a passage in hand, which while I was explaining, a simile borrowed from the Circensian games occurred to me, as likely to make what I wished to convey pleasanter and plainer, imbued with a biting jibe at those whom that madness had enthralled.

Thou knowest, O our God, that I had no thought at that time of curing Alypius of that plague. But he took it to himself, and thought that I would not have said it but for his sake.

And what any other man would have made a ground of offence against me, this worthy young man took as a reason for being offended at himself, and for loving me more fervently. For Thou hast said it long ago, and written in Thy book, "Kebuke a wise man, and he will love thee." 2 But I had not rebuked him, but Thou, who makest use of all consciously or unconsciously, in that order which Thyself knowest (and that order is right), wroughtest out of my heart and tongue burning coals, by which Thou mightest set on fire and cure the hopeful mind thus languishing. Let him be silent in Thy praises who meditates not on Thy mercies, which from my inmost parts confess unto Thee. For he upon that speech rushed out from that so deep pit, wherein he was wilfully plunged, and was blinded by its miserable pastimes; and he roused his mind with a resolute moderation; whereupon all the filth of the Circensian pastimes 1 flew off from him, and he did not approach them further. Upon this, he prevailed with his reluctant father to let him be my pupil. He gave in and consented. And Alypius, beginning again to hear me, was involved in the same superstition as I was, loving in the Manichaeans that ostentation of continency 2 which he believed to be true and unfeigned. It was, however, a senseless and seducing continency, ensnaring precious souls, not able as yet to reach the height of virtue, and easily besuited with the veneer of what was but a shadowy and feigned virtue.

1 The games in the provinces of the empire were on the same model as those held in the Circus Maximus at Rome, though not so imposing. This circus was one of those vast works executed by Tarquinius Priscus. Hardly a vestige of it at the present time remains, though the Cloaca Maxima, another of his stupendous works, has not, after more than 2500 years, a stone displaced, and still performs its appointed service of draining the city of Rome into the Tiber.

In the circus were exhibited chariot and foot races, fights on horseback, representations of battles (on which occasion camps were pitched in the circus), and the Grecian athletic sports introduced after the conquest of that country. See also sec. 13, note, below.

* Augustine, in book v. sec. 9, above, refers to the reputed sanctity of Manichaeus, and it may well be questioned whether the sect deserved that unmitigated reprobation he pours out upon them in his De Moribus, and in parts of his controversy with Faustus. Certain it is that Faustus laid claim, on behalf of his sect, to a very different moral character to that Augustine would impute to them. He says (Con. Faust, v. 1): "Do I believe the gospel? You ask me if I believe it, though my obedience to its commands shows that I do. I should rather ask you if you believe it, since you give no proof of your belief. I have left my father, mother, wife, and children, and all else that the gospel requires (Matt. xix. 29); and do you ask if I believe the gospel? Perhaps you do not know what is called the gospel. The gospel is nothing else than the preaching and the precept of Christ. I have parted with all gold and silver, and have left off carrying money in my purse; content with daily food; without anxiety for tomorrow; and without solicitude about how I shall be fed, or wherewithal I shall be clothed: and do you ask if I believe the gospel? You see in me the blessings of the gospel (Matt. v. 3-11); and do you ask if I believe the gospel? You see me poor, meek, a peacemaker, pure in heart, mourning, hungering, thirsting, bearing persecutions and enmity for righteousness’ sake; and do you doubt my belief in the gospel?" It is difficult to understand that Manichaeanism can have spread as largely as it did at that time, if the asceticism of many amongst them had not been real. It may be noted that in his controversy with Fortunatus, Augustine strangely declines to discuss the charges of immorality that had been brought against the Manichasans; and in the last chapter of his De Moribus, it appears to be indicated that one, if not more, of those whose evil deeds are therapeutically spoken of had a desire to follow the rule of life laid down by Manichaeus.

Chap. vn. The same when at Rome, being led by others into the amphitheatre, is delighted with the gladiatorial games.

13. He, not relinquishing that worldly way which his parents had bewitched him to pursue, had gone before me to Rome, to study law, and there he was carried away in an extraordinary manner with an incredible eagerness after the gladiatorial shows. For, being utterly opposed to and detesting such spectacles, he was one day met by chance by divers of his acquaintance and fellow-students returning from dinner, and they with a friendly violence drew him, vehemently objecting and resisting, into the amphitheatre, on a day of these cruel and deadly shows, he thus protesting: "Though you drag my body to that place, and there place me, can you force me to give my mind and lend my eyes to these shows? Thus shall I be absent while present, and so shall overcome both you and them." They hearing this, dragged him on nevertheless, desirous, perchance, to see whether he could do as he said. When they had arrived thither, and had taken their places as they could, the whole place became excited with the inhuman sports. But he, shutting up the doors of his eyes, forbade his mind to roam abroad after such naughtiness; and would that he had shut his ears also! For, upon the fall of one in the fight, a mighty cry from the whole audience stirring him strongly, he, overcome by curiosity, and prepared as it were to despise and rise superior to it, no matter what it were, opened his eyes, and was struck with a deeper wound in his soul than the other, whom he desired to see, was in his body and he fell more miserably than he
The scene of this episode was, doubtless, the great Flavian Amphitheatre, known by us at this day as the Colosseum. It stands in the valley between the Cselian and Esquiline hills, on the site of a lake formerly attached to the palace of Nero. Gibbon, in his graphic way, says of the building (Decline and Fall, i. 355): "Posterity admires, and will long admire, the awful remains of the amphitheatre of Titus, which so well deserved the epithet of colossal. It was a building of an elliptic figure, five hundred and sixty-four feet in length, and four hundred and sixty-seven in breadth, founded on fourscore arches, and rising, with four successive orders of architecture, to the height of one hundred and forty feet. The outside of the edifice was encrusted with marble, and decorated with statues. The slopes of the vast concave which formed the inside were filled and surrounded with sixty or eighty rows of seats of marble, likewise covered with cushions, and capable of receiving with ease above fourscore thousand spectators. Sixty-four vomitories (for by that name the doors were very aptly distinguished) poured forth the immense multitude; and the entrances, passages, and staircases were contrived with such exquisite skill, that each person, whether of the senatorial, the equestrian, or the plebeian order, arrived at his destined place without trouble or confusion. Nothing was omitted which in any respect could be subservient to the convenience or pleasure of the spectators. They were protected from the sun and rain by an ample canopy occasionally drawn over their heads. The air was continually refreshed by the playing of fountains, and profusely impregnated by the grateful scent of aromatics. In the centre of the edifice, the arena, or stage, was strewed with the finest sand, and successively assumed the most different forms; at one moment it seemed to rise out of the earth, like the garden of the Hesperides, and was afterwards broken into the rocks and caverns of Thrace. The subterraneous pipes conveyed an inexhaustible supply of water; and what had just before appeared a level plain might be suddenly converted into a wide lake, covered with armed vessels and replenished with the monsters of the deep. In the decoration of these scenes the Koman emperors displayed their wealth and liberality; and we read, on various occasions, that the whole furniture of the amphitheatre consisted either of silver, or of gold, or of amber."

In this magnificent building were enacted venatios or hunting scenes, sea-fights, and gladiatorial shows, in all of which the greatest lavishness was exhibited. The men engaged were for the most part either criminals or captives taken in war. On the occasion of the triumph of Trajan for his victory over the Dacians, it is said that ten thousand gladiators were engaged in combat, and that in the naumachia or sea-fight shown by Domitian, ships and men in force equal to two real fleets were engaged, at an enormous expenditure of human life. " If," says James Martineau (Endeavours after the Christian Life, pp 261, 262), "you would witness a scene characteristic of the popular life of old, you must go to the amphitheatre of Rome, mingle with its eighty thousand spectators, and watch from all this didst Thou, with a most powerful and most merciful hand, pluck him, and taughtest him not to repose confidence in himself, but in Thee but not till long after.

Chap. ix. Innocent Alypius, being apprehended as a thief, is set at liberty by the cleverness of an architect.

14. But this was all being stored up in his memory for a medicine hereafter. As was that also, that when he was yet studying under me at Carthage, and was meditating at noonday in the market-place upon what he had to recite (as scholars are wont to be exercised), Thou sufferedst him to be apprehended as a thief by the officers of the market-place. For no other reason, I apprehend, didst Thou, O our God, suffer it, but that he who was in the future to prove so great a man should now begin to learn that, in judging of causes, man should not with a reckless credulity readily be condemned the eager faces of senators and people; observe how the masters of the world spend the wealth of conquest, and indulge the pi-ide of power. See every wild creature that God has made to dwell, from the jungles of India to the mountains of "Wales, from the forests of Germany to the deserts of Nubia, brought hither to be hunted down in artificial groves by thousands in an hour; behold the captives of war, noble, perhaps, and wise in their own land, turned loose, amid yells of insult, more terrible for their foreign tongue, to contend with brutal gladiators, trained to make death the favourite amusement, and present the most solemn of individual realities as a wholesale public sport; mark the light look with which the multitude, by uplifted finger, demands that the wounded combatant be slain before their eyes; notice the troop of Christian martyrs awaiting hand in hand the leap from the tiger's den. And when the day's spectacle is over, and the blood of two thousand victims stains the ring, follow the giddy crowd as it streams from the vomitories into the street, trace, its lazy course into the Forum, and hear it there scrambling for the bread of private indolence doled out by the purse of public corruption; and see how it suns itself to sleep in the open ways, or crawls into foul dens till morning brings the hope of games and merry blood again; and you have an idea of the Imperial people, and their passionate living for the moment, which the gospel found in occupation of the world." The desire for these shows increased as the empire advanced. Constantine failed to put a stop to them at Rome, though they were not admitted into the Christian capital he established at Constantinople. We have already shown (iii. sec. 2, note, above) how strongly attendance at stage-plays and scenes like these was condemned by the Christian teachers. The passion, however, for these exhibitions was so great, that they were only brought to an end after the monk Telemachus horrified that Christians should witness such scenes had been battered to death by the people in their rage at his flinging himself between the swordsmen to stop the combat. This tragic episode occurred in the year 403, at a show held in commemoration of a temporary success over the troops of Alaric.

by man. For as he was walking up and down alone before the judgment-seat with his tablets and pen, lo, a young man, one of the scholars, the real thief, privily bringing a hatchet, got in without Alypius' seeing him as far as the leaden bars which protect the silversmiths' shops, and began to cut away the lead. But the noise of the hatchet being heard, the silversmiths below began to make a stir, and sent to take in custody whomsoever they should find. But the thief, hearing their voices, ran away, leaving his hatchet, fearing to be taken with it. Now Alypius, who had not seen him come in, caught sight of him as he went out, and noted with what speed he made off. And, being curious to know the reasons, he entered the place, where, finding the hatchet, he stood wondering and pondering, when behold, those that were sent caught him alone, hatchet in hand, the noise whereof had startled them and brought them thither. They lay hold of him and drag him away, and, gathering the tenants of the market-place about them, boast of having taken a notorious thief, and thereupon he was being led away to appear before the judge.

15. But thus far was he to be instructed. For immediately, Lord, Thou earnest to the succour of his innocency, whereof Thou wert the sole witness. For, as he was being led either to prison or to punishment, they were met by a certain architect, who had the chief charge of the public buildings. They were specially glad to come across him, by whom they used to be suspected of stealing the goods lost out of the market-place, as though at last to convince him by whom these thefts were committed. He, however, had at divers times seen Alypius at the house of a certain senator, whom he was wont to visit to pay his respects; and, recognising him at once, he took him aside by the hand, and inquiring of him the cause of so great a misfortune, heard the whole affair, and commanded all the rabble then present ' (who were very uproarious and full of threatenings) to go J with him. And they came to the house of the young man who had committed the deed. There, before the door, was a lad so young as not to refrain from disclosing the whole through the fear of injuring his master. For he had followed his master to the marketplace. Whom, so soon as Alypius recognised, he intimated it to the architect; and he, showing the hatchet to the lad, asked him to whom it belonged.
"To us," quoth he immediately; and on being further interrogated, he disclosed everything. Thus, the crime being transferred to that house, and the rabble shamed, which had begun to triumph over Alypius, he, the future dispenser of Thy word, and an examiner of numerous causes in Thy Church, 1 went away better experienced and instructed.

Chap. x. The wonderful integrity of Alypius in judgment. The lasting friendship of Nebridius with Augustine.

16. Him, therefore, had I lighted upon at Rome, and he clung to me by a most strong tie, and accompanied me to Milan, both that he might not leave me, and that he might practise something of the law he had studied, more with a view of pleasing his parents than himself. There had he thrice sat as assessor with an uncorruptness wondered at by others, he rather wondering at those who could prefer gold to integrity. His character was tested, also, not only by the bait of covetousness, but by the spur of fear. At Rome, he was assessor to the Count of the Italian Treasury. 2 There was at that time a most potent senator, to whose favours many were indebted, of whom also many stood in fear. He would fain, by his usual power, have a tiling granted him which was forbidden by the laws. This Alypius resisted; a bribe was promised, he scorned it with all his heart; threats were employed, he trampled them under foot, all men being astonished at so rare a spirit, which neither coveted the friendship nor feared the enmity of a man at once so powerful
and

so greatly famed for his innumerable means of doing good or ill. Even the judge whose councillor Alypius was, although also unwilling that it should be done, yet did not openly refuse it, but put the matter off upon Alypius, alleging that it was he who would not permit him to do it; for verily, had the judge done it, Alypius would have decided otherwise.

With this one thing in the way of learning was he very nearly led away, that he might have books copied for him at praetorian prices. 1 But, consulting justice, he changed his mind for the better, esteeming equity, whereby he was hindered, more gainful than the power whereby he was permitted. These are little things, but " He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much." 2 Nor can that possibly be void which proceedeth out of the mouth of Thy Truth. " If, therefore, ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches ? And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own ? " He, being such, did at that time cling to me, and wavered in purpose, as I did, what course of life was to be taken.

17. Nebridius also, who had left his native country near Carthage, and Carthage itself, where he had usually lived, leaving behind his fine paternal estate, his house, and his mother, who intended not to follow him, had come to Milan, i for no other reason than that he might live with me in a most ardent search after truth and wisdom. Like me he sighed, like me he wavered, an ardent seeker after true life, and a most acute examiner of the most abstruse questions. 4

So were there three begging mouths, sighing out their wants one to the other, and waiting upon Thee, that Thou mightest give them their meat in due season. 6 And in all the bitter-

1 Prefis prcetorianis. Du Caiige says that " Prethim regium is the right of a king or lord to purchase commodities at a certain and definite price." This may perhaps help us to understand the phrase as above employed.

4 Augustine makes a similar allusion to Nebridius' ardour in examining difficult questions, especially those which refer ad doctrinam pietatis, in his ness which by Thy mercy followed our worldly pursuits, as we contemplated the end, why this suffering should be ours, darkness came upon us; and we turned away groaning and exclaiming, "How long shall these things be?" And this we often said; and saying so, we did not relinquish them, for as yet we had discovered nothing certain to which, when relinquished, we might betake ourselves.

Chap. xi. Being troubled by his grievous errors, he meditates entering on a new life.

18. And I, puzzling over and reviewing these things, most marvelled at the length of time from that my nineteenth year, wherein I began to be inflamed with the desire of wisdom, resolving, when I had found her, to forsake all the empty hopes and lying insanities of vain desires. And behold, I was now getting on to my thirtieth year, sticking in the same mire, eager for the enjoyment of things present, which fly away and destroy me, whilst I say, "To-morrow I shall discover it; behold, it will appear plainly, and I shall seize it; behold, Faustus will come and explain everything! O ye great men, ye Academicians, it is then true that nothing certain for the ordering of life can be attained! Nay, let us search the more diligently, and let us not despair. Lo, the things in the ecclesiastical books, which appeared to us absurd aforetime, do not appear so now, and may be otherwise and honestly interpreted. I will set my feet upon that step, where, as a child, my parents placed me, until the clear truth be discovered. But where and when shall it be sought? Ambrose has no leisure, we have no leisure to read. Where are we to find the books? Whence or when procure them? From whom borrow them? Let set times be appointed, and certain hours be set apart for the health of the soul. Great hope has risen upon us the Catholic faith doth not teach what we conceived, and vainly accused it of. Her learned ones hold it as an abomination to believe that God is limited by the form of a human body. And do we doubt to 'knock/ in order that the rest may be 'opened'? x The mornings are taken up by our scholars; how do we employ the rest of

19. "Perish everything, and let us dismiss these empty vanities, and betake ourselves solely to the search after truth! Life is miserable, death uncertain. If it creeps upon us suddenly, in what state shall we depart hence, and where shall we learn what we have neglected here? Or rather shall we not suffer the punishment of this negligence? What if death itself should cut off and put an end to all care and feeling? This also, then, must be inquired into. But God forbid that it should be so. It is not without reason, it is no empty thing, that the so eminent height of the authority of the Christian faith is diffused throughout the entire world. Never would such and so great things be wrought for us, if, by the death of the body, the life of the soul were destroyed. Why, therefore, do we delay to abandon our hopes of this world, and give ourselves wholly to seek after God and the blessed life? But stay! Even those things are enjoyable; and they possess some and no little sweetness. We must not abandon them lightly, for it would be a shame to return to them again. Behold, now is it a great matter to obtain some post of honour! And what more could we desire? We have crowds of influential friends, though we have nothing else, and if we make haste a presidency may be offered us; and a wife with some money, that she increase not our expenses; and this shall be the height of desire. Many men, who are great and worthy of imitation, have applied themselves to the study of wisdom in the marriage state."

20. Whilst I talked of these things, and these winds veered about and tossed my heart hither and thither, the time passed on; but I was slow to turn to the Lord, and from day to day deferred to live in Thee, and deferred not daily to die in myself. Being enamoured of a happy life, I yet feared it in its own abode, and, fleeing from it, sought after it. I conceived that I should be too unhappy were I deprived of the embraces of a woman; and of Thy merciful medicine to cure that infirmity I thought not, not having tried it. As regards continency, I imagined it to be under the control of our own strength (though in myself I found it not), being so foolish as not to know what is written, that none can be continent unless Thou give it; and that Thou wouldst give it, if with heartfelt groaning I should knock at Thine ears, and should with firm faith cast my care upon Thee.

21. It was in truth Alypius who prevented me from marrying, alleging that thus we could by no means live together, having so much undistracted leisure in the love of wisdom, as we had long desired. For he himself was so chaste in this matter that it was wonderful all the more, too, that in his early youth he had entered upon that path, but had not clung to it; rather had he, feeling sorrow and disgust at it, lived from that time to the present most continently. But I opposed him with the examples of those who as married men had loved wisdom, found favour with God, and walked faithfully and lovingly with their friends. From the greatness of whose spirit I fell far short, and, enthralled with the disease of the flesh and its deadly sweetness, dragged my chain along, fearing to be loosed, and, as if it pressed my wound, rejected his kind expostulations, as it were the hand of

1 "I was entangled in the life of this world, clinging to dull hopes of a beauteous wife, the pomp of riches, the emptiness of honours, and the other hurtful and destructive pleasures " (Aug. De Util. Credendi, sec. 3). " After I had shaken off the Manicheans and escaped, especially when I had crossed the sea, the Academics long detained me tossing in the waves, winds from all quarters beating against my helm. And so I came to this shore, and there found a pole-star to whom to entrust myself. For I often observed in the discourses of our priest [Ambrose], and sometimes in yours [Theodoras], that you had no corporeal notions when you thought of God, or even of the soul, which of all things is next to God. But I was withheld, I own, from casting myself speedily into the bosom of true wisdom by the alluring hopes of marriage and honours; meaning, when I had obtained these, to press (as few singularly happy had before me) with oar and sail into that haven, and there rest" (Aug, De Vita Beata, sec. 4).

one who would unchain me. Moreover, it was by me that the serpent spake unto Alypius himself, weaving and laying in his path, by my tongue, pleasant snares, wherein his honourable and free feet * might be entangled.

22. For when he wondered that I, for whom he had no slight esteem, stuck so fast in the bird-lime of that pleasure as to affirm whenever we discussed the matter that it would be impossible for me to lead a single life, and urged in my defence when I saw him wonder that there was a vast difference between the life that he had tried by stealth and snatches (of which he had now but a faint recollection, and might therefore, without regret, easily despise), and my sustained acquaintance with it, whereto if but the honourable name of marriage were added, he would not then be astonished at my inability to contemn that course, then began he also to wish to be married, not as if overpowered by the lust of such pleasure, but from curiosity. For, as he said, he was anxious to know what that could be without which my life, which was so pleasing to him, seemed to me not life but a penalty. For his mind, free from that chain, was astounded at my slavery, and through that astonishment was going on to a desire of trying it, and from it to the trial itself, and thence, perchance, to fall into that bondage whereat he was so astonished, seeing he was ready to enter into "a covenant

1" Paulinus says that though he lived among the people and sat oyer them, ruling the sheep of the Lord's fold, as a watchful shepherd, with anxious sleeplessness, yet by renunciation of the world, and denial of flesh and blood, he had made himself a wilderness, severed from the many, called among the few" (Ap. Aug. Ep. 24, sec. 2). St. Jerome calls him "his holy and venerable brother, Father (Papa) Alypius" (Ep. 39, ibid.). Earlier, Augustine speaks of him as "abiding in union with him, to be an example to the brethren who wished to avoid the cares of this world" (Ep. 22); and to Paulinus {Ep. 27), [Romanianus] "is a relation of the venerable and truly blessed Bishop Alypius, whom you embrace with your whole heart deservedly; for whosoever thinks favourably of that man, thinks of the great mercy of God. Soon, by the help of God, I shall transfuse Alypius wholly into your soul [Paulinus had asked Alypius to write him his life, and Augustine had, at Alypius' request, undertaken to relieve him, and to do it]; for I feared chiefly lest he should shrink from laying open all which the Lord has bestowed upon him, lest, if read by any ordinary person (for it would not be read by you only), he should seem not so much to set forth the gifts of God committed to men, as to exalt himself. with death;" 1 and he that loves danger shall fall into it. 2 For whatever the conjugal honour be in the office of wellordering a married life, and sustaining children, influenced us but slightly. But that which did for the most part afflict me, already made a slave to it, was the habit of satisfying an insatiable lust; him about to be enslaved did an admiring wonder draw on. In this state were we, until Thou, most High, not forsaking our lowliness, commiserating our misery, didst come to our rescue by wonderful and secret ways.

Chap. xiii. Being urged by his mother to take a wife, he sought a maiden that ivas pleasing unto him.

23. Active efforts were made to get me a wife. I wooed, I was engaged, my mother taking the greatest pains in the matter, that when I was once married, the health-giving baptism might cleanse me; for which she rejoiced that I was being daily fitted, remarking that her desires and Thy promises were being fulfilled in my faith. At which time, verily, both at my request and her own desire, with strong heartfelt cries did we daily beg of Thee that Thou wouldest by a vision disclose unto her something concerning my future marriage; but Thou wouldest not. She saw indeed certain vain and fantastic things, such as the earnestness of a human spirit, bent thereon, conjured up; and these she told me of, not with her usual confidence when Thou hadst shown her anything, but slighting them. For she could, she declared, through some feeling which she could not express in words, discern the difference betwixt Thy revelations and the dreams of hexown spirit. Yet the affair was pressed on, and a maiden sued who wanted two years of the marriageable age; and, as she was pleasing, she was waited for.

Chap. xiv. The design of establishing a common household with his friends is speedily hindered,

24. And many of us friends, consulting on and abhorring the turbulent vexations of human life, had considered and now almost determined upon living at ease and separate from the turmoil of men. And this was to be obtained in this way; we were to bring whatever we could severally procure, and make a common household, so that, through the sincerity of our friendship, nothing should belong more to one than the other; but the whole, being derived from all, should as a whole belong to each, and the whole unto all. It seemed to us that this society might consist of ten persons, some of whom were very rich, especially Eomanianus, 1 our townsman, an intimate friend of mine from his childhood, whom grave business matters had then brought up to Court; who was the most earnest of us all for this project, and whose voice was of great weight in commending it, because his estate was far more ample than that of the rest. We had arranged, too, that two officers should be chosen yearly, for the providing of all necessary things, whilst the rest were left undisturbed. But when we began to reflect whether the wives which some of us had already, and others hoped to have, would permit this, all that plan, which was being so well framed, broke to pieces in our hands, and was utterly wrecked and cast aside. Thence we fell again to sighs and groans, and our steps to follow the broad and beaten ways 2 of the world; for many

1 Romanianus was a relation of Alypius (Aug. Ep. 27, ad Paulin. ), of talent which astonished Augustine himself (C. Acad. i. 1, ii. 1), "surrounded by affluence from early youth, and snatched by what are thought adverse circumstances from the absorbing whirlpools of life" (ibid.). Augustine frequently mentions his great wealth, as also this vexatious suit, whereby he was harassed (C. Acad. i. 1, ii. 1, 2), and which so clouded his mind that his talents were almost unknown (C. Acad. ii. 2); as also his very great kindness to himself, when, "as a poor lad, setting out to foreign study, he had received him in his house, supported and (yet more) encouraged him; when deprived of his father, comforted, animated, aided him; when returning to Carthage, in pursuit of a higher employment, supplied him with all necessaries." "Lastly," says Augustine, "whatever ease I now enjoy, that I have escaped the bonds of useless desires, that, laying aside the weight of dead cares, I breathe, recover, return to myself, that with all earnestness I am seeking the truth [Augustine wrote this the year before his baptism], that I am attaining it, that I trust wholly to arrive at it, you encouraged, impelled, effected " (C. Acad. ii. 2).
Augustine had "cast him headlong with himself" (as so many other of his friends) into the Manichsean heresy (ibid. i. sec. 3), and it is to be hoped that he extricated him with himself; but we only learn positively that he continued to be fond of the works of Augustine (Ep. 27), whereas in that which he dedicated to him (C. Acad.), Augustine writes very doubtingly to him, and afterwards recommends him to Paulinus, "to be cured wholly or in part by his conversation" (Ep.
27). E. B. P.

Chap. xv. He dismisses one mistress, and chooses another .

25. Meanwhile my sins were being multiplied, and my mistress being torn from my side as an impediment to my marriage, my heart, which clave to her, was racked, and wounded, and bleeding. And she went back to Africa, making a vow unto Thee never to know another man, leaving with me my natural son by her. But I, unhappy one, who could not imitate a woman, impatient of delay, since it was not until two years' time I was to obtain her I sought, being not so much a lover of marriage as a slave to lust, procured another (not a wife, though), that so by the bondage of a lasting habit the disease of my soul might be nursed up, and kept up in its vigour, or even increased, into the kingdom of marriage. Nor was that wound of mine as yet cured which had been caused by the separation from my former mistress, but after inflammation and most acute anguish it mortified, 3 and the pain became numbed, but more desperate.

Chap. xvi. The fear of death and judgment called him, believing in the immortality of the soul, back from his wickedness, him who aforetime believed in the opinions of Epicurus.

26. Unto Thee be praise, unto Thee be glory, O Fountain of mercies ! I became more wretched, and Thou nearer.
Thy right hand was ever ready to pluck me out of the mire, and to cleanse me, but I was ignorant of it. Nor did anything recall me from a yet deeper abyss of carnal pleasures, but the fear of death and of Thy future judgment, which, amid all my fluctuations of opinion, never left my

3 In Iris De Natura Con. Manich. he has the same idea. He is speaking of the evil that has no pain, and remarks: "Likewise in the body, better is i wound with pain than putrefaction without pain, which is specially styled corruption; " and the same idea is embodied in the extract from Caird's Sermons, on p. 5, note 7.

breast. And in disputing with my friends, Alypius and Nebridius, concerning the nature of good and evil, I held that Epicurus had, in my judgment, won the palm, had I not believed that after death there remained a life for the soul, and places of recompense, which Epicurus would not believe. 1

And I demanded, "Supposing us to be immortal, and to be living in the enjoyment of perpetual bodily pleasure, and that without any fear of losing it, why, then, should we not be happy, or why should we search for anything else? " not knowing that even this very thing was a part of my great misery, that, being thus sunk and blinded, I could not discern that light of honour and beauty to be embraced for its own sake, 2 which cannot be seen by the eye of the flesh, it being visible only to the inner man. Nor did I, unhappy one, consider out of what vein it emanated, that even these things, loathsome as they were, I with pleasure discussed with my friends. Nor could I, even in accordance with my then

1 The ethics of Epicurus were a modified Hedonism (Diog. Laert. De Vitis, etc., x. 123). With him the earth was a congeries of atoms (ibid. 38, 40), which atoms existed from eternity, and formed themselves, uninfluenced by the gods. The soul he held to be material. It was diffused through the body, and was in its nature somewhat like air. At death it was resolved into its original atoms, when the being ceased to exist (ibid. 63, 64). Hence death was a matter of indifference to man [<S tavaros *i/*h *fo; fifias, ibid. 124, etc.]. In that great upheaval after the scholasticism of the Middle Ages, the various ancient philosophies were revived. This of Epicurus was disentombed and, as it were, vitalized by Gassendi, in the beginning of the seventeenth century; and it has a special importance from its bearing on the physical theories and investigations of modern times. Archer Butler, adverting to the inadequacy of the chief philosophical schools to satisfy the wants of the age in the early days of the planting of Christianity (Lectures on Ancient Philosophy, ii. 333), says of the Epicurean: " Its popularity was unquestioned; its adaptation to a luxurious age could not be doubted. But it was not formed to satisfy the wants of the time, however it might minister to its pleasures. It was, indeed, as it still continues to be, the tacit philosophy of the careless, and might thus number a larger army of disciples than any contemporary system. But its supremacy existed only when it estimated numbers, it ceased when tried by weight. The eminent men of Rome were often its avowed favourers; but they were for the most part men eminent in arms and statesmanship, rather than the influential directors of the world of speculation. Nor could the admirable poetic art of Liicretius, or the still more attractive ease of Horace, confer such strength or dignity upon the system as to enable it to compete with the new and mysterious elements now upon all sides gathering into conflict."

Woe to the audacious soul which hoped that, if it forsook Thee, it would find some better thing! It hath turned and re-turned, on back, sides, and belly, and all was hard, and Thou alone rest. And behold, Thou art near, and deliverest us from our wretched wanderings, and stablishest us in Thy way, and dost comfort us, and say, "Eun; I will carry you, yea, I will lead you, and there also will I carry you."

CHAP. I.] HIS IDEA OF GOD. 139

SEVENTH BOOK

HE RECALLS THE BEGINNING OF HIS YOUTH, i.e. THE THIRTY-FIRST YEAR OF HIS AGE, IN WHICH VERY GRAVE ERRORS AS TO THE NATURE OF GOD AND THE ORIGIN OF EVIL BEING DISTINGUISHED, AND THE SACRED BOOKS MORE ACCURATELY KNOWN, HE AT LENGTH ARRIVES AT A CLEAR KNOWLEDGE OF GOD, NOT YET RIGHTLY APPREHENDING JESUS CHRIST.
Chap. i. He regarded not God indeed under the form of a human body, but at a corporeal substance diffused through space.

1. "I was that evil and abominable youth of mine, and I was passing into early manhood: as I increased in years, the fouler became I in vanity, who could not conceive of any substance but such as I saw with my own eyes. I thought not of Thee, God, under the form of a human body. Since the time I began to hear something of wisdom, I always avoided this; and I rejoiced to have found the same in the faith of our spiritual mother, Thy Catholic Church. But what else to imagine Thee I knew not. And I, a man, and such a man, sought to conceive of Thee, the sovereign and only true God; and I did in my inmost heart believe that Thou wert incorruptible, and inviolable, and unchangeable; because, not knowing whence or how, yet most plainly did I see and feel sure that which may be corrupted must be worse than that which cannot, and what cannot be violated did I without hesitation prefer before that which can, and deemed that which suffers no change to be better than that which is changeable. Violently did my heart cry out against all my phantasms, and with this one blow I endeavoured to beat away from the eye of my mind all that unclean crowd which fluttered around it. And lo, being scarce put off, they, in the twinkling of an eye, pressed in multitudes around me, dashed against my face, and beclouded it; so that, though

1 See Hi. sec. 12, iv. sees. 3 and 12, and v. sec. 19, above.

140 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK VII.]

I thought not of Thee under the form of a human body, yet was I constrained to image Thee to be something corporeal in space, either infused into the world, or infinitely diffused beyond it, even that incorruptible, inviolable, and unchangeable, which I preferred to the corruptible, and violable, and changeable; since whatsoever I conceived, deprived of this space, appeared as nothing to me, yea, altogether nothing, not even a void, as if a body were removed from its place and the place should remain empty of any body at all, whether earthly, terrestrial, watery, aerial, or celestial, but should remain a void place a spacious nothing, as it were.

2. I therefore being thus gross-hearted, nor clear even to myself, whatsoever was not stretched over certain spaces, nor diffused, nor crowded together, nor swelled out, or which did not or could not receive some of these dimensions, I judged to be altogether nothing. I For over such forms as my eyes are wont to range did my heart then range; nor did I see that this same observation, by which I formed those same images, was not of this kind, and yet it could not have formed them had not itself been something great. In like manner did I conceive of Thee, Life of my life, as vast through infinite spaces, on every side penetrating the whole mass of the world, and beyond it, all ways, through immeasurable
For with what understanding can man apprehend God, who does not yet apprehend that very understanding itself of his own by which he desires to apprehend Him? And if he does already apprehend this, let him carefully consider that there is nothing in his own nature better than it; and let him see whether he can there see any outlines of forms, or brightness of colours, or greatness of space, or distance of parts, or extension of size, or any movements through intervals of place, or any such thing at all. Certainly we find nothing of all this in that, than which we find nothing better in our own nature, that is, in our own intellect, by which we apprehend wisdom according to our capacity. What, therefore, we do not find in that, which is our own best, we ought not to seek in Him, who is far better than that best of ours; that so we may understand God, if we are able, and as much as we are able, as good without quality, great without quantity, a Creator though He lack nothing, ruling but from no position, sustaining all things without 'having' them, in His wholeness everywhere yet without place, eternal without time, making things that are changeable without change of Himself, and without passion. Whoso thus thinks of God, although he cannot yet find out in all ways what He is, yet piously takes heed, as much as he is able, to think nothing of Him that He is not." De Trin. v. 2.

and boundless spaces; so that the earth should have Thee, the heaven have Thee, all things have Thee, and they bounded in Thee, but Thou nowhere. For as the body of this air which is above the earth preventeth not the light of the sun from passing through it, penetrating it, not by bursting or by cutting, but by filling it entirely, so I imagined the body, not of heaven, air, and sea only, but of the earth also, to be pervious to Thee, and in all its greatest parts as well as smallest penetrable to receive Thy presence, by a secret inspiration, both inwardly and outwardly governing all things which Thou hast created. So I conjectured, because I was unable to think of anything else; for it was untrue. For in this way would a greater part of the earth contain a greater portion of Thee, and the less a lesser; and all things should so be full of Thee, as that the body of an elephant should contain more of Thee than that of a sparrow by how much larger it is, and occupies more room; and so shouldest Thou make the portions of Thyself present unto the several portions of the world, in pieces, great to the great, little to the little. But Thou art not such a one; nor hadst Thou as yet enlightened my darkness.

3. It was sufficient for me, Lord, to oppose to those deceived deceivers and dumb praters (dumb, since Thy word sounded not forth from them) that which a long while ago, while we were at Carthage, Nebridius used to propound, at which all we who heard it were disturbed: "What could that reputed nation of darkness, which the Manichseans are in the habit of setting up as a mass opposed to Thee, have done unto Thee hadst Thou objected to fight with it? For had it been answered, 'It would have done Thee some injury/then shouldest Thou be subject to violence and corruption; but if the reply were: *It could do Thee no injury,' then was no cause assigned for Thy fighting with it; and so fighting as that a certain portion and member of Thee, or offspring of Thy very substance, should be blended with adverse powers and natures not of Thy creation, and be by them corrupted and deteriorated to such an extent as to be turned from happiness into misery, and need help whereby it might be delivered and purged; and that this offspring of Thy substance was the soul, to which, being enslaved, contaminated, and corrupted, Thy word, free, pure, and entire, might bring succour; but yet also the word itself being corruptible, because it was from one and the same substance. So that should they affirm Thee, whatsoever Thou art, that is, Thy substance whereby Thou art, to be incorruptible, then were all these assertions false and execrable; but if corruptible, then that were false, and at the first utterance to be abhorred." x This argument, then, was enough against those who wholly merited to be vomited forth from the surfeited stomach, since they had no means of escape without horrible sacrilege, both of heart and tongue, thinking and speaking such things of Thee.

1 Similar arguments are made use of in his controversy with Fortunatus (Dis. ii. 5), where he says, that as Fortunatus could find no answer, so neither could he when a Manichsean, and that this led him to the true faith. Again, in his De Moribns (sec. 25), where he examines the answers which had been given, he commences: "For this gives rise to the question, which used to throw us into great perplexity, even when we were your zealous disciples, nor could we find any answer, what the race of darkness would have done to God, supposing He had refused to fight with it at the cost of such calamity to part of Himself. For if God would not have suffered any loss by remaining quiet, we thought it hard that we had been sent to endure so much. Again, if He would have suffered, His nature cannot have been incorruptible, as it behoves the nature of God to be."

We have already, in the note to book iv. sec. 26, referred to some of the matters touched on in this section; but they call for further elucidation. The following passage, quoted by Augustine from Manichaeanus himself {Con. Ep. Manich. 19), discloses to us (1) their ideas as to the nature and position of the two kingdoms: "In one direction, on the border of this bright and holy region, there was a land of darkness, deep and vast in extent, where abode fiery bodies, destructive races. Here was boundless darkness flowing from the same source in immeasurable abundance, with the productions properly belonging to it. Beyond this were muddy, turbid waters, with their inhabitants; and inside of them winds terrible and violent, with their prince and their progenitors. Then, again, a fiery region of destruction, with its chiefs and peoples. And similarly inside of this, a race full of smoke and gloom, where abode the dreadful prince and chief of all, having around him innumerable princes, himself the mind and source of them all. Such are the five natures of the region of corruption. " Augustine also designates them (ibid. sec. 20) "the five dens of the race of darkness." The nation of darkness desires to possess the kingdom of light, and prepares to make was u:

CHAP. III.] THE PRINCIPLES OF LIGHT AND DARKNESS. 143

Chap. III. That the emise of evil is the free judgment of the will.

4. But I also, as yet, although I said and was firmly persuaded, that Thou our Lord, the true God, who madest not only our souls but our bodies, and not our souls and bodies alone, but all creatures and all things, wert uncontaminable and inconvertible, and in no part mutable; yet understood I not readily and clearly what was the cause of evil. And yet, whatever it was, I perceived that it must be so sought out as not to constrain me by it to believe that the immutable God was mutable, lest I myself should become the thing that I was seeking out. I sought, therefore, for it free from care, certain of the untruthfulness of what these asserted, whom I shunned with my whole heart; for I perceived that through seeking after the origin of evil, they were filled with malice, in that they liked better to think that Thy Substance did suffer evil than that their own did commit it. I says: "You dress up ior our benefit some wonderful First Man, who came down from the race of light, to war with the race of darkness, armed with his waters against the waters of the enemy, and with his fire against their fire, and with his winds against their winds. " And again (ibid. sec. 5): "You say that he mingled with the principles of darkness in his conflict with the race of darkness, that by capturing these principles the world might be made out of the mixture. So that, by your profane fancies, Christ is not only mingled with heaven and all the stars, but conjoined and compounded with the earth and all its productions, a Saviour no more, but needing to be saved by you, by your eating and disgorging Him. This foolish custom of making your disciples bring you food, that your teeth and stomach may be the means of relieving Christ, who is bound up in it, is a consequence of your profane fancies. You declare that Christ is liberated in this way, not, however, entirely; for you hold that some tiny particles of no value still remain in the excrement, to be mixed up and compounded again and again in various material forms, and to be released and purified at any rate by the fire in which the world will be burned up, if not before. Nay, even then, you say, Christ is not entirely liberated, but some extreme particles of His good and divine nature, which have been so defiled that they cannot be cleansed, are condemned to stay for ever in the mass of darkness." The result of this commingling of the light with the darkness was, that a certain portion and member of God was turned "from happiness into misery," and placed in bondage in the world, and was in need of help "whereby it might be delivered and purged." (See also Con. Fortunat. i. 1.)

5. And I directed my attention to discern what I now heard, that free will was the cause of our doing evil, and Thy righteous judgment of our suffering it. But I was unable clearly to discern it. So, then, trying to draw the eye of my mind from that pit, I was plunged again therein, and trying often, was as often plunged back again. But this raised me towards Thy light, that I knew as well that I had a will as that I had life: when, therefore, I was willing or unwilling to do anything, I was most certain that it was none but myself that was willing and unwilling; and immediately I perceived that there was the cause of my sin. But what I did against my will I saw that I suffered rather than did, and that judged I not to be my fault, but my punishment; whereby, believing Thee to be most just, I quickly confessed myself to be not unjustly punished. But again I said: " Who made me? Was it not my God, who is not only good, but goodness itself? Whence came I then to will to do evil, and to be unwilling to do good, that there might be cause for my just punishment? Who was it that put this in me, and implanted in me the root of bitterness, seeing I was altogether made by my most sweet God? If the devil were the author, whence is that devil? And if he also, by his own perverse will, of a good angel became a devil, whence also was the evil will in him whereby he became a devil, seeing that the angel was made altogether good by that most good Creator?" By these reflections was I again cast down and stifled; yet not plunged into that hell of error (where no man confesseth unto Thee), 2 to think that Thou dost suffer evil, rather than that man doth it.

Chap. iv. That God is not corruptible, who, if He were, would not be God at all.

6. For I was so struggling to find out the rest, as having already found that what was incorruptible must be better than the corruptible; and Thee, therefore, whatsoever Thou wert, did I acknowledge to be incorruptible. For never yet was, nor will be, a soul able to conceive of anything better than Thou, who art the highest and best good. But whereas most truly and certainly that which is incorruptible is to be preferred to the corruptible (like as I myself did now prefer it), then, if Thou were not incorruptible, I could in my thoughts have reached unto something better than my God. Where, then, I saw that the incorruptible was to be preferred to the corruptible, there ought I to seek Thee, and there observe "whence evil itself was," that is, whence comes the corruption by which Thy substance can by no means be profaned. For corruption, truly, in no way injures our God, by no will, by no necessity, by no unforeseen chance, because He is God, and what He wills is good, and Himself is that good; but to be corrupted is not good. Nor art Thou compelled to do anything against Thy will in that Thy will is not greater than Thy power. But greater should it be wert Thou Thyself greater than Thyself; for the will and power of God is God Himself. And what can be unforeseen by Thee, who knowest all things? Nor is there any sort of nature but Thou knowest it. And what more should we say "why that substance which God is should not be corruptible," seeing that if it were o it could not be God?

8 Ps. vi. 5.

Chap. v. Questions concerning the origin of evil in regard to God, who, since He is the chief good, cannot be the cause of evil.

*J. And I sought "whence is evil?" And sought in an evil way; nor saw I the evil in my very search. And I set in order before the view of my spirit the whole creation, and whatever we can discern in it, such as earth, sea, air, stars, trees, living creatures; yea, and whatever in it we do not see, as the firmament of heaven, all the angels, too, and all the spiritual inhabitants thereof. But these very beings, as though they were bodies, did my fancy dispose in such and such places, and I made one huge mass of all Thy creatures, distinguished according to the kinds of bodies, some of them being real bodies, some what I myself had feigned for spirits. And this mass I made huge, not as it was, which I could not know, but as large as I thought well, yet every way finite. But Thee, O Lord, I imagined on every part environing and penetrating it, though every way infinite; as if there were a sea every where, and on every side through immensity nothing but an

con. K

infinite sea; and it contained within itself some sponge, huge, though finite, so that the sponge would in all its parts be filled from the immeasurable sea. So conceived I Thy creation to be itself finite, and filled by Thee, the Infinite. And I said; Behold God, and behold what God hath created; and God is good, yea, most mightily and incomparably better than all these; but yet He, who is good, hath created them good, and behold how He encircleth and filleteth them. Where, then, is evil, and whence, and how crept it in hither? What is its root, and what its seed? Or hath it no being at all? Why, then, do we fear and shun that which hath no being? Or if we fear it needlessly, then surely is that fear evil whereby the heart is unnecessarily pricked and tormented, and so much a greater evil, as we have naught to fear, and yet do fear.

Therefore either that is evil which we fear, or the act of fearing is in itself evil. Whence, therefore, is it, seeing that God, who is good, hath made all these things good? He, indeed, the greatest and chiepest Good, hath created these lesser goods; but both Creator and created are all good.

Whence is evil? Or was there some evil matter of which He made and formed and ordered it, but left something in it which He did not convert into good? But why was this? Was He powerless to change the whole lump, so that no evil should remain in it, seeing that He is omnipotent? Lastly, why would He make anything at all of it, and not rather by the same omnipotence cause it not to be at all? Or could it indeed exist contrary to His will? Or if it were from eternity, why did He permit it so to be for infinite spaces of times in the past, and was pleased so long after to make something out of it? Or if He wished now all of a sudden to do something, this rather should the Omnipotent have accomplished, that this evil matter should not be at all, and that He only should be the whole, true, chief, and infinite Good. Or if it were not good that He, who was good, should not also be the framer and creator of what was good, then that matter which was evil being removed, and brought to nothing, He might form good matter, whereof He might create all things. For He would not be omnipotent were He not able to create something good.

CHAP. VI.] ASTROLOGY. 147

without being assisted by that matter which had not been created by Himself. 1 Such like things did I revolve in my miserable breast, overwhelmed with most gnawing cares lest I should die ere I discovered the truth; yet was the faith of Thy Christ, our Lord and Saviour, as held in the Catholic Church, fixed firmly in my heart, unformed, indeed, as yet upon many points, and diverging from doctrinal rules, but yet my mind did not utterly leave it, but every day rather drank in more and more of it.

Chap. vi. He refutes the divinations of the astrologer*, deduced from the constellations.

8. Now also had I repudiated the lying divinations and impious absurdities of the astrologers. Let Thy mercies, out of the depth of my soul, confess unto thee 2 for this also, O my God. For Thou, Thou altogether, for who else is it that calls us back from the death of all errors, but that Life which knows not how to die, and the Wisdom which, requiring no light, enlightens the minds that do, whereby the universe is governed, even to the fluttering leaves of trees? Thou providest also for my obstinacy wherewith I struggled with Vindicianus, an acute old man, and Nebidius, a young one of remarkable talent;
the former vehemently declaring, and the latter frequently, though with a certain measure of doubt, saying, "That no art existed by which to foresee future things, but that men's surmises had oftentimes the help of luck, and that of many things which they foretold some came to pass unawares to the preclictors, who lighted on it by their oft speaking." Thou, therefore, didst provide a friend for me, who was no negligent consulter of the astrologers, and yet not thoroughly skilled in those arts, but, as I said, a curious consulter with them; and yet knowing somewhat, which he said he had heard from his father, which, how far it would tend to overthrow the estimation of that art, he knew not.
This man, then, by name Firminius, having received a liberal education, and being well versed in rhetoric, consulted me, as one very dear to him, as to what I thought on some affairs of his, wherein his worldly hopes had risen, viewed with regard to 1 See xi. sec. 7, note, below. * Ps. cvii. 8, Vulg. 3 See iv. sec. 5, note, above.

148 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK VII.]

his so-called constellations; and I, who had now begun to lean in this particular towards Nebidius' opinion, did not indeed decline to speculate about the matter, and to tell him what came into my irresolute mind, but still added that I was now almost persuaded that these were but empty and ridiculous follies. Upon this he told me that his father had been very curious in such books, and that he had a friend who was as interested in them as he was himself, who, with combined study and consultation, fanned the flame of their affection for these toys, insomuch that they would observe the moment when the very dumb animals which bred in their houses brought forth, and then observed the position of the heavens with regard to them, so as to gather fresh proofs of this so-called art. He said, moreover, that his father had told him, that at the time his mother was about to give birth to him (Firminius), a female servant of that friend of his father's was also great with child, which could not be hidden from her master, who took care with most diligent exactness to know of the birth of his very dogs. And so it came to pass that (the one for his wife, and the other for his servant, with the most careful observation, calculating the days and hours, and the smaller divisions of the hours) both were delivered at the same moment, so that both were compelled to allow the very selfsame constellations, even to the minutest point, the one for his son, the other for his young slave. For so soon as the women began to be in travail, they each gave notice to the other of what was fallen out in their respective houses, and had messengers ready to despatch to one another so soon as they had information of the actual birth, of which they had easily provided, each in his own province, to give instant intelligence. Thus, then, he said, the messengers of the respective parties met one another in such equal distances from either house, that neither of them could discern any difference either in the position of the stars or other most minute points. And yet Firminius, born in a high estate in his parents' house, ran his course through the prosperous paths of this world, was increased in wealth, and elevated to honours; whereas that slave the yoke of his condition being unrelaxed continued to serve his masters, as Firminius, who knew him, informed me.

9. Upon hearing and believing these things, related by so reliable a person, all that resistance of mine melted away; and first I endeavoured to reclaim Firminius himself from that curiosity, by telling him, that upon inspecting his constellations, I ought, were I to foretell truly, to have seen in them parents eminent among their neighbours, a noble family in its own city, good birth, becoming education, and liberal learning. But if that servant had consulted me upon the same constellations, since they were his also, I ought again to tell him, likewise truly, to see in them the meanness of his origin, the abjectness of his condition, and everything else altogether removed from and at variance with the former. Whence, then, looking upon the same constellations, I should, if I spoke the truth, speak diverse things, or if I spoke the same, speak falsely; thence assuredly was it to be gathered, that whatever, upon consideration of the constellations, was foretold truly, was not by art, but by chance; and whatever falsely, was not from the unskilfulness of the art, but the error of chance.

10. An opening being thus made, I ruminated within myself on such things, that no one of those dotards (who followed such occupations, and whom I longed to assail, and with derision to confute) might urge against me that Firminius had informed me falsely, or his father him: I turned my thoughts to those that are born twins, who generally come out of the womb so near one to another, that the small distance of time between them how much force soever they may contend that it has in the nature of things cannot be noted by human observation, or be expressed in those figures which the astrologer is to examine that he may pronounce the truth. Nor can they be true; for, looking into the same figures, he must have foretold the same of Esau and Jacob, whereas the same did not happen to them. He must therefore speak falsely; or if truly, then, looking into the same figures, he must not speak the same things. Not then by art, but by chance, would he speak truly. For Thou, O Lord, most righteous Kuler of the universe, the inquirers and inquired of knowing it not, worked by a hidden inspiration that the consulter should hear what, according to the hidden deservings of souls, he ought to hear, out of the depth of Thy righteous judgment, to whom let not man say, "What is this ?" or " Why that ?" Let him not say so, for he is man.

1 He uses the same illustration when speaking of the mattematici, or astrologers, in his De Doct. Christ, ii. 33.

150 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK VII.]

Chap. vii. He is severely exercised as to the origin of evil.

11. And now, O my Helper, hadst Thou freed me from those fetters; and I inquired, "Whence is evil?" and found no result. But Thou sufferedst me not to be carried away from the faith by any fluctuations of thought, whereby I believed Thee both to exist, and Thy substance to be unchangeable, and that Thou hadst a care of and wouldest judge men; and that in Christ, Thy Son, our Lord, and the Holy Scriptures, which the authority of Thy Catholic Church pressed upon me, Thou hadst planned the way of man's salvation to that life which is to come after this death. These things being safe and immoveably settled in my mind, I eagerly inquired, "Whence is evil?" What torments did my travailing heart then endure! What sighs, my God! Yet even there were Thine ears open, and I knew it not; and when in stillness I sought earnestly, those silent contritions of my soul were strong cries unto Thy mercy. No man knoweth, but only Thou, what I endured. For what was that which was thence through my tongue poured into the ears of my most familiar friends? Did the whole tumult of my soul, for which neither time nor speech was sufficient, reach them? Yet went the whole into Thine ears, all of which I bellowed out from the sighings of my heart; and my desire was before Thee, and the light of mine eyes was not with me; I for that was within, I without. Nor was that in place, but my attention was directed to things contained in place; but there did I find no resting-place, nor did they receive me in such a way as that I could say, "It is sufficient, it is well;" nor did they let me turn back, where it might be well enough with me. For to these things was I superior, but inferior to Thee; and Thou art my true joy when I am subjected to Thee, and Thou hadst subjected to me what Thou createdst beneath me. 1 And this was the true temperature and middle region of my safety, to continue in Thine image, and by serving Thee to have dominion over the body. But when I lifted myself proudly against Thee, and "ran against the Lord, even on His neck, with the thick bosses" of my buckler, 2 even these inferior things were placed above me, and pressed upon me, and nowhere was there alleviation or breathing space. They encountered my sight on every side in crowds and troops, and in thought the images of bodies obtruded themselves as I was returning to Thee, as if they would say unto me, "Whither goest thou, unworthy and base one?" And these things had sprung forth out of my wound; for thou humolest the proud like one that is wounded, 3 and through my own swelling was I separated from Thee; yea, my too much swollen face closed up mine eyes.

'Ps. xxx vii. 9-11, Vulg.

CHAP. VIII.] GOD LEADS HIM. 151

Chap. viii. By God's assistance he by degrees arrives at the truth.
12. "But Thou, Lord, shalt endure for ever," yet not for ever art Thou angry with us, because Thou dost commiserate our dust and ashes; and it was pleasing in Thy sight to reform my deformity, and by inward stings didst Thou disturb me, that I should be dissatisfied until Thou wert made sure to my inward sight. And by the secret hand of Thy remedy was my swelling lessened, and the disordered and darkened eyesight of my mind, by the sharp anointings of healthful sorrows, was from day to day made whole.

1 Man can only control the forces of nature by yielding obedience to nature's laws; and our true joy and safety is only to be found in being "subjected" to God. So Augustine says in another place (De Trin. x. 7), the soul is enjoined to know itself, "in order that it may consider itself, and live according to its own nature; that is, seek to be regulated according to its own nature, viz. under Him to whom it ought to be subject, and above those things to which it is to be preferred; under Him by whom it ought to be ruled, above those things which it ought to rule."

152 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK VII.]

Chap. ix. He compares the doctrine of the Platonists concerning the soul with the much more excellent doctrine of Christianity.

13. And Thou, willing first to show me how Thou "resistest the proud, but givest grace unto the humble," and by how great an act of mercy Thou hadst pointed out to men the path of humility, in that Thy "Word was made flesh" and dwelt among men, Thou procuredst for me, by the instrumentality of one inflated with most monstrous pride, certain books of the Platonists, translated from Greek into Latin. And therein

1 Jas. iv. 6, and 1 Pet. v. 5.

2 "This," says Watts, "was likely to be the book of Amelias the Platonist, who hath indeed this beginning of St. John's Gospel, calling the apostle a barbarian." This Amelius was a disciple of Plotinus, who was the first to develope and formulate the Neo-Platonic doctrines, and of whom it is said that he would not have his likeness taken, nor be reminded of his birthday, because it would recall the existence of the body he so much despised. A popular account of the theories of Plotinus, and their connection with the doctrines of Plato and of Christianity respectively, will be found in Archer Butler's Lectures on Ancient Philosophy, vol. ii. pp. 348-358. For a more systematic view of his writings, see Ueberweg's History of Philosophy, sec. 68. Augustine alludes again in his De Vita Beata (sec. 4) to the influence the Platonic writings had on him at this time; and it is interesting to note how in God's providence they were drawing him to seek a fuller knowledge of Him, just as in his nineteenth year (book iii. sec. 7, above) the Hortensius of Cicero stimulated him to the pursuit of wisdom. Thus in his experience was exemplified the truth embodied in the saying of Clemens Alexandrinus, "Philosophy led the Greeks to Christ, as the law did the Jews." Archbishop Trench, in his Hulsean Lectures (lees. 1 and 3, 1846, "Christ the Desire of all Nations"), enters with interesting detail into this question, specially as it relates to the heathen world.

"None," he says in lecture 3, "can thoughtfully read the early history of the Church without marking how hard the Jewish Christians found it to make their own the true idea of a Son of God, as indeed is witnessed by the whole Epistle to the Hebrews how comparatively easy the Gentile converts; how the Hebrew Christians were continually in danger of sinking down into Ebionite heresies, making Christ but a man as other men, refusing to go on unto perfection, or to realize the truth of His higher nature; while, on the other hand, the genial promptness is as remarkable with which the Gentile Church welcomed and embraced the offered truth, 'God manifest in the flesh.' "We feel that there must have been effectual preparations in the latter, which wrought its greater readiness for receiving and heartily embracing this truth when it arrived."

The passage from Amelius the Platonist, referred to at the beginning of this note, is examined in Burton's Bampton Lectures, note 90. It has been adverted to by Eusebius, Theodoret, and perhaps by Augustine in the De Civ. Dei, x. 29, quoted in note 2, sec. 25, below. See Kayes' Clement, pp. 116-124.

3 See i. sec. 23, note, above, and also his Life, in the last vol. of the Benedictine edition of his works, for a very fair estimate of his knowledge of Greek.

CHAP. IX.] THE DOCTRINE OF THE LOGOS. 153

I read, not indeed in the same words, but to the selfsame effect, 1 enforced by many and divers reasons, that, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by Him; and without Him was not any thing made that was made." That which was made by

1 The Neo-Platonic ideas as to the "Word" or xiyn, which Augustine (1) contrasts during the remainder of this book with the doctrine of the gospel, had its germ in the writings of Plato. The Greek term expresses both reason and the expression of reason in speech; and the Fathers frequently illustrate, by reference to this connection between ideas and uttered words, the fact that the "Word" that was with God had an incarnate existence in the world as the "Word" made flesh. By the Logos of the Alexandrian school something very different was meant from the Christian doctrine as to the incarnation, of which the above can only be taken as a dim illustration. It has been questioned, indeed, whether the philosophers, from Plotinus to the Gnostics of the time of St. John, believed the Logos and the supreme God to have in any sense separate "personalities." Dr. Burton, in his Bampton Lectures, concludes that they did not (lect. vii. p. 215, and note 93; compare Dorner, Person of Christ, i. 27, Clark); and quotes Origen when he points out to Celsus, that "while the heathen use the reason of God as another term for God Himself, the Christians use the term Logos for the Son of God."

Another point of difference which appears in Augustine's review of Platonism above, is found in the Platonist's discarding the idea of the Logos becoming man. This the very genius of their philosophy forbade them to hold, since they looked on matter as impure.

(2) It has been charged against Christianity by Gibbon and other sceptical writers, that it has borrowed largely from the doctrines of Plato; and it has been said that this doctrine of the Logos was taken from them by Justin Martyr. This charge, says Burton (ibid. p. 194), "has laid open in its supporters more inconsistencies and more misstatements than any other which ever has been advanced." We have alluded in the note to book iii. sec. 8, above, to Justin Martyr's search after truth. He endeavoured to find it successively in the Stoical, the Peripatetic, the Pythagorean, and the Platonic schools; and he appears to have thought as highly of Plato's philosophy as did Augustine. He does not, however, fail to criticise his doctrine when inconsistent with Christianity (see Burton, ibid, notes 18 and 86). Justin Martyr has apparently been chosen for attack as being the earliest of the post-apostolic Fathers. Burton, however, shows that Ignatius, who knew St. John, and was bishop of Antioch thirty years before his death, used precisely the same expression as applied to Christ (ibid. p. 204). This would appear to be a conclusive answer to this objection. (3) It may be well to note here Burton's general conclusions as to the employment of this term Logos in St. John, since it occurs frequently in this part of the Confessions.

Every one must have observed St. John's use of the term is peculiar as compared with the other apostles, but it is not always borne in mind that a generation probably elapsed between the date of his gospel and that of the other apostolic writings. In this interval the Gnostic heresy had made great advances; and it would appear that John, finding this term Logos prevalent when he wrote, in-

Him is "life; and the life was the light of men. And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not." 1 And that the soul of man, though it "bears witness of the light," 2 yet itself "is not that light; 3 but the Word of God, being God, is that true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." 4 And that "He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not." 6 But that "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not. 6 But as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name." 7 This I did not read there.

14. In like manner, I read there that God the Word was born not of flesh, nor of blood, nor of the will of man, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God. But that "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us," 8 I read not there. For I discovered in those books that it was in many and divers ways said, that the Son was in the form of the Father, and "thought it not robbery to be equal with God," for that naturally He was the same substance. But that He emptied Himself, " and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: and being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, fused into it a nobler meaning, and pointed out to those being led away by this heresy that there was indeed One who might be called "the Word " One who was not, indeed, God's mind, or as the word that comes from the mouth and passes away, but One who, while He had been " made flesh " like unto us, was yet co-eternal with God. "You will perceive," says Archer Butler (Ancient Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 10), ' ' how natural, or rather how necessary, is such a process, when you remember that this is exactly what every teacher must do who speaks of God to a heathen; he adopts the term, but he refines and exalts its meaning. Nor, indeed, is the procedure different in any use whatever of language in sacred senses and for sacred purposes. It has been justly remarked, by (I think) Isaac Casaubon, that the principle of all these adaptations is expressed in the sentence of St. Paul, Ov ayvetvvrtf tim/iurt, vovro* \yu xarecyixxu) vf*7t." On the charge against Christianity of having borrowed from heathenism, reference may be made to Trench's Hulsean Lectures, lect. i. even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him " from the dead, " and given Him a name above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father; " * those books have not. For that before all times, and above all times, Thy onlybegotten Son remaineth unchangeably co-eternal with Thee; and that of " His fulness " souls receive, 2 that they may be blessed; and that by participation of the wisdom remaining in them they are renewed, that they may be wise, is there. But that " in due time Christ died for the ungodly," 3 and that Thou sparedst not Thine only Son, but deliverest Him up for us all, 4 is not there. " Because Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes; " 5 that they " that labour and are heavy laden " might "come" unto Him and He might refresh them, 6 because He is "meek and lowly in heart." 7 "The meek will He guide in judgment; and the meek will He teach His way; " 8 looking upon our humility and our distress, and forgiving all our sins. 9 But such as are puffed up with the elation of would-be sublimer learning, do not hear Him saying, " Learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls." 10 " Because that, when they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." u

15. And therefore also did I read there, that they had changed the glory of Thy incorruptible nature into idols and divers forms, " into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things," 12 namely, into that Egyptian food 12 for which Esau lost his birthright; 1 for that Thy first-born people worshipped the head" of a four-footed beast instead of Thee, turning back in heart towards Egypt, and prostrating Thy image their own soul before the image " of an ox that eateth grass." 2 These things found I there; but I fed not on them. For it pleased Thee, Lord, to take away the reproach of diminution from Jacob, that the elder should serve the younger; 3 and Thou hast called the Gentiles into Thine inheritance. And I had come unto Thee from among the Gentiles, and I strained after that gold which Thou willedst Thy people to take from Egypt, seeing that wheresoever it was it was Thine. 4 And to the Athenians

Similarly, as to all truth being God's, Justin Martyr says: "Whatever things were rightly said among all men are the property of us Christians" (Apol. ii. 13). In this he parallels what Augustine claims in another place (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 28): "Let every good and true Christian understand that wherever truth may be found, it belongs to his Master." Origen has a similar allusion to that of Augustine above (Ep. ad Gregor. vol. i. 30), but echoes the experience of our erring nature, when he says that the gold of Egypt more frequently becomes transformed into an idol, than into an ornament for the tabernacle of God.

Augustine gives us at length his views on this matter in his De Doctr. Christ. ii. 60, 61: "If those who are called philosophers, and especially the Platonists, have said aught that is true and in harmony with our faith, we are not only not to shrink from it, but to claim it for our own use from those who have unlawful possession of it. For, as the Egyptians had not only the idols and heavy burdens which the people of Israel hated and fled from, but also vessels and ornaments of gold and silver, and garments, which the same people when going out of Egypt appropriated to themselves, designing them for a better use, not doing this on their own authority, but by the command of God, the Egyptians themselves, in their ignorance, providing them with things which they themselves were not making a good use of (Ex. iii. 21, 22, xii. 35, 36); in the same way all branches of heathen learning have not only false and superstitious fancies and heavy burdens of unnecessary toil, which every one of us, when going out under the leadership of Christ from the fellowship of the heathen, ought to abhor and avoid, but they contain also liberal instruction, which is better adapted to the use of the truth, and some most excellent precepts of morality; and some truths in regard even to the worship of the One God are found among them. Now these are, so to speak, their gold and silver, which they did not create themselves, but dug out of the mines of God's providence which are everywhere scattered abroad, and are perversely and unlawfully prostituting to the worship of devils. These, therefore, the Christian, when he separates himself in spirit from the miserable fellowship of these men, ought to take away from them, and to and with the eye of my soul (such as it was) saw above the same eye of my soul, above my mind, the Unchangeable Light. 4

Not this common light, which all flesh may look upon, nor, as it were, a greater one of the same kind, as though the brightness of this should be much more resplendent, and with its greatness fill up all things. Not like this was that light, but different, yea, very different from all these. devote to their proper use in preaching the gospel. Their garments, also, that is, human institutions such as are adapted to that intercourse with men which is indispensable in this life, we must take and turn to a Christian use. And what else have many good and faithful men among our brethren done? Do we not see with what a quantity of gold and silver, and garments, Cyprian, that most persuasive teacher and most blessed martyr, was loaded when he came out of Egypt? How much Lactantius brought with him! And Victorinus, and Optatus, and Hilary, not to speak of living men! How much Greeks out of number have borrowed! And, prior to all these, that most faithful servant of God, Moses, had done the same thing; for of him it is written that he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians (Acts vii. 22). . . . For what was done at the time of the exodus was no doubt a type prefiguring what happens now."

neither diffused through space, finite, nor infinite?" And Thou criedst to me from afar," Yea, verily, 'I am that I am.'" 8 And I heard this, as things are.

1 If we knew not God, he says, we could not love Him (De Trin. viii. 12), but in language very similar to that above, he tells us "we are men, created in the image of our Creator, whose eternity is true, and whose truth is eternal; whose love is eternal and true, and who Himself is the eternal, true, and adorable Trinity, without confusion, without separation" (De Civ. Dei, xi. 28); God, then, as even the Platonists hold, being the principle of all knowledge.

"Let Him," he concludes, in his De Civ. Dei (viii. 4), "be sought in whom all things are secured to us, let Him be discovered in whom all truth becomes certain to us, let Him be loved in whom all becomes right to us."

2 Ps. xxxix. 11, Vulg.

3 Ex. iii. 14. Augustine, when in his De Civ. Dei (viii. 11, 12) he makes reference to this text, leans to the belief, from certain parallels between Plato's doctrines and those of the word of God, that he may have derived information concerning the Old Testament Scriptures from an interpreter when in Egypt.

He says: "The most striking thing in this connection, and that which most of all inclines me almost to assent to the opinion that Plato was not ignorant of those writings, is the answer which was given to the question elicited from the holy Moses when the words of God were conveyed to him by the angel; for when he asked what was the name of that God who was commanding him to go and deliver the Hebrew people out of Egypt, this answer was given: 'I am who am; and thou shalt say to the children of Israel, He who is sent me unto you; ' as though, compared with Him that truly is, because He is unchangeable, those things which have been created mutable are not, a truth which Plato vehemently held, and most diligently commended. Am I know not whether this sentiment is anywhere to be found in the books of those who were before Plato, unless in that book where it is said, ' I am who am; and thou shalt say

Chap. xi. That creatures are mutable and God alone immutable.

17. And I viewed the other things below Thee, and perceived that they neither altogether are, nor altogether are not. They are, indeed, because they are from Thee; but are not, because they are not what Thou art. For that truly is which remains immutably/ It is good, then, for me to cleave unto God, 3 for if I remain not in Him, neither shall I in myself; but He, remaining in Himself, reneweth all things. 4 And Thou art the Lord my God, since Thou standest not in need of my goodness. 5

Chap. xii. Whatever things the good God has created are very good.

18. And it was made clear unto me that those things are good which yet are corrupted, which, neither were they supremely good, nor unless they were good, could be corrupted; because if supremely good, they were incorruptible, and if not good at all, there were nothing in them to be corrupted. For corruption harms, but, unless it could diminish goodness, it could not harm. Either, then, corruption harms not, which cannot to the children of Israel, Who is sent me unto you.' But we need not determine from what source he learned these things, whether it was from the books of the ancients who preceded him, or, as is more likely, from the words of the apostle (Rom. i. 20), 'Because that which is known of God has been manifested among them, for God hath manifested it to them. For His invisible things from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by those things which have been made, also His eternal power and Godhead.' "De Civ. Dei, viii. 11, 12.

2 Therefore, he argues, is God called the I AM (De Nat. Boni, 19); for omnia mutatio facit non esse quod erat. Similarly, we find him speaking in his De Mor. Manich. (c. i.): "For that exists in the highest sense of the word which continues always the same, which is throughout like itself, which cannot in any part be corrupted or changed, which is not subject to time, which admits of no variation in its present as compared with its former condition. This is existence in its true sense." See also note 3, p. 158.

be; or, what is most certain, all which is corrupted is deprived of good. But if they be deprived of all good, they will cease to be. For if they be, and cannot be at all corrupted, they will become better, because they shall remain incorruptibly. And what more monstrous than to assert that those things which have lost all their goodness are made better? Therefore, if they shall be deprived of all good, they shall no longer be. So long, therefore, as they are, they are good; therefore whatsoever is, is good. That evil, then, which I sought whence it was, is not any substance; for were it a substance, it would be good. For either it would be an incorruptible substance, and so a chief good, or a corruptible substance, which unless it were good it could not be corrupted. I perceived, therefore, and it was made clear to me, that Thou didst make all things good, nor is there any substance at all that was not made by Thee; and because all that Thou hast made are not equal, therefore all things are; because individually they are good, and altogether very good, because our God made all things very good. 1

Chap. xiii. It is meet to praise the Creator for the good things which are made in heaven and earth.

19. And to Thee is there nothing at all evil, and not only to Thee, but to Thy whole creation; because there is nothing without which can break in, and mar that order which Thou hast appointed it. But in the parts thereof, some things, because they harmonize not with others, are considered evil; 2 whereas those very things harmonize with others, and are good, and in themselves are good. And all these things which do not harmonize together harmonize with the inferior part which we call earth, having its own cloudy and windy sky concordant to it. Far be it from me, then, to say, "These things should not be."
For should I see nothing but these, I should indeed desire better; but yet, if only for these, ought I to praise Thee; for that Thou art to be praised is shown from the "earth, dragons, and all deeps; fire, and hail; snow, and cedars; beasts, and all cattle; creeping things, and flying fowl; kings of the earth, and all people; princes, and all judges of the earth; both young men and maidens; old men and children," praise Thy name.

But when, "from the heavens," these praise Thee, praise Thee, our God, "in the heights," all Thy "angels," all Thy "hosts,"
"sun and moon," all ye stars and light, "the heavens of heavens," and the "waters that be above the heavens," praise Thy name. 1 I did not now desire better things, because I was thinking of all; and with a better judgment I reflected that the things above were better than those below, but that all were better than those above alone.

Chap. xiv. Being displeased with some part of God's creation, he conceives of two original substances.
20. There is no wholeness in them whom aught of Thy creation displeaseth; no more than there was in me, when many things which Thou madest displeased me. And, because my soul dared not be displeased at my God, it would not suffer aught to be Thine which displeased it. Hence it had gone into the opinion of two substances, and resisted not, but talked foolishly. And, returning thence, it had made to itself a god, through infinite measures of all space; and imagined it to be Thee, and placed it in its heart, and again had become the temple of its own idol, which was to Thee an abomination. But after Thou hadst fomented the head of me unconscious of it, and closed mine eyes lest they should "behold vanity," 2 I ceased from myself a little, and my madness was lulled to sleep; and I awoke in Thee, and saw Thee to be infinite, though in another way; and this sight was not derived from the flesh.

Chap. xv. Whatever is, owes its being to God.

21. And I looked back on other things, and I perceived that it was to Thee they owed their being, and that they were all bounded in Thee; but in another way, not as being in space, but because Thou holdest all things in Thine hand in truth: and all things are true so far as they have a being; nor is there any falsehood, unless that which is not is thought to be. And I saw that all things harmonized, not with their places only, but with their seasons also. And that Thou, who only art eternal, didst not begin to work after innumerable spaces of times; for that all spaces of times, both those which have passed and which shall pass, neither go nor come, save through Thee, working and abiding. 1

Chap. xvi. Evil arises not from a substance, but from the perversion of the will.

22. And I discerned and found it no marvel, that bread which is distasteful to an unhealthy palate is pleasant to a healthy one; and that the light, which is painful to sore eyes, is delightful to sound ones. And Thy righteousness displeaseth the wicked; much more the viper and little worm, which Thou hast created good, fitting in with inferior parts of Thy creation; with which the wicked themselves also fit in, the more in proportion as they are unlike Thee, but with the superior creatures, in proportion as they become like to Thee. 2 And I inquired what iniquity was, and ascertained it not to be a substance, but a perversion of the will, bent aside from Thee, God, the Supreme Substance, towards these lower things, and casting out its bowels, 3 and swelling outwardly.
Chap. xvii. Above his changeable mind, he discovers the unchangeable Author of Truth.

23. And I marvelled that I now loved Thee, and no phantasm instead of Thee. And yet I did not merit to enjoy my God, but was transported to Thee by Thy beauty, and presently torn away from Thee by mine own weight, sinking with grief into these inferior things. This weight was carnal custom. Yet was there a remembrance of Thee with me; nor did I any way doubt that there was one to whom I might cleave, but that I was not yet one who could cleave unto

3 Ecclus. x. 9. Commenting on this passage of the Apocrypha (De Mils, vi. 40), he says, that while the soul's happiness and life is in God, " what is to go into outer things, but to cast out its inward parts, that is, to place itself fai from God not by distance of place, but by the affection of the mind?"

Thee; for that the body which is corrupted presseth down the soul, and the earthly dwelling weigheth down the mind which thinketh upon many things. 1 And most certain I was that Thy " invisible things from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even Thy eternal power and Godhead." 2 For, inquiring whence it was that I admired the beauty of bodies whether celestial or terrestrial, and what supported me in judging correctly on things mutable, and pronouncing, " This should be thus, this not," inquiring, then, whence I so judged, seeing I did so judge, I had found the unchangeable and trim p.unity of Truth, above my change aBTe mind. And thus, by degrees, I passed from bodies to the soul, which makes use of the senses of the body to perceive; and thence to its inward 3 fac ulty, to which the bodily senses represent outward things, and up to which reach the capabilities of beasts; and thence, again, I passed on to the reasoning faculty, 4 unto which whatever is received from the senses of the body is referred to be judged, which also, finding itself to be variable in me, raised

4 Here, and more explicitly in sec. 25, we have before us what has been called the "trichotomy" of man. This doctrine Augustine does not deny in theory, but appears to consider (De Anima, iv. 32) it prudent to overlook in practice. The biblical view of psychology may well be considered here not only on its own account, but as enabling us clearly to apprehend this passage and that which follows it. It is difficult to understand how any one can doubt that St. Paul, when speaking in 1 Thess. v. 23, of our "spirit, soul, and body being preserved unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ," implies a belief in a kind of trinity in man. And it is very necessary to the understanding of other Scriptures that we should realize what special attributes pertain to the soul and the spirit respectively. It may be said, generally, that the soul ($πνεύμα$) is that passionate and affectionate nature which is common to us and the inferior creatures, while the spirit ($νοοτροπία$) is the higher intellectual nature which is peculiar to man. Hence our Lord in His agony in the garden says (Matt. xxvi. 38), "My soul is exceeding sorrowful" the soul being liable to emotions of pleasure and pain. In the same passage (ver. 41) he says to the apostles who had slept during His great agony, "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak," so that the spirit is the seat of the will. And that the spirit is also the seat of consciousness we gather from St. Paul's words (1 Cor. ii. 11), "What man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God." And it is on the spirit of man that the Spirit of God operates; whence we read (Rom. viii. 16), "The Spirit beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." It is important to note that the word "flesh" ($ плоть$) has its special significance, as distinct from body. The word comes to us from the Hebrew through the Hellenistic Greek of the LXX., and in biblical language (see Bishop Pearson's Prefatio Parcenetica to his edition of the LXX.) stands for our human nature with its worldly surroundings and liability to temptation; so that when it is said, "The Word was made flesh," we have what is equivalent to, "The Word put on human nature." It is, therefore, the flesh and the spirit that are ever represented in conflict one with the other when men are in the throes of temptation. So it must be while life lasts; for it is characteristic of our position in the world that we possess soulish bodies (to employ the barbarous but expressive word of Dr. Candlish in his Life in a Risen Saviour, p. 182), and only on the morning of the resurrection will the body be such, suitable and suited to the new sphere of its existence: "It is sown a natural $σαρκίνον$ body, it is raised a spiritual $αρπαγωγικόν$ body" (1 Cor. xv. 44); "for," as Augustine says in his Enchiridion (c. xci.), "just as now the body is called animae (or, using the Greek term, as above, instead of the Latin, "soulish"), though it is a body and not a soul, so then the body shall be called spiritual, though it shall be a body, not a spirit. . . . No part of our nature shall be in discord with another; but as we shall be free from enemies without, so we shall not have ourselves for enemies within. " For further information on this most interesting subject, see Delitzsch, Biblical Psychology, ii. 4 ("The True and False Trichotomy"); Olshausen, Opuscula Theologica, iv. ("De Trichotomia"); and cc. 2, 17, and 18 of R. W. Evans' Ministry of the Body, where the subject is discussed with thoughtfulness and spiritual insight. This matter is also treated of in the introductory chapters of Schlegel's Philosophy of Life.

1 That light which illumines the soul, he tells us in his De Gen. ad Lit. (xii. 31), is God Himself, from whom all light cometh; and, though created in His image and likeness, when it tries to discover Him, palpitate inirmitate, et minus valet. In sec. 13, above, speaking of Platonism, he describes it as holding "that the soul of man, though it * bears witness of the Light,' yet itself ' is not that Light.' " In his De Civ. Dei, x. 2, he quotes from Plotinus (mentioned in note 2, sec. 13, above) in regard to the Platonic doctrine as to enlightenment from on high. He says: "Plotinus, commenting on Plato, repeatedly and strongly asserts that not even the soul, which they believe to be the soul of the world, derives its blessedness from any other source than we do, viz. from that Light which is distinct from it and created it, and by whose intelligible illumination it enjoys light in things intelligible. He also compares those spiritual things to the vast and conspicuous heavenly bodies, as if God were the sun, and the soul the moon; for they suppose that the moon derives its light from the sun. That great Platonist, therefore, says that the rational soul, or rather the intellectual soul, in which class he comprehends the souls of the blessed immortals who inhabit heaven, has no nature superior to it save God, the Creator of the world and the soul itself, and that these heavenly spirits was besprinkled, when, without all doubting, it cried out, "that the unchangeable was to be preferred before the changeable;" whp.np.ft also it knew that unchangeable, which, unless it had in some way known, it could have had no sure ground for preferring it to the changeable. And thus, with the flash of a trembling glance, it arrived at that which is. And then I saw Thy invisible things understood by the things that are made. I But I was not able to fix my gaze thereon; and my infirmity being beaten back, I was thrown again on my accustomed habits, carrying along with me naught but a loving memory thereof, and an appetite for what I had, as it were, smelt the odour of, but was not yet able to eat.

Chap, xviii. Jesus Christ, the Mediator, is the only way of safety.

24. And I sought a way of acquiring strength sufficient to enjoy Thee; but I found it not until I embraced that "Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus," 2
"who is over all, God blessed for ever," 3 calling unto me, and saying, "I am the way, the truth, and the life," 4 and mingling that food which I was unable to receive with our flesh. For
"the Word was made flesh," 5 that Thy wisdom, by which Thou createdst all things, might provide milk for our infancy. For I did not grasp my Lord Jesus, I, though humbled, grasped not the humble One; 6 nor did I know what lesson that infirmity of His would teach us. For Thy Word, the Eternal Truth, pre- eminent above the higher parts of Thy creation, derive their blessed life, and the light of truth, from the same source as ourselves, agreeing with the gospel where we read, 'There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. The same came for a witness, to bear witness of that Light, that through Him all might believe. He was not that Light, but that He might bear witness of the Light. That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world ' (John i. 6-9); a distinction which sufficiently proves that the rational or intellectual soul, such as John had, cannot be its own light, but needs to receive illumination from another, the true Light.
This John himself avows when he delivers his witness (ibid. 16): 'We have all received of His fulness.'" Comp. Tertullian, De Testim. Anim., and the note to iv. sec. 25, above, where other references to God's being the Father of Lights are given.

and was conformed to it. But somewhat later it was, I confess, that I learned how in the sentence, "The Word was made flesh," the Catholic truth can be distinguished from the false-detract from His honour, like Arius. Before his time men had written much on the divine and much on the human side of our Lord's nature. He endeavoured to show (see Dorner's Person of Christ, A. ii. 252, etc., Clark) in what the two natures united differed from human nature. He concluded that our Lord had no need of the human nature, and that its place was supplied by the divine nature, so that God "the Word," the body and the "\(^\wedge\wedge\)" constituted the being of the Saviour. Dr. Pusey quotes the following passages hereon: "The faithful who believes and confesses in the Mediator a real human, i.e. our nature, although God the "Word, taking it in a singular manner, sublimated it into the only Son of God, so that He who took it, and what He took, was one person in the Trinity. For, after man was assumed, there became not a quaternity but remained the Trinity, that assumption making in an ineffable way the truth of one person in God and man. Since we do not say that Christ is only God, as do the Manichaean heretics, nor only man, as the Photinian heretics, nor in such wise man as not to have anything which certainly belongs to human nature, whether the soul, or in the soul itself the rational mind, or the flesh not taken of the woman, but made of the Word, converted and changed into flesh, which three false and vain statements made three several divisions of the Apollinarian heretics; but we say that Christ is true God, born of God the Father, without any beginning of time, and also true man, born of a human mother in the fulness of time; and that His humanity, whereby He is inferior to the Father, does not derogate from His divinity, whereby He is equal to the Father"

(De Dono Persev. sec. ult.). "There was formerly a heresy its remnants perhaps still exist of some called Apollinarians. Some of them said that that man whom the Word took, when 'the Word was made flesh,' had not the human, i.e. rational (xyxv) mind, but was only a soul without human intelligence, but that the very Word of God was in that man instead of a mind. They were cast out, the Catholic faith rejected them, and they made a heresy. It was established in the Catholic faith that that man whom the wisdom of God took had nothing less than other men, with regard to the integrity of man's nature, but as to the excellency of His person, had more than other men. For other men may be said to be partakers of the Word of God, having the Word of God, but none of them can be called the Word of God, which He was called when it is said, 'The Word was made flesh'" (in Ps. xxix., Enarr. ii. sec. 2). "But when they reflected that, if their doctrine were true, they must confess that the only-begotten Son of God, the Wisdom and Word of the Father, by whom all things were made, is believed to have taken a sort of brute with the figure of a human body, they were dissatisfied with themselves; yet not so as to amend, and confess that the whole man was assumed by the wisdom of God, without any diminution of nature, but still more boldly denied to Him the soul itself, and everything of any worth in man, and said that He only took human flesh" (De 83, Div. Quies. qu. 80). Reference on the questions touched on in this note may be made to Neander's Church History, ii. 401, etc. (Clark); and Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, i. 270 (Clark).

26. But having then read those books of the Platonists, and being admonished by them to search for incorporeal truth, I saw Thy invisible things, understood by those things that are made; 4 and though repulsed, I perceived what that was, which through the darkness of my mind I was not allowed to contemplate, assured that Thou wert, and wert infinite, and yet not diffused in space finite or infinite; and that Thou truly art, who art the same ever, varying neither in part nor motion; and that all other things are from Thee, on this most sure ground alone, that they are. Of these things was I indeed assured, yet too weak to enjoy Thee. I chattered as one well skilled; but had I not sought Thy way in Christ our Saviour, I would have proved not skilful, but ready to perish. For now, filled with my punishment, I had begun to desire to seem wise; yet mourned I not, but rather was puffed up with knowledge. 6 For where was that charity building upon the

* Archbishop Trench's words on this sentence in the Confessions (Hulsean Lectures, lect. v. 1845) have a special interest in the present attitude of the Roman Church: "Doubtless there is a true idea of scriptural developments which has always been recognised, to which the great Fathers of the Church have set their seal; this, namely, that the Church, informed and quickened by the Spirit of God, more and more discovers what in Holy Scripture is given her; but not this, that she unfolds by an independent power anything further therefrom. She has always possessed what she now possesses of doctrine and truth, only not always with the same distinctness of consciousness. She has not added to her wealth, but she has become more and more aware of that wealth; her dowry has remained always the same, but that dowry was so rich and so rare, that only little by little she has counted over and taken stock and inventory of her jewels. She has consolidated her doctrine, compelled to this by the challenges and provocation of enemies, or induced to it by the growing sense of her own needs." Perhaps no one, to turn from the Church to individual men, has been more indebted than was Augustine to controversies with heretics for the evolvement of truth.

"foundation " of humility, " which is Jesus Christ " ? I Or, when would these books teach me it ? Upon these, therefore, I believe, it was Thy pleasure that I should fall before I studied Thy Scriptures, that it might be impressed on my memory how I was affected by them; and that afterwards when I was subdued by Thy books, and when my wounds were touched by Thy healing fingers, I might discern and distinguish what a difference there is between presumption and confession, between those who saw whither they were to go, yet saw not the way, and the way which leadeth not only to behold but to inhabit the blessed country. 2 For had I first been moulded in Thy Holy Scriptures, and hadst Thou, in the familiar use of them, grown sweet unto me, and had I afterwards fallen upon those volumes, they might perhaps have withdrawn me from the solid ground of piety; or, had I stood firm in that wholesome disposition which I had thence imbibed, I might have thought that it could have been attained by the study of those books alone.

1 Cor. iii. 11.

2 We have already quoted a passage from Augustine's Sermons (v. sec. 5, note 7, above), where Christ as God is described as the country we seek, while as man He is the way to go to it. The Fathers frequently point out in their controversies with the philosophers that it little profited that they should know of a goal to be attained unless they could learn the way to reach it. And, in accordance with this sentiment, Augustine says: " For it is as man that He is the Mediator and the Way. Since, if the way lieth between him who goes and the place whither he goes, there is hope of his reaching it; but if there be no way, or if he know not where it is, what boots it to know whither he should go ? " {De Civ. Dei, xi. 2). And again, in his Be Trin. iv. 15: " But of what use is it for the proud man, who, on that account, is ashamed to embark upon the ship of wood, to behold from afar his country beyond the sea ? Or how can it hurt the humble man not to behold it from so great a distance, when he is actually coming to it by that wood upon which the other disdains to be borne ? "

3 Literally, "The venerable pen of Thy Spirit" (venerabilem stilum Spiritm Tui); words which would seem to imply a belief on Augustine's part in a verbal inspiration of Scripture. That he gave Scripture the highest honour as God's inspired word is clear not only from this, but other passages in his works. It is difficulties vanished away, in which he at one time appeared to me to contradict himself, and the text of his discourse not to agree with the testimonies of the Law and the Prophets.

And the face of that pure speech appeared to me one and the same; and I learned to "rejoice with trembling." 1 So I commenced, and found that whatsoever truth I had there read was declared here with the recommendation of Thy grace; that he who sees may not so glory as if he had not received 2 not only that which he sees, but also that he can see (for what hath he which he hath not received ?); and that he may not only be admonished to see Thee, who art ever the same, but also may be healed, to hold Thee; and that he who from afar off is not able to see, may still walk on the way by which he may reach, behold, and possess Thee. For though a man " delight in the law of God after the inward man," 3 what shall he do with that other law in his members which warreth against the law of his mind, and bringeth him into captivity to the law of sin, which is in his members ? 4 For Thou art righteous, Lord, but we have sinned and committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, 6 and Thy hand is grown heavy upon us, and we are justly delivered over unto that ancient sinner, the governor of death; for he induced our will to be like his will, whereby he remained not in Thy truth. What shall "wretched man" do? "Who shall deliver him from the body of this death," but Thy grace only, "through Jesus Christ our Lord," 6 whom Thou hast begotten co-eternal, and createdst 7 in the beginning of Thy ways, equally clear, however, that he gave full recognition to the human element in the word. See De Cons. Evang. ii. 12, where both these aspects are plainly discoverable. Compare also ibid. c. 24.

7 Prov. viii. 22, as quoted from the old Italic version. It must not be understood to teach that the Lord is a creature. (1) Augustine, as indeed is implied in the Confessions above, understands the passage of the incarnation of Christ, and in his De Doct. Christ, i. 38, he distinctly so applies it: " For Christ . . . desiring to be Himself the Way to those who are just setting out, determined to take a fleshly body. Whence also that expression, ' The Lord created me in the beginning of His way,' that is, that those who wish to come might begin their journey in Him." Again, in a remarkable passage in his De Trin. i. 24, he makes a similar application of the words: "* According to the form of a servant, it is said, 'The Lord created me in the beginning of His ways.' Because, ac-in whom the Prince of this world found nothing worthy of death, 1 yet killed he Him, and the handwriting which was contrary to us was blotted out ? 2 This those writings contain not. Those pages contain not the expression of this piety, the tears of confession, Thy sacrifice, a troubled spirit, "a broken and a contrite heart," 3 the salvation of the people, the espoused city, 4 the earnest of the Holy Ghost, 5 the cup of our redemption. 6 No man sings there, Shall not my soul be subject unto God ? For of Him cometh my salvation, for He is my God and my salvation, my defender, I shall not be further moved. 7 No one there hears Him calling, " Come unto me all ye that labour." They scorn to learn of Him, because He is meek and lowly of heart; 8 for " Thou hast hid those things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." 9 For it is one thing, from the mountain's wooded summit to see the land of peace, 10 and not to find the way thither, in vain to attempt impassable ways, opposed and waylaid by fugitives and deserters, under their captain the "lion" 11 and the "dragon;" 12 and another to keep to the way that leads thither, guarded by the host of the heavenly general, where they rob not who have deserted the heavenly army, which they shun as torture. These things did in a wonderful manner sink into my bowels, when I read that cording to the form of God, he said, ' I am the Truth; ' and, according to the form of a servant, ' I am the Way.'" (2) Again, creasti is from the LXX. \xni, which is that version's rendering in this verse of the Hebrew ijjp. The Vulgale, more correctly translating from the Hebrew, gives possedit, thus corresponding to our English version, "The Lord 2>possessed me," etc. The LXX. would appear to have made an erroneous rendering here, for xrlga is generally in that version the equivalent for {03, "to create," while njp is usually rendered by xratfeai, " to possess," " to acquire." It is true that Gesenius supposes that in a few passages, and Prov. viii. 22 among them, fijp should be rendered t't "to create; " but these very passages our authorized version renders " to get," or " to possess;" and, as Dr. Tregelles observes, referring to M'Call on the Divine Sonship, "in all passages cited for that sense, 'to possess' appears to be the true meaning."

CHAP. XXI.] WHAT PLATOWISM HAD NOT. 173

"least of Thy apostles," 1 and had reflected upon Thy works, and feared greatly.
In giving an account, remarks Pusey, of this period to his friend and patron Romanianus, St. Augustine seems to have blended together this and the history of his completed conversion, which was also wrought in connection with words in the same apostle, but the account of which he uniformly suppresses, for fear, probably, of injuring the individual to whom he was writing (see on book ix. sec. 4, note, below). "Since that vehement flame which was about to seize me as yet was not, I thought that by which I was slowly kindled was the very greatest. When lo! certain books, when they had distilled a very few drops of most precious unguent on that tiny flame, it is past belief, Romanianus, past belief, and perhaps past what even you believe of me (and what could I say more?), nay, to myself also is it past belief, what a conflagration of myself they lighted. What ambition, what human show, what empty love of fame, or, lastly, what incitement or band of this mortal life could hold me then? I turned speedily and wholly back into myself. I cast but a glance, I confess, as one passing on, upon that religion which was implanted into us as boys, and interwoven with our very inmost selves; but she drew me unknowingly to herself. So then, stumbling, hurrying, hesitating, I seized the Apostle Paul; 'for never,' said I, 'could they have wrought such things, or lived as it is plain they did live, if their writings and arguments were opposed to this so high good.' I read the whole most intently and carefully. But then, never so little light having been shed thereon, such a countenance of wisdom gleamed upon me, that if I could exhibit it I say not to you, who ever hungeredst after her, though unknown but to your very adversary (see book vi. sec. 24, note, above), casting aside and abandoning whatever now stimulates him so keenly to whatsoever pleasures, he would, amazed, panting, enkindled, fly to her Beauty" (Con. BOOK EIGHTH.

HE FINALLY DESCRIBES THE THIRTY-SECOND YEAR OF HIS AGE, THE MOST MEMORABLE OF HIS WHOLE LIFE, IN WHICH, BEING INSTRUCTED BY SIMPLICIANUS CONCERNING THE CONVERSION OF OTHERS, AND THE MANNER OF ACTING, HE IS, AFTER A SEVERE STRUGGLE, RENEWED IN HIS WHOLE MIND, AND IS CONVERTED UNTO GOD.

Chap. i. He, now given to divine things, and yet entangled by the lusts of love, consults Simplicianus in reference to the renewing of his mind.

1. "MY GOD, let me with gratitude remember and confess unto Thee Thy mercies bestowed upon me. Let my bones be steeped in Thy love, and let them say, Who is like unto Thee, Lord? " Thou hast loosed my bonds, I will offer unto Thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving." 2 And how Thou hast loosed them I will declare; and all who worship Thee when they hear these things shall say: "Blessed be the Lord in heaven and earth, great and wonderful is His name." Thy words had stuck fast into my breast, and I was hedged round about by Thee on every side. 3 Of Thy eternal life I was now certain, although I had seen it "through a glass darkly." 4 Yet I no longer doubted that there was an incorruptible substance, from which was derived all other substance; nor did I now desire to be more certain of Thee, but more stedfast in Thee.

As for my temporal life, all things were uncertain, and my heart had to be purged from the old leaven. 5 The "Way," 6 the Saviour Himself, was pleasant unto me, but as yet I disliked to pass through its straightness. And Thou didst put into my mind, and it seemed good in my eyes, to go unto Simplicianus, 7 who appeared to me a faithful servant of Thine,

7 7 'Simplicianus' became a successor of the most blessed Ambrose, Bishop of the Church of Milan (Aug. Retract, ii. 1). To him St. Augustine wrote two books, DeDiverstsQucestionilus(Op. t. vi. p. 82 sq.), and calls him 'father' (ibid.), speaks of his 'fatherly affections from his most benevolent heart, not recent or sudden, and Thy grace shone in him. I had also heard that from his very youth he had lived most devoted to Thee. Now he had grown into years, and by reason of so great age, passed in such zealous following of Thy ways, he appeared to me likely to have gained much experience; and so in truth he had. Out of which experience I desired him to tell me (setting before him my griefs) which would be the most fitting way for one afflicted as I was to walk in Thy way.

2. For the Church I saw to be full, and one went this way, and another that. But it was displeasing to me that I led a secular life; yea, now that my passions had ceased to excite me as of old with hopes of honour and wealth, a very grievous burden it was to undergo so great a servitude. For, compared with Thy sweetness, and the beauty of Thy house, which I loved, 1 those things delighted me no longer. But still very tenaciously was I held by the love of women; nor did the apostle forbid me to marry, although he exhorted me to something better, especially wishing that all men were as he himself was. 2 But I, being weak, made choice of the more agreeable place, and because of this alone was tossed up and down in all beside, faint and languishing with withering cares, because in other matters I was compelled, though unwilling, to agree to a married life, to which I was given up and enthralled. I had heard from the mouth of truth that "there be eunuchs, which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake;" but, saith He,
"he that is able to receive it, let him receive it." 3 Vain, assuredly, are all men in whom the knowledge of God is not, and who could not, out of the good things which are seen, find out Him who is good. 4
But I was no longer in that vanity; I had surmounted it, and

St. Ambrose mentions his 'having traversed the whole world, for the sake of the faith, and of acquiring divine knowledge, and having given the whole period of this life to holy reading, night and day; that he had an acute mind, whereby he took in intellectual studies, and was in the habit of proving how far the books of philosophy were gone astray from the truth,' Ep. 65, sec. 5, p. 1052, ed. by the united testimony of Thy whole creation had found Thee, our Creator, 1 and Thy Word, God with Thee, and together with Thee and the Holy Ghost 2 one God, by whom Thou createdst all things. There is yet another kind of impious men, who " when they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful." 8 Into this also had I fallen; but Thy right hand held me up, 4 and bore me away, and Thou placedst me where I might recover. For Thou hast said unto man,
"Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom;" 5 and desire not to seem wise, 6 because, "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." 7 But I had now found the goodly pearl, 8 which, selling all that I had, 9 I ought to have bought; and I hesitated.

Chap. ii. The pious old man rejoices that he read Plato and the Scriptures, and tells him of the rhetorician Victorinus having been converted to the faith through the reading of the sacred books.

3. To Simplicianus then I went, the father of Ambrose 1 "- (at that time a bishop) in receiving Thy grace, and whom he truly loved as a father. To him I narrated the windings of my error. But when I mentioned to him that I had read certain books of the Platonists, which Victorinus, sometime Professor of Ehetoric at Eome (who died a Christian, as I had been told), had translated into Latin, he congratulated me that I had not fallen upon the writings of other philosophers, which were full of fallacies and deceit, "after the rudiments

10 Simplicianus succeeded Ambrose, 397 a.d. He has already been referred to, in the extract from De Civ. Dei, in note 2, p. 166, above, as "the old saint Simplicianus, afterwards Bishop of Milan." In Ep. 37, Augustine addresses him as "his father, most worthy of being cherished with respect and sincere affection."

When Simplicianus is spoken of above as "the father of Ambrose in receiving Thy grace," reference is doubtless made to his having been instrumental in his conversion he having "begotten" him "through the gospel" (1 Cor. iv. 15). Ambrose, when writing to him (Ep. 65), concludes, "Vale, et nos parentis affectu dilige, ut facis."

of the world," 1 whereas they, 2 in many ways, led to the belief in God and His word. 3 Then, to exhort me to the humility of Christ, 4 hidden from the wise, and revealed to little ones, 5 he spoke of Victorinus himself, 6 whom, whilst he was at Eome, he had known very intimately; and of him he related that about which I will not be silent. For it contains great praise of Thy grace, which ought to be confessed unto Thee, how that most learned old man, highly skilled in all the liberal sciences, who had read, criticised, and explained so many works of the philosophers; the teacher of so many noble senators; who also, as a mark of his excellent discharge of his duties, had (which men of this world esteem a great honour) both merited and obtained a statue in the Soman Forum, he, even to that age a worshipper of idols, and a participator in

1 Col. ii. 8. 2 i.e. the Platonists.

3 In like manner Augustine, in his De Civ. Dei (viii. 5), says: "No philosophers come nearer to us than the Platonists;" and elsewhere, in the same book, he speaks, in exalted terms, of their superiority to other philosophers.

When he speaks of the Platonists, he means the Neo-Platonists, from whom he conceived that he could best derive a knowledge of Plato, who had, by pursuing the Socratic method in concealing his opinions, rendered it difficult "to discover clearly what he himself thought on various matters, any more than it is to discover what were the real opinions of Socrates " (ibid. sec. 4). Whether Plato himself had or not knowledge of the revelation contained in the Old Testament Scriptures, as Augustine supposed (De Civ. Dei, viii. 11, 12), it is clear that the later Platonists were considerably affected by Judaic ideas, even as the philosophizing Jews were indebted to Platonism. This view has been embodied in the proverb frequently found in the Fathers, Latin as well as Greek, "H nxiruy <pi\en\i, H #<x<uv vXaruyiZii. Archer Butler, in the fourth of his Lectures on Ancient Philosophy, treats of the vitality of Plato's teaching and the causes of its influence, and shows how in certain points there is a harmony between his ideas and the precepts of the gospel. On the difficulty of unravelling the subtleties of the Platonic philosophy, see Burton's Bampton Lectures (lect. 3).

"Victorinus, by birth an African, taught rhetoric at Rome under Constantius, and in extreme old age, giving himself up to the faith of Christ, wrote some books against Alius, dialectically [and so] very obscure, which are not understood but by the learned, and a commentary on the Apostle " [PaulJ (Jerome, De Viris III. c. 101). It is of the same, probably, that Gennadius speaks (De Viris 111. c. 60), "that he commented in a Christian and pious strain, but inasmuch as he was a man taken up with secular literature, and not trained in the Divine Scriptures by any teacher, he produced what was comparatively of little weight." 4. O Lord, Lord, who hast bowed the heavens and come down, touched the mountains and they did smoke, 2 by what means didst Thou convey Thyself into that bosom? He used to read, as Simplicianus said, the Holy Scripture, most studiously sought after and searched into all the Christian writings, and said to Simplicianus, not openly, but secretly, and as a friend,

"Know thou that I am a Christian." To which he replied, *I will not believe it, nor will I rank you among the Christians unless I see you in the Church of Christ." Whereupon he replied derisively, "Is it then the walls that make Christians?"

And this he often said, that he already was a Christian; and Simplicianus making the same answer, the conceit of the "walls" was by the other as often renewed. For he was fearful of offending his friends, proud demon-worshippers, from the height of whose Babylonian dignity, as from cedars of Lebanon which had not yet been broken by the Lord, 3 he thought a storm of enmity would descend upon him. But alter that, from reading and inquiry, he had derived strength, and feared lest he should be denied by Christ before the holy angels if he now was afraid to confess Him before men, 4 and appeared to himself guilty of a great fault in being ashamed of the sacraments 5 of the humility of Thy word, and not being ashamed of the sacrilegious rites of those proud demons, whose pride he had imitated and their rites adopted, he became bold-faced against vanity, and shame-faced toward the truth, and suddenly and unexpectedly said to Simplicianus, as he himself informed me, "Let us go to the church; I wish to be made a Christian." But he, not containing himself for joy, accompanied him. And having been admitted to the first sacraments of instruction, 1 he not long after gave in hidden meaning conveyed therein, which could only be appreciated by a Christian. The Fathers sometimes speak of confirmation as a sacrament, because the chrism signified the grace of the Holy Ghost; and the imposition of hands was not merely a bare sign, but the form by which it was conveyed. See Bingham, book xii. c. 1, sec. 4. Yet at the same time they continually speak of two great sacraments of the Christian Church "(Palmer's Origines Liturgicce, vol. ii. c. 6, sec. 1, p. 201).

That is, he became a catechumen. In addition to the information on this subject, already given in the note to book vi. sec. 2, above, the following references to it may prove instructive. (1) Justin Martyr, describing the manner of receiving converts into the Church in his day, says (Apol. i. 61): "As many as are persuaded and believe that what we teach and say is true, and undertake to be able to live accordingly, are instructed to pray, and to entreat God with fasting for the remission of their sins that are past, we praying and fasting with them. Then they are brought by us where there is water, and are regenerated in the name manner in which we were ourselves regenerated. And this washing is called illumination, because they who learn these things are illuminated in their understandings." And again (ibid. 65): "We, after we have thus washed him who has been convinced and has assented to our teaching, bring him to the place where those who are called brethren are assembled, in order that we may offer hearty prayers, in common for ourselves and for the baptized [illuminated] person, and for all others in every place. . . . Having ended the prayers, we salute one another with a kiss. There is then brought to the president of the brethren bread, and a cup of wine mixed with water; and he, taking them, gives praise and glory to the Father of the universe, through the name of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. . . . And when the president has given thanks, and all the people have expressed their assent, those who are called by us deacons give to each of those present, to partake of, the bread and wine mixed with water over which the thanksgiving was pronounced, and to those who are absent they carry away a portion." And once more (ibid. 66):

"This food is called among us ~Ebx afwr'u* [the Eucharist], of which no one is allowed to partake but the man who believes that the things which we teach are true, and who has been washed with the washing that is for the remission of sins, and unto regeneration, and who is so living as Christ has enjoined." (2) In "Watts' translation, we have the following note on this episode in our text: "Here be divers particulars of the primitive fashion, in this story of Victorinus. First, being converted, he was to take some well-known Christian (who was to be his godfather) to go with him to the bishop, who, upon notice of it, admitted him a his name, that he might be regenerated by baptism,--Borne marvelling, and the Church rejoicing. The proud saw, and were enraged; they gnashed with their teeth, and melted away! x But the Lord God was the hope of Thy servant, and He regarded not vanities and lying madness. 2

5. Finally, when the hour arrived for him to make profession of his faith (which at Eome they who are about to approach Thy grace are wont to deliver 3 from an elevated place, in view of the faithful people, in a set form of words learnt by heart), 4 the presbyters, he said, offered Victorinus to catechumens, and gave him those six points of catechistical doctrine mentioned Heb. vi. 1, 2. When the time of baptism drew near, the young Christian came to give in his heathen name, which was presently registered, submitting himself to examination. On the eve, was he, in a set form, first, to renounce the devil, and to pronounce, I confess to Thee, Christ, repeating the Creed with it, in the form here recorded. The time for giving in their names must be within the two first weeks in Lent; and the solemn day to renounce upon was Maundy Thursday. So bids the Council of Laodicea (Can. 45 and 46).” The renunciation adverted to by Watts in the above passage may be traced to an early period in the writings of the Fathers. It is mentioned by Tertullian, Ambrose, and Jerome; and “in the fourth century,” says Palmer (Origines Liturgicce, c. 5, sec. 2, where the authorities will be found), "the renunciation was made with great solemnity. Cyril of Jerusalem, speaking to those who had been recently baptized, said, 'First, you have entered into the vestibule of the baptistry, and, standing towards the west, you have heard, and been commanded, and stretch forth your hands, and renounce Satan as if he were present.' This rite of turning to the west at the renunciation of Satan is also spoken of by Jerome, Gregory, Nazianzen, and Ambrose; and it was sometimes performed with exsufflations and other external signs of enmity to Satan, and rejection of him and his works. To the present day these customs remain in the patriarchate of Constantinople, where the candidates for baptism turn to the west to renounce Satan, stretching forth their hands, and using an exsufflation as a sign of enmity against him. And the Monophysites of Antioch and Jerusalem, Alexandria and Armenia, also retain the custom of renouncing Satan with faces turned to the west."

3 Literally, "give back," reddere.

* Anciently, as Palmer has noted in the introduction to his Origines Liturgicce, the liturgies of the various churches were learnt by heart. They probably began to be committed to writing about Augustine's day. The reference, however, in this place, is to the Apostles' Creed, which, Dr. Pusey in a note remarks, was delivered orally to the catechumens to commit to memory, and by them delivered back, i.e. publicly repeated before they were baptized. "The symbol [creed] bearing hallowed testimony, which ye have together received, and are this day severally to give back [reddidistis], are the words in which the faith of our mother the Church is solidly constructed on a stable foundation, which is Christ make his profession more privately, as the custom was to do to those who were likely, through bashfulness, to be afraid; but he chose rather to profess his salvation in the presence of the holy assembly. For it was not salvation that he taught in rhetoric, and yet he had publicly professed that. How much less, therefore, ought he, when pronouncing Thy word, to dread Thy meek flock, who, in the delivery of his own words, had not feared the mad multitudes! So, then, when he ascended to make his profession, all, as they recognised him, whispered his name one to the other, with a voice of congratulation. And who was there amongst them that did not the Lord. ' For other foundation can no man lay,' etc. Ye have received them, and given back [reddidistis] what ye ought to retain in heart and mind, what ye should repeat in your beds, think on in the streets, and forget not in your meals, and while sleeping in body, in heart watch therein. For this is the faith, and the rule of salvation, that 'We believe in God, the Father Almighty.,” etc. (Aug. Serm. 215, in Redditione Symboli). " On the Sabbath day [Saturday], when we shall keep a vigil through the mercy of God, ye will give back [reddituri] not the [Lord's] Prayer, but the Creed" (Serin. 58, sec. ult.). "What ye have briefly heard, ye ought not only to believe, but to commit to memory in so many words, and utter with your mouth" (Serm. 214, in Tradit. Symb. 3, sec. 2). "Nor, in order to retain the very words of the Creed, ought ye any wise to write it, but to learn it thoroughly by hearing, nor, when ye have learnt it, ought ye to write it, but always to keep and refresh it in your memories. 'This is my covenant, which I will make with them after those days, ' saith the Lord; ' I will place my law in their minds, and in their hearts will I write it.' To convey this, the Creed is learnt by hearing, and not written on tables or any other substance, but on the heart" (Serm. 212, sec. 2). See the Roman Liturgy (Assem. Cod. Liturg. t. i. p. 11 sq., 16), and the Gothic and Gallican (pp. 30 sq., 38 sq., 40 sq., etc.). "The renunciation of Satan," to quote once more from Palmer's Origines (c. 5, sec. 3), " was always followed by a profession of faith in Christ, as it is now in the English ritual. . . . The promise of obedience and faith in Christ was made by the catechumens and sponsors, with their faces turned towards the east, as we learn from Cyril of Jerusalem and many other writers. Tertullian speaks of the profession of faith made at baptism, in the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and in the Church. Cyprian mentions the interrogation, ' Dost thou believe in eternal life, and remission of sins through the Holy Church ? ' Eusebius and many other Fathers also speak of the profession of faith made at this time; and it is especially noted in the Apostolical Constitutions, which were written in the East at the end of the third or beginning of the fourth century. The profession of faith in the Eastern churches has generally been made by the sponsor, or the person to be baptized, not in the form of answers to questions, but by repeating the Creed after the priest. In the Western churches, the immemorial custom has been, for the priest to interrogate the candidate for baptism, or his sponsor, on the principal articles of the Christian faith."

know him ? And there ran a low murmur through the mouths of all the rejoicing multitude, " Victorinus ! Victorinus!" Sudden was the burst of exultation at the sight of him; and suddenly were they hushed, that they might hear him. He pronounced the true faith with an excellent boldness, and all desired to take him to their very heart yea, by their love and joy they took him thither; such were the hands with which they took him.
Chap. hi. That God and the angels rejoice more on the return of one sinner than of many just persons.

6. Good God, what passed in man to make him rejoice more at the salvation of a soul despairs of, and delivered from greater danger, than if there had always been hope of him, or the danger had been less? For so Thou also, merciful Father, dost; joy over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons that need no repentance."

And with much joyfulness do we hear, whenever we hear, how the lost sheep is brought home again on the Shepherd's shoulders, while the angels rejoice, and the drachma is restored to Thy treasury, the neighbours rejoicing with the woman who found it; and the joy of the solemn service of Thy house constraineth to tears, when in Thy house it is read of Thy younger son that he "was dead, and is alive again, and was lost, and is found." 2 For Thou rejoicest both in us and in Thy angels, holy through holy charity. For Thou art ever the same; for all things which abide neither the same nor for ever, Thou ever knowest after the same manner.

7. What, then, passes in the soul when it more delights at finding or having restored to it the thing it loves than if it had always possessed them? Yea, and other things bear witness hereunto; and all things are full of witnesses, crying out, "So it is." The victorious commander triumpheth; yet he would not have conquered had he not fought, and the greater the peril of the battle, the more the rejoicing of the triumph. The storm tosses the voyagers, threatens shipwreck, and every one waxes pale at the approach of death; but sky and sea grow calm, and they rejoice much, as they feared much. A loved one is sick, and his pulse indicates danger; all who desire his safety are at once sick at heart: he recovers, though not able as yet to walk with his former strength, and there is such joy as was not before when he walked sound and strong. Yea, the very pleasures of human life not those only which rush upon us unexpectedly, and against our wills, but those that are voluntary and designed do men obtain by difficulties. There is no pleasure at all in eating and drinking unless the pains of hunger and thirst go before. And drunkards eat certain salt meats with the view of creatine a troublesome heat, which the drink allaying causes pleasure. It is also the custom that the affianced bride should not immediately be given up, that the husband may not less esteem her whom, as betrothed, he longed not for. 1

8. This law obtains in base and accursed joy; in that joy also which is permitted and lawful; in the sincerity of honest friendship; and in Him who was dead, and lived again, had been lost, and was found. 2 The greater joy is everywhere preceded by the greater pain. What meaneth this, Lord my God, when Thou art an everlasting joy unto Thine own self, and some things about Thee are ever rejoicing in Thee? 3 What meaneth this, that this portion of things thus ebbs and flows, alternately offended and reconciled? Is this the fashion of them, and is this all Thou hast allotted to them, whereas from the highest heaven to the lowest earth, from the beginning of the world to its end, from the angel to the worm, from the first movement unto the last, Thou settest each in its right place, and appointest each its proper seasons, everything good after its kind? Woe is me! How high art Thou in the highest, and how deep in the deepest! Thou withdrawest no whither, and scarcely do we return to Thee.

Chap. iv. He shows by the example of Victorinus that there is more joy in the conversion of nobles.

9. Haste, Lord, and act; stir us up, and call us back; inflame us, and draw us to Thee; stir us up, and grow sweet unto us; let us now love Thee, let us "run after Thee." 4 Do not many men, out of a deeper hell of blindness than that of Victorinus, return unto Thee, and approach, and are enlightened, receiving that light, which they that receive, receive power from Thee to become Thy sons? 1 But if they be less known among the people, even they that know them joy less for them. For when many rejoice together, the joy of each one is the fuller, in that they are incited and inflamed by one another. Again, because those that are known to many influence many towards salvation, and take the lead with many to follow them. And, therefore, do they also who preceded them much rejoice in regard to them, because they rejoice not in them alone.

May it be averted that in Thy tabernacle the persons of the rich should be accepted before the poor, or the noble before the ignoble; since rather "Thou hast chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hast Thou chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to naught things that are." 2 And yet, even that "least of the apostles," 3 by whose tongue Thou soundest out these words, when Paulus the proconsul 4 his pride overcome by the apostle's warfare was made to pass under the easy yoke 5 of Thy Christ, and became a provincial of the great King, he also, instead of Saul, his former name, desired to be called Paul, 6 in testimony of so great a victory. For the enemy is more overcome in one of whom he hath more hold, and by whom he hath hold of more. But the proud hath he more hold of by reason of their nobility; and by them of more,

Origen mentions the same opinion (which is indeed suggested by the relation in the Acts), but thinks that the apostle had originally two names (Prcef. in Comm. in Ep. ad Rom.), which, as a Roman, may very well have been, and yet that he made use of his Roman name Paul first in connection with the conversion of the proconsul; Chrysostom says that it was doubtless changed at the command of God, which is to be supposed, but still may have been at this time." by reason of their authority. 1 By how much the more welcome, then, was the heart of Victorinus esteemed, which the devil had held as an unassailable retreat, and the tongue of Victorinus, with which mighty and cutting weapon he had slain many; so much the more abundantly should Thy sons rejoice, seeing that our King hath bound the strong man, 2 and they saw his vessels taken from him and cleansed, 3 and made meet for Thy honour, and become serviceable for the Lord unto every good work. 4

Chap. v. OJ the causes which alienate us from God.

10. But when that man of Thine, Simplicianus, related this to me about Victorinus, I burned to imitate him; and it was for this end he had related it. But when he had added this also, that in the time of the Emperor Julian, there was a law made by which Christians were forbidden to teach grammar and oratory, 5 and he, in obedience to this

1 " Satan makes choice of persons of place and power. These are either in the commonwealth or church. If he can, he will secure the throne and the pulpit, as the two forts that command the whole line. ... A prince or a ruler may stand for a thousand; therefore saith Paul to Elymas, when he would have turned the deputy from the faith, ' full of all subtilty, thou child of the devil! ' (Acts xiii. 10). As if he had said, You have learned this of your father the devil, to haunt the courts of princes, wind into the favour of great ones.
There is a double policy Satan hath in gaining such to his side: (a) None have such advantage to draw others to their way. Corrupt the captain, and it is hard if he bring not off his troop with him. When the princes men of renown in their tribes stood up with Korah, presently a multitude are drawn into the conspiracy (Num. xvi. 2, 19). Let Jeroboam set up idolatry, and Israel is soon in a snare. It is said [that] the people willingly walked after his commandment (Hos. v. 11). (b) Should the sin stay at court, and the infection go no further, yet the sin of such a one, though a good man, may cost a whole kingdom dear. 'Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel' (1 Chron. xxi. 1). He owed Israel a spite, and he pays them home in their king's sin, which dropped in a fearful plague upon their heads. "Gurnall,

6 During the reign of Constantius, laws of a persecuting character were enacted against Paganism, which led multitudes nominally to adopt the Christian faith. When Julian the Apostate came to the throne, he took steps immediately to reinstate Paganism in all its ancient splendour. His court was filled with Platonic philosophers and diviners, and he sacrificed daily to the gods. But, instead of imitating the example of his predecessor, and enacting laws against law, chose rather to abandon the wordy school than Thy word, by which Thou makest eloquent the tongues of the dumb 1, he appeared to me not more brave than happy, in having thus discovered an opportunity of waiting on Thee only, which thing I was sighing for, thus bound, not with the irons of another, but my own iron will. My will was the enemy master of, and thence had made a chain for me and bound me. Because of a perverse will was lust made; and lust indulged in became custom; and custom not resisted became necessity. By which links, as it were, joined together (whence I term it a "chain"), did a hard bondage hold me enthralled 2

the Christians, he endeavoured by subtlety to destroy their faith. In addition to the measures mentioned by Augustine above, he endeavoured to foment divisions in the Church by recalling the banished Donatists, and stimulating them to disseminate their doctrines, and he himself wrote treatises against it. In order, if possible, to counteract the influence of Christianity, he instructed his priests to imitate the Christians in their relief of the poor and care for the sick. But while in every way enacting measures of disability against the Christians, he showed great favour to the Jews, and with the view of confuting the predictions of Christ, went a far as to encourage them to rebuild the Temple.

2 There would appear to be a law at work in the moral and spiritual worlds similar to that of gravitation in the natural, which "acts inversely as the square of the distance." As we are more affected, for example, by events that have taken place near us either in time or place, than by those which are more remote, so in spiritual things, the monitions of conscience would seem to become feeble with far greater rapidity than the continuance of our resistance would lead us to expect, while the power of sin, in like proportion, becomes strong.

When tempted, men see not the end from the beginning. The allurement, however, which at first is but as a gossamer thread, is soon felt to have the strength of a cable. "Evil men and seducers wax worse and worse" (2 Tim. iii. 13), and when it is too late they learn that the embrace of the siren is but the prelude to destruction. "Thus," as Gurnall has it (The Christian in Complete Armour, vol. i. part 2), "Satan leads poor creatures down into the depths of sin by winding stairs, that let them not see the bottom whither they are going.

. . . Many who at this day lie in open profaneness, never thought they should have rolled so far from their modest beginnings. Christians, give not place to Satan, no, not an inch, in his first motions. He that is a beggar and a modest one without doors, will command the house if let in. Yield at first, and thou givest away thy strength to resist him in the rest; when the hem is worn, the whole garment will ravel out, if it be not mended by timely repentance."

See Midler, Lehre von der Siünde, book v., where the beginnings and alarming progress of evil in the soul are graphically described. See ix. sec. 18, note, below.

CHAP. V. THE STRENGTH OF SIN. 187

But that new will which had begun to develope in me, freely to worship Thee, and to wish to enjoy Thee, God, the only sure enjoyment, was not able as yet to overcome my former wilfulness, made strong by long indulgence. Thus did my two wills, one old and the other new, one carnal, the other spiritual, contend within me; and by their discord they unstrung my soul.

11. Thus came I to understand, from my own experience, what I had read, how that "the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh." *I verily lusted both ways; 2 yet more in that which I approved in myself, than in that which I disapproved in myself. For in this last it was now rather not "I," 3 because in much I rather suffered against my will than did it willingly. And yet it was through me that custom became more combative against me, because I had come willingly whither I willed not. And who, then, can with any justice speak against it, when just punishment follows the sinner? 4 Nor had I now any longer my wonted excuse, that as yet I hesitated to be above the world and serve Thee, because my perception of the truth was uncertain; for now it was certain. But I, still bound to the earth, refused to be Thy soldier; and was as much afraid of being freed from all embarrassments, as we ought to fear to be embarrassed.

12. Thus with the baggage of the world was I sweetly burdened, as when in slumber; and the thoughts wherein I meditated upon Thee were like unto the efforts of those desiring to awake, who, still overpowered with a heavy drowsiness, are again steeped therein. And as no one desires to sleep always, and in the sober judgment of all waking is better, yet does a man generally deer to shake off drowsiness, when there is a heavy lethargy in all his limbs, and, though displeased, yet even after it is time to rise with pleasure yields to it, so was I assured that it were much better for me to give up myself to Thy charity, than to yield myself to my own cupidily; but the former course satisfied and vanquished me, the latter pleased me and fettered me. 1 Nor had I aught to answer Thee calling to me, " Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." 2

And to Thee showing me on every side, that what Thou saidst was true, I, convicted by the truth, had nothing at all to reply, but the drawling and drowsy words: " Presently, lo, presently;" "Leave me a little while." But "presently, presently," had no present; and my " leave me a little while " went on for a long while. 3 In vain did I " delight in Thy law after the inner man," when " another law in my members warred against the law of my mind, and brought me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members." For the law of sin is the violence of custom, whereby the mind is drawn and held, even against its will deserving to be so held in that it so willingly falls into it. " O wretched man that I am ! who shall deliver me from the body of this death "
but Thy grace only, through Jesus Christ our Lord ? 4

1 Mud placebat et vincebat; hoc libebat el vinciebat. Watts renders freely, "But notwithstanding that former course pleased and overcame my reason, yet did this latter tickle and enthral my senses. "

2 Eph. v. 14.

3 As Bishop Wilberforce, eloquently describing this condition of mind, says, in his sermon on The Almost Christian, " New, strange wishes were rising in Ms heart. The Mighty One was brooding over its currents, was stirring up its tides, was fain to overrule their troubled flow to arise in open splendour on his eyes; to glorify his life with His own blessed presence. And he himself was evidently conscious of the struggle; he was almost won; he was drawn towards that mysterious birth, and he well-nigh yielded. He even knew what was passing within his soul; he could appreciate something of its importance, of the living value of that moment. If that conflict was indeed visible to higher powers around him; if they who longed to keep him in the kingdom of darkness, and they who were ready to rejoice at his repentance if they could see the inner waters of that troubled heart, as they surged and eddied underneath these mighty influences, how must they have waited for the doubtful choice! how would they strain their observation to see if that almost should turn into an altogether, or die away again, and leave his heart harder than it had been before!"

4 Rom. vii. 22-24. This difficilis et periculosus locus (Serm. cliv. 1) he interprets differently at different periods of his life. In this place, as elsewhere in his writings, he makes the passage refer (according to the general interpretation in the Church up to that time) to man convinced of sin under the influence of the law, but not under grace. In his Retractations, however (i. 23, sec. 1), he points out that he had found reason to interpret the passage not of man convinced some who imitated him,

13. And how, then, Thou didst deliver me out of the bonds of carnal desire, wherewith I was most firmly fettered, and out of the drudgery of worldly business, will I now declare and confess unto Thy name, " O Lord, my strength and my Kedeemer." 1 Amid increasing anxiety, I was transacting my usual affairs, and daily sighing unto Thee. I resorted as frequently to Thy church as the business, under the burden of which I groaned, left me free to do. Alypius was with me, being after the third sitting disengaged from his legal occupation, and awaiting further opportunity of selling his counsel, as I was wont to sell the power of speaking, if it can be supplied by teaching. But Nebridius had, on account of our friendship, consented to teach under Verecundus, a citizen and a grammarian of Milan, and a very intimate friend of us all; who vehemently desired, and by the right of friendship demanded from our company, the faithful aid he greatly stood in need of. Nebridius, then, was not drawn to this by any desire of gain (for he could have made much more of his learning had he been so inclined), but, as a most sweet and kindly friend, he would not be wanting in an office of friendliness, and slight our request. But in this he acted very discreetly, taking care not to become known to those personages whom the world esteems great; thus avoiding distraction of mind, which he desired to have free and at leisure as many hours as possible, to search, or read, or hear something concerning wisdom.

14. Upon a certain day, then, Nebridius being away (why, I do not remember), lo, there came to the house to see Alypius and me, Pontitianus, a countryman of ours, in so far of sin, but of man renewed and regenerated in Christ Jesus. This is the view constantly taken in his anti-Pelagian writings, which were published subsequently to the date of his Confessions; and indeed this change in interpretation probably arose from the pressure of the Pelagian controversy (see Con. Duas Ep. Pel. i. 10, sees. 18 and 22), and the fear lest the old view should too much favour the heretics, and their exaltation of the powers of the natural man to the disparagement of the influence of the grace of God.

as he was an African, who held high office in the emperor's court. What he wanted with us I know not, but we sat down to talk together, and it fell out that upon a table before us, used for games, he noticed a book; he took it up, opened it, and, contrary to his expectation, found it to be the Apostle Paul, for he imagined it to be one of those books which I was wearing myself out in teaching. At this he looked up at me smilingly, and expressed his delight and wonder that he had so unexpectedly found this book, and this only, before my eyes. For he was both a Christian and baptized, and often prostrated himself before Thee our God in the church, in constant and daily prayers. When, then, I had told him that I bestowed much pains upon these writings, a conversation ensued on his speaking of Antony, 1 the Egyptian monk, whose

1 It may be well here to say a few words in regard to Monachism and Antony's relation to it: (1) There is much in the later Platonism, with its austerities and bodily mortifications (see vii. sec. 13, note 2, above), which is in common with the asceticism of the early Church. The Therapeutse of Philo, indeed, of whom there were numbers in the neighbourhood of Alexandria in the first century, may be considered as the natural forerunners of the Egyptian monks. (2) Monachism, according to Sozomen (i. 12), had its origin in a desire to escape persecution by retirement into the wilderness. It is probable, however, that, as in the case of Paul the hermit of Thebais, the desire for freedom from the cares of life, so that by contemplation and mortification of the body, the xiyō; or inner reason (which was held to be an emanation of God) might be purified, had as much to do with the hermit life as a fear of persecution. Mosheim, indeed (Ecc. Hist. i. part 2, c. 3), supposes Paul to have been influenced entirely by these Platonic notions. (3) Antony was born in the district of Thebes, a.d. 251, and visited Paul in the Egyptian desert a little before his death. To Antony is the world indebted for establishing communities of monks, as distinguished from the solitary asceticism of Paul; he therefore is rightly viewed as the founder of Monachism. He appears to have known little more than how to speak his native Coptic, yet during his long life (said to have been 100 years) he by his fervent enthusiasm made for himself a name little inferior to that of the "king of men," Athanasius, whom in the time of the Arian troubles he steadfastly supported, and by whom his life has been handed down to us. Augustine, in his De Doctr. Christ. (Prol.) sec. 4), speaks of him as "a just and holy man, who, not being able to read himself, is said to have committed the Scriptures to memory through hearing them read by others, and by dint of wise meditation to have arrived at a thorough understanding of them." (4) According to Sozomen (iii. 14), monasteries had not been established in Europe a.d. 340. They were, Baronius tells us, introduced into Rome about that date by Athanasius, during a visit to that city.

Athanasius mentions "ascetics" as dwelling at Rome a.d. 355. Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, Martin, Bishop of Tours, and Jerome were enthusiastic supporters of name was in high repute among Thy servants, though up to that time not familiar to us. When he came to know this, he lingered on that topic, imparting to us a knowledge of this man so eminent, and marveling at our ignorance. But we were amazed, hearing Thy wonderful works most fully manifested in times so recent, and almost in our own, wrought in the true faith and the Catholic Church. We all wondered we, that they were so great, and he, that we had never heard of them.

15. From this his conversation turned to the companies in the monasteries, and their manners so fragrant unto Thee, and of the fruitful deserts of the wilderness, of which we knew nothing. And there was a monastery at Milan * full of good brethren, without the walls of the city, under the fostering care of Ambrose, and we were ignorant of it. He went on with his relation, and we listened intently and in silence. He then related to us how on a certain afternoon, at Triers, when the system. (5) Monachism in Europe presented more of its practical and less of its contemplative side, than in its cradle in the East. An example of how the monks of the East did work for the good of others is seen in the instance of the monks of Pachomius; still in this respect, as in matters of doctrine, the West has generally shown itself more practical than the East. Probably climate and the style of living consequent thereon have much to do with this. Sulpicius Severus (diaL. i. 2, De Vita Martini) may be taken to give a quaint illustration of this, when he makes one of his characters say, as he hears of the mode of living

'of the Eastern monks, that their diet was only suited to angels. However mistaken we may think the monkish systems to be, it cannot be concealed that in the days of anarchy and semi-barbarism they were oftentimes centres of civilisation.

, Certainly in its originating idea of meditative seclusion, there is much that is worthy of commendation; for, as Farindon has it (Works, iv. 130), "This has been the practice not only of holy men, but of heathen men. Thus did Tully, and Antony, and Crassus make way to that honour and renown which they afterwards purchased in eloquence (Cicero, De Officiis, ii. 13, viii. 7); thus did they pass a solitudine in scholas, a scholis in forum, 'from their secret retirement into the schools, and from the schools into the pleading-place.'

1 Augustine, when comparing Christian with Manichsean asceticism, says in his De Mor. Eccl. Cath. (sec. 70), "I saw at Milan a lodging-house of saints, in number not a few, presided over by one presbyter, a man of great excellence and learning." In the previous note we have given the generally received opinion, that the first monastery in Europe was established at Pome. It may be mentioned here that Muratori maintains that the institution was transplanted from the East first to Milan; others contend that the first European society was at Aquileia.

the emperor was taken up with seeing the Circensian games, 1 he and three others, his comrades, went out for a walk in the gardens close to the city walls, and there, as they chanced to walk two and two, one strolled away with him, while the other two went by themselves; and these, in their rambling, came upon a certain cottage inhabited by some of Thy servants, "poor in spirit," of whom "is the kingdom of heaven," 2 where they found a book in which was written the life of Antony.

This one of them began to read, marvel at, and be inflamed by it; and in the reading, to meditate on embracing such a life, and giving up his worldly employments to serve Thee. And these were of the body called "Agents for Public Affairs." s Then, suddenly being overwhelmed with a holy love and a sober sense of shame, in anger with himself, he cast his eyes upon his friend, exclaiming, "Tell me, I entreat thee, what end we are striving for by all these labours of ours. What is our aim? What is our motive in doing service? Can our hopes in court rise higher than to be ministers of the emperor? And in such a position, what is

2 Matt. v. 3. Roman commentators are ever ready to use this text of Scripture as an argument in favour of monastic poverty, and some may feel disposed from its context to imagine such an interpretation to be implied in this place. This, however, can hardly be so. Augustine constantly points out in his sermons, etc. in what the poverty that is pleasing to God consists. "Pauper Dei," he says (in Ps. cxxxi. 15), "in animo est, non in sacculo;" and his interpretation of this passage in his Exposition of the Sermon on the Mount (i. 3) is entirely opposed to the Roman view. We there read: "The poor in spirit are rightly Understood here as meaning the humble and God-fearing, i.e. those who have not a spirit which puffeth up. Nor ought blessedness to begin at any other point whatever, if indeed it is to reach the highest wisdom. 'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom' (Ps. cxi. 10); whereas, on the other hand also, 'pride is entitled 'the beginning of all sin' (Ecclus. x. 13). Let the proud, therefore, seek after and love the kingdoms of the earth; but 'blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' "
"Agentes in rebus. There was a society of them still about the court. Their militia or employments were to gather in the emperor's tributes; to fetch in offenders; to do Palat'ima obsequia, offices of court, provide corn, etc., ride on errands like messengers of the chamber, lie abroad as spies and intelligencers. They were often preferred to places of magistracy in the provinces; such were called Principes or Magistriani. St. Hierome upon Abdias, c. 1, calls them messengers. They succeeded the Frumentarii, between which two and the Curiosi and the SpeʃJatores there was not much difference." W. W.

there not brittle, and fraught with danger, and by how many dangers arrive we at greater danger? And when arrive we thither? But if I desire to become a friend of God, behold, I am even now made it." Thus spake he, and in the pangs of the travail of the new life, he turned his eyes again upon the page and continued reading, and was inwardly changed where Thou sawest, and his mind was divested of the world, as soon became evident; for as he read, and the surging of his heart rolled along, he raged awhile, discerned and resolved on a better course, and now, having become Thine, he said to his friend, "Now have I broken loose from those hopes of ours, and am determined to serve God; and this, from this hour, in this place, I enter upon. If thou art reluctant to imitate me, hinder me not." The other replied that he would cleave to him, to share in so great a reward and so great a service. Thus both of them, being now Thine, were building a tower at the necessary cost, 1 of forsaking all that they had and following Thee. Then Pontitianus, and he that had walked with him through other parts of the garden, came in search of them to the same place, and having found them, reminded them to return as the day had declined. But they, making known to him their resolution and purpose, and how such a resolve had sprung up and become confirmed in them, entreated them not to molest them, if they refused to join themselves unto them. But the others, no whit changed from their former selves, did yet (as he said) bewail themselves, and piously congratulated them, recommending themselves to their prayers; and with their hearts inclining towards earthly things, returned to the palace. But the other two, setting their affections upon heavenly things, remained in the cottage. And both of them had affianced brides, who, when they heard of this, dedicated also their virginity unto God.

CHAP. VII. He deprecates his wretchedness, that having been born thirly-two years, he had not yet found out the truth.

16. Such was the story of Pontitianus. But Thou, O Lord, whilst he was speaking, didst turn me towards myself, taking me from behind my back, where I had placed myself while unwilling to exercise self-scrutiny; and Thou didst set me "face to face with myself, that I might behold how foul I was, and how crooked and sordid, bespotted and ulcerous. And I beheld and loathed myself; and whither to fly from myself I discovered not. And if I sought to turn my gaze away from myself, he continued his narrative, and Thou again opposedst me unto myself, and thrustestl me before my own eyes, that I might discover my iniquity, and hate it. I had known it, but acted as though I knew it not,- winked at it, and forgot it.

17. But now, the more ardently I loved those whose healthful affections I heard tell of, that they had given up themselves wholly to Thee to be cured, the more did I abhor myself when compared with them. For many of my years (perhaps twelve) had passed away since my nineteenth, when, on the reading of Cicero's Illortensius, 2 I was roused to a desire for wisdom; and still I was delaying to reject mere worldly happiness, and to devote myself to search out that whereof not the finding alone, but the bare search, 3 ought to

3 It is interesting to compare with this passage the views contained in Augustine's three books, Con. Academicos, the earliest of his extant works, and written about this time. Licentius there maintains that the " bare search " for truth renders a man happy, while Trygetius contends that the " finding alone " can produce happiness. Augustine does not agree with the doctrine of the former, and points out that while the Academics held the probable to be attainable, it could not be so without the true, by which the probable is measured and known. And, in his De Vita Beata, he contends that he who seeks truth and finds it not, has not attained happiness, and that though the grace of God be indeed guiding him, he must not expect complete happiness (Retractations, i. 2) till after death. Perhaps no sounder philosophy can be found than that evidenced in the life of Victor Hugo's good Bishop Myriel, who rested in the practice of love, and was content to look for perfect happiness, and a full unfolding of God's mysteries, to the future life: " Aimez-vous les uns les autres, il declarait cela complet, ne souhaitait rien de plus et c'etait la toute sa doctrine. Un jour, cet homme qui se croyait ' philosophe, ' ce senateur, deja nomme, dit a l'eveque:

' Mais voyez done le spectacle du monde; guerre de tous contre tous; le plus fort a le plus d'esprit. Votre aimez-vous les uns les autres est une betise.' ' Eh bien, ' repondit Monseigneur Bienvenu, sans disputer, ' si c'est une betise, l'ame doit s'y enfermer comme la perle dans l'huitre.' Il s'y enfermait done, il y vivait, il s'en satisfaisait absolument, laissant de cete* les questions prodigieuses qui attirent et qui epouvantent, les have been preferred before the treasures and kingdoms of this world, though already found, and before the pleasures of the body, though encompassing me at my will. But I, miserable young man, supremely miserable even in the very outset of my youth, had entreated chastity of Thee, and said, "Grant me chastity and continency, but not yet." For I was afraid lest Thou shouldst hear me soon, and soon deliver me from the disease of concupiscence, which I desired to have satisfied rather than extinguished. And I had wandered through perverse ways in a sacrilegious superstition; not indeed assured thereof, but preferring that to the others, which I did not seek religiously, but opposed maliciously.

18. And I had thought that I delayed from day to day to reject worldly hopes and follow Thee only, because there did not appear anything certain whereunto to direct my course. And now had the day arrived in which I was to be laid bare to myself, and my conscience was to chide me. "Where art thou, my tongue? Thou saidst, verily, that for an uncertain truth thou wert not willing to cast off the baggage of vanity. Behold, now it is certain, and yet doth that burden still oppress thee; whereas they who neither have so worn themselves out with searching after it, nor yet have spent ten years and more in thinking thereon, have had their shoulders unburdened, and gotten wings to fly away." Thus was I inwardly consumed and mightily confounded with an horrible shame, while Pontitianus was relating these things. And lie, having finished his story, and the business he came for, went his way. And unto myself, what said I not within myself?

a Dieu, pour l'athe, an neant: la destinee, le bien et le mal, la guerre de l'etre contre l'etre, la conscience de rhomme, le somnambulisme pensif de l'animal, la transformation par la mort, la recapitulation d'existences qui contient le tombeau, la greffe incomprehensible des amours successifs sur le moi persistant, l'essence, la substance, le Nil et l'Ens, Tame, la nature, la liberte, la necessite; problemes a pic, epaisseurs sinistres, ou se penchent les gigantesques archanges de l'esprit humain; formidables abimes que Lucrece, Manon, Saint Paul, et Dante contemplent avec cet ceil fulgurant qui semble, en regardant fixement l'infinit, y faire eclore les etoiles. 196 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK VIII.]
With what scourges of rebuke lashed I not my soul to make it follow me, struggling to go after Thee! Yet it drew back; it refused, and exercised not itself. All its arguments were exhausted and confuted. There remained a silent trembling; and it feared, as it would death, to be restrained from the flow of that custom whereby it was wasting away even to death.

Chap. viii. The conversation with Alypius being ended, he retires to the garden, whither his friend follows him.

19. In the midst, then, of this great strife of my inner dwelling, which I had strongly raised up against my soul in the chamber of my heart, I troubled both in mind and countenance, I seized upon Alypius, and exclaimed: "What is wrong with us? What is this? What hearest thou? The unlearned start up and 'take' heaven, 2 and we, with our learning, but wanting heart, see where we wallow in flesh and blood! Because others have preceded us, are we ashamed to follow, and not rather ashamed at not following?" Some such words I gave utterance to, and in my excitement flung myself from him, while he gazed upon me in silent astonishment. For I spoke not in my wonted tone, and my brow, cheeks, eyes, colour, tone of voice, all expressed my emotion more than the words. There was a little garden belonging to our lodging, of which we had the use, as of the whole house; for the master, our landlord, did not live there. Thither had the tempest within my breast hurried me, where no one might impede the fiery struggle in which I was engaged with myself, until it came to the issue that Thou knewest, though I did not. But I was mad that I might be whole, and dying that I might have life, knowing what evil thing I was, but not knowing what good thing I was shortly to become. Into the garden, then, I retired, Alypius following my steps. For his presence was no bar to my solitude; or how could he desert me so troubled? We sat down at as great a distance from the house as we could. I was disquieted in spirit, being most impatient with myself that I entered not into Thy will and covenant, my God, which all my bones cried out unto me to enter, extolling it to the skies. And we enter not therein b) ships, or chariots, or feet, no, nor by going so far as I had come from the house to that place where we were sitting. For not to go only, but to enter there, was naught else but to will to go, but to will it resolutely and thoroughly; not to stagger and sway about this way and that, a changeable and half-wounded will, wrestling, with one part falling as another rose.

20. Finally, in the very fever of my irresolution, I made many of those motions with my body which men sometimes desire to do, but cannot, if either they have not the limbs, or if their limbs be bound with fetters, weakened by disease, or hindered in any other way. Thus, if I tore my hair, struck my forehead, or if, entwining my fingers, I clasped my knee, this I did because I willed it. But I might have willed and not done it, if the power of motion in my limbs had not responded. So many things, then, I did, when to have the will was not to have the power, and I did not that which both with an unequalled desire I longed more to do, and which shortly when I should will I should have the power to do; because shortly when I should will, I should will thoroughly. For in such things the power was one with the will, and to will was to do, and yet was it not done; and more readily did the body obey the slightest wish of the soul in the moving its limbs at the order of the mind, than the soul obeyed itself to accomplish in the will alone this its great will.

Chap. ix. That the mind commandeth the mind, but it willeth not entirely.

21. Whence is this monstrous thing? And why is it? Let Thy mercy shine on me, that I may inquire, if so be the hidingplaces of man's punishment, and the darkest contritions of the sons of Adam, may perhaps answer me. Whence is this monstrous thing? and why is it? The mind commands the body, and it obeys forthwith; the mind commands itself, and is resisted. The mind commands the hand to be moved, and such readiness is there that the command is scarce to be distinguished from the obedience. Yet the mind is mind, and the hand is body.

The mind commands the mind to will, and yet, though it be itself, it obeyeth not. Whence this monstrous thing? and why is it? I repeat, it commands itself to will, and would not give the command unless it willed; yet is not that done which it commandeth. But it willeth not entirely; therefore it commandeth not entirely. For so far forth it commandeth, as it willeth; and so far forth is the thing commanded not done, as it willeth not. For the will commandeth that there be a will; not another, but itself. But it doth not command entirely, therefore that is not which it commandeth. For were it entire, it would not even command it to be, because it would already be. It is, therefore, no monstrous thing partly to will, partly to be unwilling, but an infirmity of the mind, that it doth not wholly rise, sustained by truth, pressed down by custom. And so there are two wills, because one of them is not entire; and the one is supplied with what the other needs.

Chap. x. He refutes the opinion of the, Manichceans as to two kinds of minds, one good and the other evil.

22. Let them perish from Thy presence, 1 God, as "vain talkers and deceivers" 2 of the soul do perish, who, observing that there were two wills in deliberating, affirm that there are two kinds of minds in us, one good, the other evil. 3 They themselves verily are evil when they hold these evil opinions; and they shall become good when they hold the truth, and shall consent unto the truth, that Thy apostle may say unto them, "Ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord." 4 But they, desiring to be light, not "in the Lord," but in themselves, conceiving the nature of the soul to be the same as that which God is, 5 are made more gross darkness; for that through a shocking arrogancy they went farther from Thee, "the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." 6 Take heed what you say, and blush for shame; draw near unto Him and be "lightened," and your faces shall not be
3 And that therefore they were not responsible for their evil deeds, it not being they that sinned, but the nature of evil in them. See iv. sec. 26. and note, above, where the Manichean doctrines in this matter are fully treated.

CHAP. X.) CONFLICTING WILLS. 199

"ashamed." 1 I, when I was deliberating upon serving the Lord my God now, as I had long purposed, I it was who willed, I who was unwilling. It was I, even I myself. I neither willed entirely, nor was entirely unwilling. Therefore was I at war with myself, and destroyed by myself. And this destruction overtook me against my will, and yet showed not the presence of another mind, but the punishment of mine own. 2 " Now, then, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me," 3 the punishment of a more unconfined sin, in that I was a son of Adam.

23. For if there be as many contrary natures as there are conflicting wills, there will not now be two natures only, but many. If any one deliberate whether he should go to their conventicle, or to the theatre, those men 4 at once cry out, " Behold, here are two natures, one good, drawing this way, another bad, drawing back that way; for whence else is this indecision between conflicting wills ?" But I reply that both are bad that which draws to them, and that which draws back to the theatre. But they believe not that will to be other than good which draws to them. Supposing, then, one of us should deliberate, and through the conflict of his two wills should waver whether he should go to the theatre or to our church, would not these also waver what to answer? For either they must confess, which they are not willing to do, that the will which leads to our church is good, as well as that of those who have received and are held by the mysteries of theirs, or they must imagine that there are two evil natures and two evil minds in one man, at war one with the other; and that will not be true which they say, that there is one good and another bad; or they must be converted to the truth, and no longer deny that where any one deliberates, there is one soul fluctuating between conflicting wills.

24. Let them no more say, then, when they perceive two wills to be antagonistic to each other in the same man, that the contest is between two opposing minds, of two opposing substances, from two opposing principles, the one good and the other bad. For Thou, true God, dost disprove, check," and convince them; like as when both wills are bad, one deliberates whether he should kill a man by poison, or by the sword; whether he should take possession of this or that estate of another's, when he cannot both; whether he should purchase pleasure by prodigality, or retain his money by covetousness; whether he should go to the circus or the theatre, if both are open on the same day; or, thirdly, whether he should rob another man's house, if he have the opportunity; or, fourthly, whether he should commit adultery, if at the same time he have the means of doing so, all these tilings concurring in the same point of time, and all being equally longed for, although impossible to be enacted at one time. For they rend the mind amid four, or even (among the vast variety of things men desire) more antagonistic wills, nor do they yet affirm that there are so many different substances. Thus also is it in wills which are good. For I ask them, is it a good thing to have delight in reading the apostle, or good to have delight in a sober psalm, or good to discourse on the gospel? To each of these they will answer, "It is good." What, then, if all equally delight us, and all at the same time? Do not different wills distract the mind, when a man is deliberating which he should rather choose? Yet are they all good, and are at variance until one be fixed upon, whither the whole united will may be borne, which before was divided into many. Thus, also, when above eternity delights us, and the pleasure of temporal good holds us down below, it is the same soul which willeth not that or this with an entire will, and is therefore torn asunder with grievous perplexities, while out of truth it prefers that, but out of custom forbears not this.

1 Ps. lxxviii. 2. 2 Titus i. 10.

3 Rom. vii. 17. 4 The Manichaeans.

Chap. xi. In what manner the Spirit struggled with the flesh, that it might be freed from the bondage of vanity.

25. Thus was I sick and tormented, accusing myself far more severely than was my wont, tossing and turning me in my chain till that was utterly broken, whereby I now was but slightly, but still was held. And Thou, Lord, pressedst upon me in my inward parts by a severe mercy, redoubling the lashes of fear and shame, lest I should again give way, and that same slender remaining tie not being broken off, it should recover strength, and enchain me the faster. For I said mentally, "Lo, let it be done now, let it be done now." And as I spoke, I all but came to a resolve. I all but did it, yet I did it not. Yet fell I not back to my old condition, but took up my position hard by, and drew breath. And I tried again, and wanted but very little of reaching it, and somewhat less, and then all but touched and grasped it; and yet came not at it, nor touched, nor grasped it, hesitating to die unto death, and to live unto life; and the worse, whereto I had been habituated, prevailed more with me than the better, which I had not tried. And the very moment in which I was to become another man, the nearer it approached me, the greater horror did it strike into me; but it did not strike me back, nor turn me aside, but kept me in suspense.

26. The very toys of toys, and vanities of vanities, my old mistresses, still enthralled me; they shook my fleshly garment, and whispered softly, "Dost thou part with us? And from that moment shall we no more be with thee for ever? And from that moment shall not this or that be lawful for thee for ever?" And what did they suggest to me in the words "this or that?" What is it that they suggested, O my God? Let Thy mercy avert it from the soul of Thy servant. What impurities did they suggest! What shame! And now I far less than half heard them, not openly showing themselves and contradicting me, but muttering, as it were, behind my back, and furtively plucking me as I was departing, to make me look back upon them. Yet they did delay me, so that I hesitated to burst and shake myself free from them, and to leap over whither I was called, an unruly habit saying to me, "Dost thou think thou canst live without them?"

27. But now it said this very faintly; for on that side towards which I had set my face, and whither I trembled to go, did the chaste dignity of Continence appear unto me, cheerful, but not dissolutely gay, honestly alluring me to come and doubt nothing, and extending her holy hands, full of a multiplicity of good examples, to receive and embrace me. There were there so many young men and maidens, a multitude of youth and every age, grave widows and ancient virgins, and Continence herself in all, not barren, but a fruitful mother of children of joys, by Thee, Lord, her Husband. And she smiled on me with an encouraging mockery, as if to say, "Canst not thou do what these youths and maidens can? Or can one or other do it of themselves, and not rather in the Lord their God? The Lord their God gave me unto them. Why standest thou in thine own strength, and so standest not? Cast thyself upon Him; fear not, He will not withdraw that thou shouldest fall; cast thyself upon Him without fear, He will receive thee, and heal thee." And I blushed beyond measure, for I still heard the muttering of those toys, and hung in suspense. And she again seemed to say, "Shut up thine ears against those unclean members of thine upon the earth, that they may be mortified. They tell thee of delights, but not as doth the law of the Lord thy God." 2 This controversy in my heart was naught but self against self. But Alypius, sitting close by my side, awaited in silence the result of my unwonted emotion.

1 Col. iii. 5. * Ps. cxix. 85, Old ver.
3 As in nature, the men of science tell us, no two atoms touch, but that, while an inner magnetism draws them together, a secret repulsion keeps them apart, so it is with human souls. Into our deepest feelings our dearest friends cannot enter. In the throes of conversion, for example, God's ministering servants may assist, but He alone can bring the soul to the birth. So it was here in the case of Augustine. He felt that now even the presence of his dear friend would be a burden, God alone could come near, so as to heal the sore wound of his spirit, and Alypius was a friend who knew how to keep silence, and to await the issue of his friend's profound emotion. How comfortable a thing to find in those who would give consolation the spirit that animated the friends of Job, when "they sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him; for they saw that his grief was very great"

(Job ii. 13). Well has Rousseau said: "Les consolations indiscretes ne font qu'aigrir les violentes afflictions. L'indifference et la froideur trouvent aise des paroles, mais la tristesse et le silence sont alors le vrai langage de l'amitie."

A beautiful exemplification of this is found in Victor Hugo's portrait of Bishop Myriel, in Les Misérables (c. iv.), from which we have quoted a few pages back: "II savait s'asseoir et se taire de longues heures auprès de l'homme qui avait perdu la femme qu'il aimait, de la mere qui avait perdu son enfant. Comme il savait le moment de se taire, il savait aussi le moment de parler. admirable consoleur ! il ne cherchait pas a effacer la douleur par l'oubli, mais a l'agrandir et a la dignifier par l'espenance."

CHAP. XII.

THE VOICE FROM HEAVEN. 203

Chap. xii. Having prayed to God, he pours forth a shower of tears, and, admonished by a voice, he opens the book and reads the words in Rom. xiii. 13; by which, being changed in his whole soul, lie discloses the divine favour to his friend and his mother.

28. But when a profound reflection had, from the secret depths of my soul, drawn together and heaped up all my misery before the sight of my heart, there arose a mighty storm, accompanied by as mighty a shower of tears. Which, that I might pour forth fully, with its natural expressions, I stole away from Alypius; for it suggested itself to me that solitude was fitter for the business of weeping. So I retired to such a distance that even his presence could not be oppressive to me. Thus was it with me at that time, and he perceived it; for something, I believe, I had spoken, wherein the sound of my voice appeared choked with weeping, and in that state had I risen up. He then remained where we had been sitting, most completely astonished. I flung myself down, how, I know not, under a certain fig-tree, giving free course to my tears, and the streams of mine eyes gushed out, an acceptable sacrifice unto Thee. And, not indeed in these words, yet to this effect, spake I much unto Thee. "But Thou, Lord, how long? "3 "How long, Lord? Wilt Thou be angry for ever? Oh, remember not against us former iniquities; "4 for I felt that I was enthralled by them. I sent up these sorrowful cries, "How long, how long? To-morrow, and to: morrow? Why not now? Why is there not this hour an , end to my uncleanness?"

29. I was saying these things and weeping in the most bitter contrition of my heart, when, lo, I heard the voice as of

! a boy or girl, I know not which, coming from a neighbouring i house, chanting, and oft repeating, "Take up and read; take 'up and read." Immediately my countenance was changed, and I began most earnestly to consider whether it was usual for children in any kind of game to sing such words; nor could I remember ever to have heard the like. So, restraining the torrent of my tears, I rose up, interpreting it no other way than as a command to me from Heaven to open the book,

and to read the first chapter I should light upon. For I had heard of Antony, I that, accidentally coming in whilst the gospel was being read, he received the admonition as if what was read were addressed to him, "Go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me." 2 And by such oracle was he forthwith converted unto Thee. So quickly I returned to the place where Alypius was sitting; for there had I put down the volume of the apostles, when I rose thence. I grasped, opened, and in silence read that paragraph on which my eyes first fell, "Not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying; but put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof." 3 No further would I read, nor did I need; for instantly, as the sentence ended, by a light, as it were, of security infused into my heart, all the gloom of doubt vanished away.

30. Closing the book, then, and putting either my finger between, or some other mark, I now with a tranquil countenance made it known to Alypius. And he thus disclosed to me what was wrought in him, which I knew not. He asked to look at what I had read. I showed him; and he looked even further than I had read, and I knew not what followed.
This it was, verily, "Him that is weak in the faith, receive ye;" 4 which he applied to himself, and discovered to me. By this admonition was he strengthened; and by a good resolution and purpose, very much in accord with his character (wherein, for the better, he was always far different from me), without any restless delay he joined me. Thence we go in to my mother. We make it known to her, she rejoiceth. We relate how it came to pass, she leapeth for joy, and triumpheth, and blesseth Thee, who art "able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think;" 5 for she perceived Thee to have given her more for me than she used to ask by her pitiful and most doleful groanings. For Thou didst so convert me unto Thyself, that I sought neither a wife, nor

BOOK NINTH.

HE SPEAKS OP HIS DESIGN OF FORSAKING THE PROFESSION OF RHETORIC; OF THE DEATH OF HIS FRIENDS; NEBRIDIUS AND VEKECUNDUS, OF HAVING RECEIVED BAPTISM IN THE THIRTY-THIRD YEAR OF HIS AGE; AND OF THE VIRTUES AND DEATH OF HIS MOTHER, MONICA.

Chap. i. He praises God, the Author of safety, and Jesus Christ, the Redeemer, acknowledging his own wickedness.

1. " /\ LOED, truly I am Thy servant; I am Thy servant, V/ and the son of Thine handmaid: Thou hast loosed my bonds. I will offer to Thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving." 1
Let my heart and my tongue praise Thee, and let all my bones say, "Lord, who is like unto Thee?" 2 Let them so say, and answer Thou me, and "say unto my soul, I am Thy salvation." 3

Who am I, and what is my nature? How evil have not my deeds been; or if not my deeds, my words; or if not my words, my will? But Thou, Lord, art good and merciful, and Thy right hand had respect unto the profoundness of my death, and removed from the bottom of my heart that abyss of corruption.

And this was the result, that I willed not to do what I willed, and willed to do what thou willedst. 4 But where, during all those years, and out of what deep and secret retreat was my free will summoned forth in a moment, whereby I gave my neck to Thy "easy yoke," and my shoulders to Thy "light burden," 5 O Christ Jesus, "my strength and my Redeemer"?*

How sweet did it suddenly become to me to be without the delights of trifles! And what at one time I feared to lose, it was now a joy to me to put away. 7 For Thou didst cast them away from me, Thou true and highest sweetness. Thou didst cast them away, and instead of them didst enter in Thyself, 1 sweeter than all pleasure, though not to flesh and blood; brighter than all light, but more veiled than all mysteries; more exalted than all honour, but not to the exalted in their own conceits. Now was my soul free from the gnawing cares of seeking and getting, and of wallowing and exciting the itch of lust. And I babbled unto Thee my brightness, my riches, and my health, the Lord my God.

CHAP. II.] THE POWER OF THE NEW LIFE. 207

away from me, Thou true and highest sweetness. Thou didst cast them away, and instead of them didst enter in Thyself, 1 sweeter than all pleasure, though not to flesh and blood; brighter than all light, but more veiled than all mysteries; more exalted than all honour, but not to the exalted in their own conceits. Now was my soul free from the gnawing cares of seeking and getting, and of wallowing and exciting the itch of lust. And I babbled unto Thee my brightness, my riches, and my health, the Lord my God.

Chap. ii. As his lungs were affected, he meditates withdrawing himself from public favour.

2. And it seemed good to me, as before Thee, not tumultuously to snatch away, but gently to withdraw the service of my tongue from the talker's trade; that the young, who thought not on Thy law, nor on Thy peace, but on mendacious follies and forensic strifes, might

And opportunely there wanted but a few days unto the Vacation of the Vintage; 2 and I determined to endure them, in order to leave in the usual way, and, being redeemed by Thee, no more to return for sale. Our intention then was known to Thee; but to men excepting our own friends was it not known. For we had determined among ourselves not to let it get abroad to

of the Confessions: "Augustine excellently illustrates from his own experience this part of the parable. Describing the crisis of his own conversion, and how easy he found it, through this joy, to give up all those pleasures of sin that he had long dreaded to be obliged to renounce, which had long held him fast bound in the chains of evil custom, and which if he renounced, it had seemed to him as though life itself would not be worth the living, he exclaims, ' How sweet did it suddenly become to me,' " etc.

1 His love of earthly things was expelled by the indwelling love of God, "for," as he says in his De Musica, vi. 52, "the love of the things of time could only be expelled by some sweetness of things eternal." Compare also Dr. Chalmers' sermon on The Expulsive Power of a Neio Affection (the ninth of his " Commercial Discourses "), where this idea is expanded.

* " In harvest and vintage time had the lawyers their vacation. So Minutius Felix. Scholars, their Non Terminus, as here; yea, divinity lectures and catechizings then ceased. So Cyprian, Ep. 2. The law terms gave way also to the great festivals of the Church. Theodosius forbade any process to go out from fifteen days before Easter till the Sunday after. any; although Thou hadst given to us, ascending from- the valley of tears, 1 and singing the song of degrees, " sharp arrows," and destroying coals, against the " deceitful tongue," 2 which in giving counsel opposes, and in showing love consumes, as it is wont to do with its food.

3. Thou hadst penetrated our hearts with Thy charity, and we carried Thy words fixed, as it were, in our bowels; and the examples of Thy servant, whom of black Thou hadst made bright, and of dead, alive, crowded in the bosom of our thoughts, burned and consumed our heavy torpor, that we might not topple into the abyss; and they enkindled us exceedingly, that every breath of the deceitful tongue of the gainsayer might inflame us the more, not extinguish us. Nevertheless, because for Thy name's sake which Thou hast sanctified throughout the earth, this, our vow and purpose, might also find commenders, it looked like a vaunting of oneself not to wait for the vacation, now so near, but to leave beforehand a public profession, and one, too, under general observation; so that all who looked on this act of mine, and saw how near was the vintage-time I desired to anticipate, would talk of me a great deal as if I were trying to appear to be a great person. And what purpose would it serve that people should consider and dispute about my intention, and that our good should be evil spoken of? 3

4. Furthermore, this very summer, from too great literary labour, my lungs 4 began to be weak, and with difficulty to draw

1 Ps. lxxxiv. 6.

8 Ps. cxx. 3, 4, according to the Old Ver. This passage has many difficulties we need not enter into. The Vulgate, however, we may say, renders verse 3: "Quid detur tibi aut quid aponatur tibi ad linguam dolosam," that is, shall be given as a defence against the tongues of evil speakers. In this way Augustine understands it, and in his commentary on this place makes the fourth verse give the answer to the third. Thus, "sharp arrows" he interprets to be the word of God, and "destroying coals" those who, being converted to Him, have become examples to the ungodly.

3 Rom. xiv. 16.

4 In his De Vita Beata, sec. 4, and Con. Acad. i. 3, he also alludes to this weakness of his chest. He was therefore led to give up his professorship, partly from this cause, and partly from a desire to devote himself more entirely to God's service. See also p. 173, note.

deep breaths; showing by the pains in ray chest that they were affected, and refusing too loud or prolonged speaking. This had at first been a trial to me, for it compelled me almost of necessity to lay down that burden of teaching; or, if I could be cured and become strong again, at least to leave it off for a while. But when the full desire for leisure, that I might see that Thou art the Lord, 1 arose, and was confirmed in me, my God, Thou knowest I even began to rejoice that I had this excuse ready, and that not a feigned one, which might somewhat temper the offence taken by those who for their sons' good wished me never to have the freedom of sons.

Full, therefore, with such joy, I bore it till that period of time had passed, perhaps it was some twenty days, yet they were bravely borne; for the cupidity which was wont to sustain part of this weighty business had departed, and I had remained overwhelmed had not its place been supplied by patience. Some of Thy servants, my brethren, may perchance say that I sinned in this, in that having once fully, and from my heart, entered on Thy warfare, I permitted myself to sit a single hour in the seat of falsehood. I will not contend.

But hast not Thou, most merciful Lord, pardoned and remitted this sin also, with my others, so horrible and deadly, in the holy water?
Chap. hi. He retires to the villa of his friend Verecundus, who was not yet a Christian, and re/ert to his conversion and death, as well as that of Nebridius.

5. Verecundus was wasted with anxiety at that our happiness, since he, being most firmly held by his bonds, saw that he would lose our fellowship. For he was not yet a Christian, though his wife was one of the faithful; 2 and yet hereby, being more firmly enchained than by anything else, was he held back from that journey which we had commenced. Nor, he declared, did he wish to be a Christian on any other terms than those that were impossible. However, he invited us most courteously to make use of his country house so long as we should stay there. Thou, Lord, wilt " recompense " him for this " at the resurrection of the just," 3 seeing that Thou hast already given him " the lot of the righteous." x "For although, when we were absent at Eome, he, being overtaken with bodily sickness, and therein being made a Christian, and one of the faithful, departed this life, yet hadst Thou mercy on him, and not on him only, but on us also; 2 lest, thinking on the exceeding kindness of our friend to us, and unable to count him in Thy flock, we should be tortured with intolerable grief. Thanks be unto Thee, our God, we are Thine. Thy exhortations, consolations, and faithful promises assure us that Thou now repayest Verecundus for that country house at Cassiacum, where from the fever of the world we found rest in Thee, with the perpetual freshness of Thy Paradise, in that Thou hast forgiven him his earthly sins, in that mountain flowing with milk, 3 that fruitful mountain, Thine own.

6. He then was at that time full of grief; but Nebridius was joyous. Although he also, not being yet a Christian, had fallen into the pit of that most pernicious error of believing Thy Son to be a phantasm, 4 yet, coming out thence, he held the same belief that we did; not as yet initiated in any of the sacraments of Thy Church, but a most earnest inquirer after truth. 5 Whom, not long after our conversion and regeneration by Thy baptism, he being also a faithful member of the Catholic Church, and serving Thee in perfect chastity and continency amongst his own people in Africa, when his whole household had been brought to Christianity through him, didst Thou release from the flesh; and now he lives in Abraham's bosom. Whatever that may be which is signified by that

3 Literally, In monte incaseato, "the mountain of curds," from the Old Ver. of Ps. lxviii. 16. The Vulgate renders coagulatus. But the Authorized Version is nearer the true meaning, when it renders Q^J33, hunched, as "high." The LXX. renders it nru^ wpivoi, condensed, as if from $n^33$, cheese. This divergence arises from the unused root $pS$, to be curved, having derivatives meaning
(1) "hunch-backed," when applied to the body, and (2) "cheese " or "curds," when applied to milk. Augustine, in his exposition of this place, makes the "mountain" to be Christ, and parallels it with Isa. ii. 2; and the "milk" he interprets of the grace that comes from Him for Christ's little ones: Ipse est mans incaseatus, propter parvulos gratia tanquam lacte nulriendos.

bosom, 1 there lives my Nebridius, my sweet friend, Thy son, O Lord, adopted of a freedman; there he liveth. For what other place could there be for such a soul ? There liveth he, concerning which he used to ask me much, me, an inexperienced, feeble one.
Now he puts not his ear unto my mouth, but his spiritual mouth unto Thy fountain, and drinketh as much as he is able, wisdom according to his desire, happy without end. Nor do I believe that he is so inebriated with it as to forget me, 2 seeing Thou, O Lord, whom he drinketh, art mindful of us. Thus, then, were we comforting the sorrowing Verecundus (our friendship being untouched) concerning our conversion, and exhorting him to a faith according to his condition, I mean, his married state.
And tarrying for Nebridius to follow us, which, being so near, he was just about to do,

1 Though Augustine, in his Qu&st. Erntng. ii. qu. 38, makes Abraham's bosom to represent the rest into which the Gentiles entered after the Jews had put it from them, yet he, for the most part, in common with the early Church (see Serm. xiv. 3; Con. Faust, xxxiii. 5; and Eps. clxiv. 7, and clxxxvii. Compare also Tertullian, De Anima, lviii.), takes it to mean the resting-place of the souls of the righteous after death. Abraham's bosom, indeed, is the same as the " Paradise" of Luke xxiii. 43. The souls of the faithful after they are delivered from the flesh are in "joy and felicity" (De Civ. Dei, i. 13, and xiii. 19); but they will not have "their perfect consummation and bliss both in body and soul" until the morning of the resurrection, when they shall be endowed with "spiritual bodies."
See note p. 163; and for the difference between the a'Ss of Luke xvi. 23, that is, the place of departed spirits, into which it is said in the Apostles' Creed Christ descended, and yiwa., or Hell, see Campbell on The Gospels, i. 253. In the A.V. both Greek words are rendered "Hell."

212 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK IX.]

Thou didst deliver my tongue whence Thou hadst already delivered my heart; and full of joy I blessed Thee for it, and retired with all mine to the villa. 1 What I accomplished there in writing, which was now wholly devoted to Thy service, though still, in this pause as it were, panting from the school of pride, my books testify/ those in which I disputed with my friends, and those with myself alone 3 before Thee; and what with the absent Nebridius, my letters 4 testify. And when can I find time to recount all Thy great benefits which Thou bestowedst upon us at that time, especially as I am hasting on to still greater mercies?
For my memory calls upon me, and pleasant it is to me, O Lord, to confess unto Thee, by what inward goads Thou didst subdue me, and how Thou didst make me low, bringing down the mountains and hills of my imaginations, and didst straighten my crookedness, and smooth my rough ways; 5 and by what means Thou also didst subdue that brother of my heart, Alypius, unto the name of Thy only- begotten, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, which he at first refused to have inserted in our writings. For he rather desired that they should savour of the " cedars " of the schools, which the Lord hath now broken down, 6 than of the wholesome herbs of the Church, hostile to serpents.

1 As Christ went into the wilderness after His baptism (Matt iv. 1), and Paul into Arabia after his conversion (Gal i. 17), so did Augustine here find in his retirement a preparation for his future work. He tells us of this time of his life ( De Ordin. L 6) that his habit was to spend the beginning or end, and often air.

CHAP. IT.] HE IS STIRRED BY THE PSALMS. 213

read the Psalms of David, 1 those faithful songs and sounds of devotion which exclude all swelling of spirit, when new to Thy true love, at rest in the villa with Alypius, a catechumen like myself, my mother cleaving unto us, in woman's garb truly, but with a man's faith, with the peacefulness of age, full of motherly love and Christian piety! What utterances used I to send up unto Thee in those Psalms, and how was I inflamed towards Thee by them, and burned to rehearse them, if it were possible, throughout the whole world, against the pride of the human race! And yet they are sung throughout the whole world, and none can hide himself from Thy heat. With what vehement and bitter sorrow was I indignant at the Manichaeans; whom yet again I pitied, for that they were ignorant of those sacraments, those medicaments, and were mad against the antidote which might have made them sane! I wished that they had been somewhere near me then, and, without my being aware of their presence, could have beheld my face, and heard my words, when I read the fourth Psalm in that time of my leisure, how that psalm wrought upon me. When I called upon Thee. Thou didst hear me, God of my righteousness; Then hast enlarged me when I was in distress; have mercy upon me, and hear my prayer. 8 Oh that they might have heard what I uttered on these words, without my knowing whether they heard or no, lest they should think that I spake it because of them! For, of a truth, neither should I have said the same things, nor in the way I said them, if I had perceived that I was heard and seen by them; and had I spoken them, they would not so have received them as when I spake by and for myself before Thee, out of the private feelings of my soul.

9. I alternately quaked with fear, and warmed with hope, and with rejoicing in Thy mercy, Father. And all these

1 Reference may with advantage be made to Archbishop Trench's Huhea* Lectuns (1S45), who in his third leet., on "The Manifoldness of Scripture," adverts to this very passage, and shows in an interesting way how the Psalms have ever been to the saints of God, as Luther said, "a Bible in little," affording satisfaction to their needs in every kind of trial, emergency, and experience.

passed forth, both by mine eyes and voice, when Thy good Spirit, turning unto us, said, ye sons of men, how long will ye be slow of heart? " How long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing? 1 For I had loved vanity, and sought after leasing. And Thou, O Lord, hadst already magnified Thy Holy One, raising Him from the dead, and setting Him at Thy right hand. 2 whence from on high He should send His promise, 3 the Paraclete, " the Spirit of Truth." 4 And He had already sent Him, 5 but I knew it not; He had sent Him, because He was now magnified, rising again front the dead, and ascending into heaven. For till then " the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified." 6 And the prophet cries out, How long will ye be slow of heart? How long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing? Know this, that the Lord hath magnified His Holy One. He cries out, " How long?" He cries out, " Know this," and I, so long ignorant, " loved vanity, and sought after leasing." And therefore I heard and trembled, because these words were spoken unto such as I remembered that I myself had been. For in those phantasms which I once held for truths was there " vanity " and " leasing." And I spake many things loudly and earnestly, in the sorrow of my remembrance, which, would that they who yet " love vanity and seek after leasing " had heard! They would perchance have been troubled, and have vomited it forth, and Thou wouldest hear them when they cried unto Thee; 7 for by a true 8 death in the flesh He died for us, who now maketh intercession for us 9 with Thee.

10. 1 read further, "Be ye angry, and sin not." 10 And how was I moved, my God, who had now learned to "be angry " with myself for the things past, so that in the future I might not sin! Yea, to be justly angry; for that it was not another nature of the race of darkness 11 which sinned for me, as they affirm it to be who are not angry with themselves, and who treasure up to themselves wrath against the day of wrath, and of the revelation of Thy righteous judgment. 1 Nor were my good things 2 now without, nor were they sought after with eyes of flesh in that sun; 3 for they that would have joy from without easily sink into oblivion, and are wasted upon those things which are seen and temporal, and in their starving thoughts do lick their very shadows. Oh, if only they were wearied out with their fasting, and said, "Who will show us any good?" 4 And we would answer, and they hear, O Lord, The light of Thy countenance is lifted up upon us. 5 For we are not that Light, which lighteth every man, 6 but we are enlightened by Thee, that we, who were sometimes darkness, may be light in Thee. 7 Oh that they could behold the internal Eternal, 8 which having tasted I gnashed my teeth that I could not show It to them, while they brought me their heart in their eyes, roaming abroad from Thee, and said, "Who will show us any good?" 9 But there I was angry with myself in my chamber, where I was inwardly pricked, where I had offered my "sacrifice," slaying my old man, and beginning the resolution of a new life, putting my trust in Thee, 9 there hadst Thou begun to grow sweet unto me, and to "put gladness in my heart." 10 And I cried out as I read this outwardly, and felt it inwardly. Nor would I be increased 11 with worldly goods, wasting time and being wasted by time; whereas I possessed in Thy eternal simplicity other corn, and wine, and oil. 12

11. And with a loud cry from my heart, I called out in the following verse, "Oh, in peace!" and "the self-same!" 13 Oh,

For, as he says in his exposition of the fourth Psalm, "Cum dedita temporalibus voluptatibus anima semper exardescit cupiditate, nee satiari potest." He knew that the prosperity of the soul (3 John 2) might be injuriously affected by the prosperity of the body; and disregarding the lower life (files) and its "worldly goods," he pressed on to increase the treasure he had within, the true life () which he hail received from God. what said he, "I will lay me down and sleep I" 1 For who shall hinder us, when " shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory?" 2 And Thou art in the highest degree " the self-same," who changest not; and in Thee is the rest which forgetteeth all labour, for there is no other beside Thee, nor ought we to seek after those many other things which are not what Thou art; but Thou, Lord, only makest me to dwell in hope. 3 These things I read, and was inflamed; but discovered not what to do with those deaf and dead, of whom I had been a pestilent member, a bitter and a blind declaimer against the writings be-honied with the honey of heaven and luminous with Thine own light; and I was consumed on account of the enemies of this Scripture.
12. When shall I call to mind all that took place in those holidays? Yet neither have I forgotten, nor will I be silent about the severity of Thy scourge, and the amazing quickness of Thy mercy. 4 Thou didst at that time torture me with toothache; 5 and when it had become so exceeding great that I was not able to speak, it came into my heart to urge all my friends who were present to pray for me to Thee, the God of all manner of health. And I wrote it down on wax, 6 and gave it to them to read. Presently, as with submissive desire we bowed our knees, that pain departed. But what pain? Or how did it depart? I confess to being much afraid, my he may "fly swiftly" (Dan. ix. 21) to bring the message of peace, while Michael has but one, that he may labour in his flight when he comes forth on his ministries of justice.

5 In his Soliloquies (see note, sec. 7, above), he refers in i. 21 to this period.
He there tells us that his pain was so great that it prevented his learning anything afresh, and only permitted him to revolve in his mind what he had already learnt. Compare De

13. The vintage vacation being ended, I gave the citizens of Milan notice that they might provide their scholars with another seller of words; because both of my election to serve Thee, and my inability, by reason of the difficulty of breathing and the pain in my chest, to continue the Professorship. And by letters I notified to Thy bishop, 1 the holy man Ambrose, my former errors and present resolutions, with a view to his advising me which of Thy books it was best for me to read, so that I might be readier and fitter for the reception of such great grace. He recommended Isaiah the Prophet; 2 I believe, because he foreshows more clearly than others the gospel, and the calling of the Gentiles. But I, not understanding the first portion of the book, and imagining the whole to be like it, laid it aside, intending to take it up hereafter, when better practised in our Lord's words.

his naked feet. We took into our company the boy Adeodatus, born of me carnally, of my sin. Well hadst Thou made him. He was barely fifteen years, yet in wit excelled many grave and learned men. I confess unto Thee Thy gifts, Lord my God, Creator of all, and of exceeding power to reform our deformities; for of me was there naught in that boy but the sin. For that we fostered him in Thy discipline, Thou inspiredst us, none other. Thy gifts I confess unto Thee. There is a book of ours, which is entitled The Master? It is a dialogue between him and me. Thou knowest that all things there put into the mouth of the person in argument with me were his thoughts in his sixteenth year. Many others more wonderful did I find in him. That talent was a source of awe to me. And who but Thou could be the worker of such marvels? Quickly didst Thou remove his life from the earth; and now I recall him to mind with a sense of security, in that I fear nothing for his childhood or youth, or for his whole self. We took him coeval with us in Thy grace, to be educated in Thy discipline; and we were baptized, and solitude about our past life left us. Nor was I satiated in those days with the wondrous sweetness of considering the depth of Thy counsels concerning the salvation of the human race. How greatly did I weep in Thy hymns and canticles, deeply moved by the voices of Thy sweet-speaking Church! The voices flowed into

1 In his De Vita Beata, sec. 6, he makes a similar allusion to the genius of Adeodatus.

* This book, in which he and his son are the interlocutors, will be found in vol. i of the Benedictine edition, and is by the editors assumed to be written about A.D. 389. Augustine briefly gives its argument in his Retractions, i. 12. He says: "There it is disputed, sought, and discovered that there is no master who teaches man knowledge save God, as it is written in the gospel (Matt, xxiii. 10),

* One is your Master, even Christ."

' He was baptized by Ambrose, and tradition says, as he came out of the water, they sang alternate verses of the Te Deum (ascribed by some to Ambrose), which, in the old offices of the English Church is called "The Song of Ambrose and Augustine." In his Con. Julian. Pelag. i. 10, he speaks of Ambrose as being one whose devoted labours and perils were known throughout the whole Roman world, and says: "In Christo enim Jesu per evangelium ipse me genuit, et eo Christi ministro lavacrum regenerations accepi." See also the last sec. of his DeNupt. et Concup., and Ep. cxlvii. 23. In notes 3, p. 13, and 2, p. 108, will be found references to the usages of the early Church as to baptism.

mine ears, and the truth was poured forth into my heart, whence the agitation of my piety overflowed, and my tears ran over, and blessed was I therein.

Chap. vii. Of the Church hymns instituted at Milan; of the Ambrosian per' secution raised by Justina; and of the discovery of the bodies of two martyrs.

15. Not long had the Church of Milan begun to employ this kind of consolation and exhortation, the brethren singing together with great earnestness of voice and heart. For it was about a year, or not much more, since Justina, the mother of the boy-Emperor Valentinian, persecuted Thy servant Ambrose in the interest of her heresy, to which she had been seduced by the Arians. The pious people kept guard in the church, prepared to die with their bishop, Thy servant. There my mother, Thy handmaid, bearing a chief part of those cares and watchings, lived in prayer. We, still un melted by the heat of Thy Spirit, were yet moved by the astonished and disturbed city. At this time it was instituted that, after the manner of the Eastern Church, hymns and Psalms should be sung, lest the people should pine away in the tediousness of sorrow; which custom, retained from then till now, is imitated by many, yea, by almost all of Thy congregations throughout the rest of the world.

16. Then didst Thou by a vision make known to Thy renowned bishop 2 the spot where lay the bodies of Gervasius and Protasius, the martyrs (whom Thou hadst in Thy secret storehouse preserved uncorrupted for so many years), whence Thou mightest at the fitting time produce them to repress the feminine but royal fury. For when they were revealed and dug up and with due honour transferred to the Ambrosian

1 The Bishop of Milan who preceded Ambrose was an Arian, and though Valentinian the First approved the choice of Ambrose as bishop, Justina, on his death, greatly troubled the Church. Ambrose subsequently had great influence; over both Valentinian the Second and his brother Gratian. The persecution referred to above, says Pusey, was "to induce him to give up to the Arians a church, the Portian Basilica without the walls; afterwards she asked for the new Basilica within the walls, which was larger." See Ambrose, Epp. 20-22;

Basilica, not only they who were troubled with unclean spirits (the devils confessing themselves) were healed, but a certain man also, who had been blind 1 many years, a well-known citizen of that city, having asked and been told the reason of the people's tumultuous joy, rushed forth, asking his guide to lead him thither. Arrived there, he begged to be permitted to touch with his handkerchief the bier of Thy saints, whose death is precious in Thy sight. 2 When he had done this, and put it to his eyes, they were forthwith opened. Thence did the fame spread; thence did Thy praises burn, shine; thence was the mind of that enemy, though not yet enlarged to the wholeness of believing, restrained from the fury of persecuting.

Thanks be to Thee, my God. Whence and whither hast Thou thus led my remembrance, that I should confess these things also unto Thee, great, though I, forgetful, had passed them over? And yet then, when the "savour" of Thy "ointments" was so fragrant, did we not "run after Thee."; And so I did the more abundantly weep at the singing of Thy hymns, formerly panting for Thee, and at last breathing in Thee, as far as the air can play in this house of grass.

Chap. viii. Of the conversion of Evodlus, and the death of his mother whom returning with him to Africa; and whose education he tenderly relates.

17. Thou, who makest men to dwell of one mind in a house, didst associate with us Evodius also, a young man of our city, who, when serving as an agent for Public Affairs, was converted unto Thee and baptized prior to us; and relinquishing his secular service, prepared himself for Thine.

* Ps. cxvi. 15. 3 Cant. i. 3, 4.

4 Ps. lxviii. 6. See viii. sec. 15, note, abort.

We were together, and together were we about to dwell with a holy purpose. We sought for some place where we might be most useful in our service to Thee, and were going back together to Africa. And when we were at the Tiberine Ostia my mother died. Much I omit, having much to hasten.

Keceive my confessions and thanksgivings, O my God, for innumerable things concerning which I am silent. But I will not omit aught that my soul has brought forth as to that Thy handmaid who brought me forth, in her flesh, that I might be born to this temporal light, and in her heart, that I might be born to life eternal. 2 I will speak not of her gifts, but Thine in her; for she neither made herself nor educated herself. Thou createdst her, nor did her father nor her mother know what a being was to proceed from them. And it was the rod of Thy Christ, the discipline of Thine only Son, that trained her in Thy fear, in the house of one of Thy faithful ones, who was a sound member of Thy Church. Yet this good discipline did she not so much attribute to the diligence of her mother, as that of a certain decrepit maidservant, who had carried about her father when an infant, as little ones are wont to be carried on the backs of elder girls. For which reason, and on account of her extreme age and very good character, was she much respected by the heads of that Christian house.
Whence also was committed to her the care of her master's daughters, which she with diligence performed, and was earnest in restraining them when necessary, with a holy severity, and instructing them with a sober sagacity.
For, excepting at the hours in which they were very temperately fed at their parents' table, she used not to permit them, though parched with thirst, to drink even water; thereby taking precautions against an evil custom, and adding the wholesome advice, " You drink water only because you have not control of wine; but when you have come to be married, and made mistresses of storeroom and cellar, you will despise water, but the habit of drinking will remain." By this method of instruction, and power of command, she restrained the longing of their tender age, and regulated the very thirst of the girls to such a becoming limit, as that what was not seemly they did not long for.

18. And yet as Thine handmaid related to me, her son
- there had stolen upon her a love of wine. For when she, as being a sober maiden, was as usual bidden by her parents to draw wine from the cask, the vessel being held under the opening, before she poured the wine into the bottle, she would wet the tips of her lips with a little, for more than that her inclination refused. For this she did not from any craving for drink, but out of the overflowing buoyancy of her time of life, which bubbles up with sportiveness, and is, in youthful spirits, wont to be repressed by the gravity of elders. And so Unto that little, adding daily littles (for " he that contemneth Small things shall fall by little and little "),* she contracted such a habit as to drink off eagerly her little cup nearly full of wine. "Where, then, was the sagacious old woman with her earnest restraint? Could anything prevail against a secret

I Ecclus. xix. 1. Augustine frequently alludes to the subtle power of little things. As when he says, illustrating (Serm. cclxxviii.) by the plagues of Egypt, tiny insects, if they be numerous enough, will be as harmful as the bite of great beasts; and (Serm. lvi.) a hill of sand, though composed of tiny grains, will crush a man as surely as the same weight of lead. Little drops (Serm. lviii.) make the river, and little leaks sink the ship; wherefore, he urges, little things must not be despised. "Men have usually," says Sedgwick in his Anatomy of Secret Sins, " been first wading in lesser sins who are now swimming in great transgressions."
It is in the little things of evil that temptation has its greatest strength. The snowflake is little and not to be accounted of, but from its multitudinous accumulation results the dread power of the avalanche. Satan often seems to act as it is said Pompey did, when he could not gain entrance to a city. He persuaded the citizens to admit a few of his weak and wounded soldiers, who, when they had become strong, opened the gates to his whole army. But if little things have such subtlety in temptation, they have likewise higher ministries. The Jews, in their Talmudical writings, have many parables illustrating how God by little filings tries and proves men to see if they are fitted for greater things. They say, for example, that He tried David when keeping sheep in the wilderness, to see whether he would be worthy to rule over Israel, the sheep of his inheritance, See Ch. Schoettgen, lior. Heb. et Talmud, i. 300.

CHAP. VIII.] THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD. 223

disease if Thy medicine, Lord, did not watch over us?
Father, mother, and nurturers absent, Thou present, who hast created, who callest, who also by those who are set over us workest some good for the salvation of our souls, what didst Thou at that time, my God? How didst Thou heal her?
How didst Thou make her whole? Didst Thou not out of another woman's soul evoke a hard and bitter insult, as a surgeon's knife from Thy secret store, and with one thrust remove all that putrefaction I 1 For the maid-servant who used to accompany her to the cellar, falling out, as it happens, with her little mistress, when she was alone with her, cast in her teeth this vice, with very bitter insult, calling her a "wine-bibber." Stung by this taunt, she perceived her foulness, and immediately condemned and renounced it. Even as friends by their flattery pervert, so do enemies by their taunts often correct us. Yet Thou renderest not unto them what Thou dost by them, but what was proposed by them For she, being angry, desired to irritate her young mistress, not to cure her; and did it in secret, either because the time and place of the dispute found them thus, or perhaps lest she herself should be exposed to danger for disclosing it so late.
But Thou, Lord, Governor of heavenly and earthly things, who convertest to Thy purposes the deepest torrents, and disposest the turbulent current of the ages, 2 healest one soul by the unsoundness of another; lest any man, when he remarks this, should attribute it unto his own power if another, whom he wishes to be reformed, is so through a word of his.

1 "'Animam oportet assiduis saliri tentationibus,' says St. Ambrose. Some errors and offences do rub salt upon a good man's integrity, that it may not putrefy with presumption." Bishop Hacket's Sermons, p. 210.

2 Not only is this true in private, but in public concerns. Even in the crucifixion of our Lord, the wicked rulers did (Acts iv. 26) what God's hand and jod's counsel had before determined to be done. Perhaps by reason of His infinite knowledge it is that God, who knows our thoughts long before (Ps. xxxix. 2, 4), weaves man's self-willed purposes into the pattern which His inscrutable Providence has before ordained. Or, to use Augustine's own words De Civ. Dei, xxii. 2), "It is true that wicked men do many things contrary to God's will; but so great is His wisdom and power, that all things which seem diverse to His purpose do still tend towards those just and good ends and issues which He Himself has foreknown."

Chap. ix. He describes the praiseworthy habits of his mother; her kindness towards her husband and her sons.

19. Being thus modestly and soberly trained, and rather made subject by Thee to her parents, than by her parents to Thee, when she had arrived at a marriageable age, she was given to a husband whom she served as her lord. And she busied herself to gain him to Thee, preaching Thee unto him by her behaviour; by which Thou madest her fair, and reverently amiable, and admirable unto her husband. For she so bore the wronging of her bed as never to have any dissension with her husband on account of it. For she waited for Thy mercy upon him, that by believing in Thee he might become chaste. And besides this, as he was earnest in friendship, so was he violent in anger; but she had learned that an angry husband should not be resisted, neither in deed, nor even in word. But so soon as he was grown calm and tranquil, and she saw a fitting moment, she would give him a reason for her conduct, should he have been excited without cause. In short, while many matrons, whose husbands were more gentle, carried the marks of blows on their dishonoured faces, and would in private conversation blame the lives of their husbands, she would blame their tongues, monishing them gravely, as if in jest: "That from the hour they heard what are called the matrimonial tablets I read to them, they should think of them as instruments whereby they were made servants; so, being always mindful of their condition, they ought not to set themselves in opposition to their lords."
And when they, knowing what a furious husband she endured, marvelled that it had never been reported, nor appeared by any indication, that Patricius had beaten his wife, or that there had been any domestic strife between them, even for a day, and asked her in confidence the reason of this, she taught them her rule, which I have mentioned above. They who observed it experienced the wisdom of it, and rejoiced; those who observed it not were kept in subjection, and suffered.

1 That is, not only from the time of actual marriage, but from the time of betrothal, when the contract was written upon tablets (see note 4, p. 216), and signed by the contracting parties. The future wife was then called sponsa sperata or pacta. Augustine alludes to this above (viii. sec. 7), when he says, " It is also the custom that the affianced bride {pacta, sponsa) should not immediately be given up, that the husband may not less esteem her whom, as betrothed, he longed not for " (wov suspiraverit sjwnsis). It should be remembered, in reading this section, that women amongst the Romans were not confined after the Eastern fashion of the Greeks to separate apartments, but had charge of the domestic arrangements and the training of the children.

20. Her mother-in-law, also, being at first prejudiced against her by the whisperings of evil-disposed servants, she so conquered by submission, persevering in it with patience and meekness, that she voluntarily disclosed to her son the tongues of the meddling servants, whereby the domestic peace between herself and her daughter-in-law had been agitated, begging him to punish them for it. When, therefore, he had in conformity with his mother's wish, and with a view to the discipline of his family, and to ensure the future harmony of its members corrected with stripes those discovered, according to the will of her who had discovered them, she promised a similar reward to any who, to please her, should say anything evil to her of her daughter-in-law. And, none now daring to do so, they lived together with a wonderful sweetness of mutual good-will.

21. This great gift Thou bestowedst also, my God, my mercy, upon that good handmaid of Thine, out of whose womb Thou createdst me, even that, whenever she could, she showed herself such a peacemaker between any differing and discordant spirits, that when she had heard on both sides most bitter things, such as swelling and undigested discord is wont to give vent to, when the crudities of enmities are breathed out in bitter speeches to a present friend against an absent enemy, she would disclose nothing about the one unto the other, save what might avail to their reconcilement. A small good this might seem to me, did I not know to my sorrow countless persons, who, through some horrible and far-spreading infection of sin, not only disclose to enemies mutually enraged the things said in passion against each other, but add some things that were never spoken at all; whereas, to a generous man, it ought to seem a small thing not to incite or increase the enmities of men by ill-speaking, unless he endeavour likewise by kind words to extinguish them. Such a one was she,

CON. F

Thou, her most intimate Instructor, teaching her in the school of her heart.

22. Finally, her own husband, now towards the end of his earthly existence, did she gain over unto Thee: and she had not to complain of that in him, as one of the faithful, which, before he became so, she had endured. She was also the servant of Thy servants. Whosoever of them knew her, did in her much magnify, honour, and love Thee; for that through the testimony of the fruits of a holy conversation, they perceived Thee to be present in her heart. For she had " been the wife of one man," had requited her parents, had guided her house piously, was " well-reported of for good works," had " brought up children," I as often travailing in birth of them 2 as she saw them swerving from Thee. Lastly, to all of us, O Lord (since of Thy favour Thou sufferest Thy servants to speak), who, before her sleeping in Thee, 3 lived associated together, having received the grace of Thy baptism, did she devote care such as she might if she had been mother of us all; served us as if she had been child of all

Chap. x. A conversation he had with his mother concerning the kingdom of heaven.

23. As the day now approached on which she was to depart this life (which day Thou knewest, we did not), it fell out Thou, as I believe, by Thy secret ways arranging it that she and I stood alone, leaning in a certain window, from which the garden of the house we occupied at Ostia could be seen; at which place, removed from the crowd, we were resting ourselves for the voyage, after the fatigues of a long journey. We then were conversing alone very pleasantly; and, " forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before," 4 we were seeking between ourselves in the presence of the Truth, which Thou art, of what nature the eternal life of the saints would be, which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man. 6 But yet we opened wide the mouth of our heart, after those supernal streams of Thy fountain,

"the fountain of life," which is "with Thee;" 1 that being sprinkled with it according to our capacity, we might in some measure weigh so high a mystery.

24. And when our conversation had arrived at that point, that the very highest pleasure of the carnal senses, and that in the very brightest material light, seemed by reason of the sweetness of that life not only not worthy of comparison, but not even of mention, we, lifting ourselves with a more ardent affection towards "the Self-same," 2 did gradually pass through all corporeal things, and even the heaven itself, whence sun, and moon, and stars shine upon the earth; yea, we soared higher yet by inward musing, and discoursing, and admiring Thy works; and we came to our own minds, and went beyond them, that we might advance as high as that region of unfailing plenty, where Thou feedest Israel 3 for ever with the food of truth, and where life is that Wisdom by whom all these things are made, both which have been, and which are to come; and she is not made, but is as she hath been, and so shall ever be; yea, rather, to "have been," and "to be hereafter," are not in her, but only "to be," seeing she is eternal, for to "have been" and "to be hereafter" are not eternal. And while we were thus speaking, and straining after her, we slightly touched her with the whole effort of our heart; and we sighed, and there left bound "the first-fruits of the Spirit;" 4 and returned to the noise of our own mouth, where the word uttered has both beginning and end. And what is like unto Thy Word, our Lord, who remaineth in Himself without becoming old, and "maketh all things new"? 6

25. We were saying, then, If to any man the tumult of the flesh were silenced, silenced the phantasies of earth, waters, and air, silenced, too, the poles; yea, the very soul be silenced to herself, and go beyond herself by not thinking of herself, silenced fancies and imaginary revelations, every tongue, and every sign, and whatsoever exists by passing away, since, if any could hearken, all these say, "We created not ourselves, but were created by Him who abideth for ever:" 2

4 Rom. viii. 23. 5 Wisd. vii. 27.

If, having uttered this, they now should be silenced, having only quickened our ears to Him who created them, and He alone speak not by them, but by Himself, that we may hear His word, not by fleshly tongue, nor angelic voice, nor sound of thunder, nor the obscurity of a similitude, but might hear Him Him whom in these we love without these, likeas we two now strained ourselves, and with rapid thought touched on that Eternal Wisdom which remaineth over all. If this could be sustained, and other visions of a far different kind be withdrawn, and this one ravish, and absorb, and envelope its beholder amid these inward joys, so that his life might be eternally like that one moment of knowledge which we now sighed after, were not this "Enter thou into the joy of Thy Lord"?* And when shall that be? When we shall all rise again; but all shall not be changed. 2

26. Such things was I saying; and if not after this manner, and in these words, yet, Lord, Thou knowest, that in that day when we were talking thus, this world with all its delights grew contemptible to us, even while we spake. Then said my mother, "Son, for myself, I have no longer any pleasure in aught in this life. What I want here further, and why I am here, I know not, now that my hopes in this world are satisfied. There was indeed one thing for which I wished to tarry a little in this life, and that was that I might see thee a Catholic Christian before I died. 3 My God has exceeded this abundantly, so that I see thee despising all earthly felicity, made His servant, what do I here?"

1 Matt. xxv. 21. * 1 Cor. xv. 51, however, is, "we shall all be changed."

3 Dean Stanley (Canterbury Sermons, serm. 10) draws the following, amongst other lessons, from God's dealings with Augustine. "It is an example," he says, "like the conversion of St. Paid, of the fact that from time to time God calls His servants not by gradual, but by sudden changes. These conversions are, it is true, the exceptions and not the rule of Providence, but such examples as Augustine show us that we must acknowledge the truth of the exceptions when they do occur. It is also an instance how, even in such sudden conversions, previous good influences have their weight. The prayers of his mother, the silent influence of his friend, the high character of Ambrose, the preparation for Christian truth in the writings of heathen philosophers, were all laid up, as it were, waiting for the spark, and, when it came, the fire flashed at once through every corner of his soul."

CHAP. XI.] PARTING WORDS. 229

Chap. xi His mother, attacked by fever, dies at Ostia.

27. What reply I made unto her to these things I do not well remember. However, scarcely five days after, or not much more, she was prostrated by fever; and while she was sick, she one day sank into a swoon, and was for a short time unconscious of visible things. We hurried up to her; but she soon regained her senses, and gazing on me and my brother as we stood by her, she said to us inquiringly, "Where was I?" Then looking intently at us stupefied with grief,

"Here," saith she, "shall you bury your mother." I was silent, and refrained from weeping; but my brother said something, wishing her, as the happier lot, to die in her own country and not abroad. She, when she heard this, with anxious countenance arrested him with her eye, as savouring of such things, and then gazing at me, " Behold," saith she, " what he saith;" and soon after to us both she saith, " Lay this body anywhere, let not the care for it trouble you at all. This only I ask, that you will remember me at the Lord's altar, wherever you be." And when she had given forth this opinion in such words as she could, she was silent, being in pain with her increasing sickness.

28. But, as I reflected on Thy gifts, thou invisible God, which Thou instilllest into the hearts of Thy faithful ones, whence such marvellous fruits do spring, I did rejoice and give thanks unto Thee, calling to mind what I knew before, how she had ever burned with anxiety respecting her burial-place, which she had provided and prepared for herself by the body of her husband. For as they had lived very peacefully together, her desire had also been (so little is the human mind capable of grasping things divine) that this should be added to that happiness, and be talked of among men, that after her wandering beyond the sea, it had been granted her that they both, so united on earth, should lie in the same grave. But when this uselessness had, through the bounty of Thy goodness, begun to be no longer in her heart, I knew not, and I was full of joy admiring what she had thus disclosed to me; though indeed in that our conversation in the window also, when she said, " What do I here any longer ? " she appeared not to desire to die in her own country. I heard afterwards, too, that at the time we were at Ostia, with a maternal confidence she one day, when I was absent, was speaking with certain of my friends on the contemning of this life, and the blessing of death; and when they amazed at the courage which Thou hadst given to her, a woman asked her whether she did not dread leaving her body at such a distance from her own city, she replied, " Nothing is far to God; nor need I fear lest He should be ignorant at the end of the world of the place whence He is to raise me up." On the ninth day, then, of her sickness, the fifty-sixth year of her age, and the thirty-third of mine, was that religious and devout soul set free from the body.

Chap. xir. How he mourned his dead mother.

29. I closed her eyes; and there flowed a great sadness into my heart, and it was passing into tears, when mine eyes at the same time, by the violent control of my mind, sucked back the fountain dry, and woe was me in such a struggle! But, as soon as she breathed her last, the boy Adeodatus burst out into wailing, but, being checked by us all, he became quiet.
In like manner also my own childish feeling, which was, through the youthful voice of my heart, finding escape in tears, was restrained and silenced. For we did not consider it fitting to celebrate that funeral with tearful plaints and groanings; I for on such wise are they who die unhappy, or

1 For this would be to sorrow as those that have no hope. Chrysostom accordingly frequently rebukes the Roman custom of hiring persons to wail for the dead (see e.g. Horn, xxxii. in Matt.); and Augustine in Serm. 2 of his De Consol. Mor. makes the same objection, and also reproves those Christians who imitated the Romans in wearing black as the sign of mourning. But still (as in his own case on the death of his mother) he admits that there is a grief at the departure of friends that is both natural and seemly. In a beautiful passage in his De Civ. Dei (xix. 8), he says: "That he who will have none of this sadness must, if possible, have no friendly intercourse. . . . Let him burst with ruthless insensibility the bonds of every human relationship;" and he continues: "Though the cure is effected all the more easily and rapidly the better condition the soul is in, we must not on this account suppose that there is nothing at all to heal."

See p. 234, note 1, below.

are altogether dead, wont to be mourned. But she neither died unhappy, nor did she altogether die. For of this were we assured by the witness of her good conversation, her "faith unfeigned," 1 and other sufficient grounds.

30. What, then, was that which did grievously pain me within, but the newly-made wound, from having that most sweet and dear habit of living together suddenly broken off ?
I was full of joy indeed in her testimony, when, in that her last illness, flattering my dutifulness, she called me "kind," and recalled, with great affection of love, that she had never heard any harsh or reproachful sound come out of my mouth against her. But yet, my God, who madest us, how can the honour which I paid to her be compared with her slavery for me ? As, then, I was left destitute of so great comfort in her, my soul was stricken, and that life torn apart as it were, which, of hers and mine together, had been made but one.

31. The boy then being restrained from weeping, Evodius took up the Psalter, and began to sing the whole house responding the Psalm, "I will sing of mercy and judgment: unto Thee, Lord." 2 But when they heard what we were doing, many brethren and religious women came together; and whilst they whose office it was were, according to custom, making ready for the funeral, I, in a part of the house where I conveniently could, together with those who thought that I ought not to be left alone, discoursed on what was suited to the occasion; and by this alleviation of truth mitigated the anguish known unto Thee they being unconscious of it, listened intently, and thought me to be devoid of any sense of sorrow. But in Thine ears, where none of them keard, did I blame the softness of my feelings, and restrained the flow of my grief, which yielded a little unto me; but the paroxysm returned again, though not so as to burst forth into tears, nor to a change of countenance, though I knew what I repressed in my heart. And as I was exceedingly annoyed that these human things had such power over me, 1 which in the due order and destiny of our natural condition must of necessity come to pass, with a new sorrow I sorrowed for my sorrow, and was wasted by a twofold sadness.

2 Ps. ci. 1. "I suppose they continued to the end of Psalm cii. This was the primitive fashion; Nazianzen says that his speechless sister Gorgonia's lips muttered the fourth Psalm: 'I will lie down in peace and sleep.' As St. Austen lay a dying, the company prayed (Possid.). That they had prayers between the departure and the burial, see Tertull. De Anima, c. 51. They used to sing both at the departure and burial. Nazianzen, Orat. 10, says, the dead Csesarius was carried from hymns to hymns. The priests were called to sing (Chrysost. Horn. 70, ad Antioch). They sang the 116th Psalm usually (see Chrysost. Horn. 4, in c. 2, ad Hbrmos)." W. W. See also note, p. 237, below.

32. So, when the body was carried forth, we both went and returned without tears. For neither in those prayers which we poured forth unto Thee when the sacrifice of our redemption 2 was offered up unto Thee for her, the dead body being now placed by the side of the grave, as the custom there is, prior to its being laid therein, neither in their prayers did I shed tears; yet was I most grievously sad in secret all the day, and with a troubled mind entreated Thee, as I was able, to heal my sorrow, but Thou didst not; fixing, I believe, in my memory by this one lesson the power of the bonds of all habit, even upon a mind which now feeds not upon a fallacious word. It appeared to me also a good thing to go and bathe, I having heard that the bath [balneum] took its name from the Greek ftaXavelov, because it drives trouble from the mind. Lo, this also I confess unto Thy mercy,

"Father of the fatherless," 3 that I bathed, and felt the same as before I had done so. For the bitterness of my grief exuded not from my heart. Then I slept, and on awaking found my grief not a little mitigated; and as I lay alone upon 8 "Here my Popish translator says, that the sacrifice of the mass was offered for the dead. That the ancients had communion with their burials, I confess. But for what? (1) To testify their dying in the communion of the Church. (2) To give thanks for their departure. (3) To pray God to give them place in His Paradise. (4) and a part in the first resurrection; but not as a propitiatory sacrifice to deliver them out of purgatory, which the mass is now only meant for." W. W. See also note, p. 237.

my bed, there came into my mind those true verses of Thy Ambrose, for Thou art

" Dens creator omnium, Polique rector, vestiens Diem decoro lumine, Noctem sopora gratia; Artus solutos ut quies Reddat laboris usui, Mentesque fessas allevet, Luctusque solvat anxios. " *

33. And then little by little did I bring back my former thoughts of Thine handmaid, her devout conversation towards Thee, her holy tenderness and attentiveness towards us, which was suddenly taken away from me; and it was pleasant to me to weep in Thy sight, for her and for me, concerning her and concerning myself. And I set free the tears which before I repressed, that they might flow at their will, spreading them beneath my heart; and it rested in them, for Thy ears were nigh me, not those of man, who would have put a scornful interpretation on my weeping. But now in writing I confess it unto Thee, Lord! Eead it who will, and interpret how he will; and if he finds me to have sinned in weeping for my mother during so small a part of an hour, that mother who was for a while dead to mine eyes, who had for many years wept for me, that I might live in Thine eyes, let him not laugh at me, but rather, if he be a man of a noble charity, let him weep for my sins against Thee, the Father of all the brethren of Thy Christ.

1 Rendered as follows in a translation of the first ten books of the Confessions, described on the title-page as " Printed by J. C, for John Crook, and are to be sold at the sign of the 'Ship,' in St. Paul's Churchyard. 1660":

" God, the world's great Architect, Who dost heaven's rowling orbs direct; Cloathing the day with beauteous light, And with sweet slumbers silent night; When wearied limbs new vigour gain From rest, new labours to sustain; When hearts oppressed do meet relief, And anxious minds forget their grief. "

See x. sec. 52, below, where this hymn is referred to.
Chap. xiii. He entreats God for her sins, and admonishes his readers to remember her piously.

34. But, my heart being now healed of that wound, in so far as it could be convicted of a carnal affection, I pour out unto Thee, our God, on behalf of that Thine handmaid, tears of a far different sort, even that which flows from a spirit broken by the thoughts of the dangers of every soul that dieth in Adam. And although she, having been " made alive " in Christ 2 even before she was freed from the flesh, had so lived as to praise Thy name both by her faith and conversation, yet dare I not say 3 that from the time Thou didst regenerate her by baptism, no word went forth from her mouth against Thy precepts. 4 And it hath been declared by Thy Son, the Truth, that " Whosoever shall say to his brother, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire." 5 And woe even unto the praiseworthy life of man, if, putting away mercy, Thou shouldst in-

1 Rom. viii. 7.

2 1 Cor. xv. 22. The universalists of every age have interpreted the word " all " here so as to make salvation by Christ Jesus extend to every child of Adam. If their interpretation were true, Monica's spirit need not have been troubled at the thought of the danger of unregenerate souls. But Augustine in his Be Civ, Dei, xiii. 23, gives the import of the word: "Not that all who die in Adam shall be members of Christ, for the great majority shall be punished in eternal death, but he uses the word 'all ' in both clauses because, as no one dies in an animal body except in Adam, so no one is quickened a spiritual body save in Christ." See x. sec. 68, note 1, below.

3 For to have done so would have been to go perilously near to the heresy of the Pelagians, who laid claim to the possibility of attaining perfection in this life by the power of free-will, and without the assistance of divine grace; and went even so far, he tells us {Ep. clxxvi. 2), as to say that those who had so attained need not utter the petition for forgiveness in the Lord's Prayer, ut ei non sit jam necessarium dicere ' ' Dimitte nobis debita nostra. " Those in our own day who enunciate perfectionist theories, though, it is true, not denying the grace of God as did these, may well ponder Augustine's forcible words in his De Pecc. Mer. et Rem. iii. 13: " Optandum est ut fiat, conandum est ut fiat, supplicandum est ut fiat; non tamen quasi factum fuerit, confitendum. " "We are indeed commanded to be perfect (Matt. v. 48); and the philosophy underlying the command is embalmed in the words of the proverb, " Aim high, and you will strike high." But he who lives nearest to God will have the humility of heart which will make him ready to confess that in His sight he is a " miserable sinner." Some interesting remarks on this subject will be found in Augustine's De Civ. Dei, xiv. 9, on the text, " If we say we have no sin, "etc. (1 John i. 8.) On sins after baptism, see note on next section.

vestigate it. But because Thou dost not narrowly inquire after sins, we hope with confidence to find some place of indulgence with Thee. But whosoever recounts his true merits to Thee, what is it that he recounts to Thee but Thine own gifts? Oh, if men would know themselves to be men; and that " he that glorieth " would " glory in the Lord!

35. I then, my Praise and my Life, Thou God of my heart, putting aside for a little her good deeds, for which I joyfully give thanks to Thee, do now beseech Thee for the sins of my mother. Hearken unto me, through that Medicine of our wounds who hung upon the tree, and who, sitting at Thy right hand, " maketh intercession for us." 3 I know that she acted mercifully, and from the heart 4 forgave her debtors their debts; do Thou also forgive her debts, 6 whatever she contracted during so many years since the water of salvation.
Forgive her, O Lord, forgive her, I beseech Thee; " enter not into judgment " with her. 6
Let Thy mercy be exalted above Thy justice, 7 because Thy words are true, and Thou hast promised mercy unto " the merciful; " 8 which Thou gavest them to be who wilt " have mercy " on whom Thou wilt " have mercy," and wilt " have compassion " on whom Thou hast had compassion. 9

1 There is a passage parallel to this in his Ep. to Sextus (cxciv. 19). "Merits" therefore would appear to be used simply in the sense of good actions. Compare sec. 17, above, xiii. sec. 1, below, and Ep. cv. That righteousness is not by merit, appears from Ep. cxciv.; Ep. clxvii., to Innocent; and Serm. ccxiii.

3 2 Cor. x. 17. 3 Rom. viii. 34. * Matt, xviii. 35.

8 Matt. vi. 12. Augustine here as elsewhere applies this petition in the Lord's Prayer to the forgiveness of sins after baptism. He does so constantly. For example, in his Ep.
cclxv. he says: ' We do not ask for those to be forgiven which we doubt not were forgiven in baptism; but those which, though small, are frequent, and spring from the frailty of human nature." Again, in his Con. Ep. Parmen. ii. 10, after using almost the same words, he points out that it is a prayer against daily sins; and in his De Civ. Dei, xxi. 27, where he examines the passage in relation to various erroneous beliefs, he says it " was a daily prayer He [Christ] was teaching, and it was certainly to disciples already justified He was speaking. What, then, does He mean by ' your sins' (Matt. vi. 14), but those sins from which not even you who are justified and sanctified can be free?" See note on the previous section; and also for the feeling in the early Church as to sins after baptism, the

36. And I believe Thou hast already done that which I ask Thee; but " accept the free-will offerings of my mouth, O Lord." x For she, when the day of her dissolution was near at hand, took no thought to have her body sumptuously covered, or embalmed with spices; nor did she covet a choice monument, or desire her paternal burial-place. These things she entrusted not to us, but only desired to have her name remembered at Thy altar, which she had served without the omission of a single day; 2 whence she knew that the holy sacrifice was dispensed, by which the handwriting that was against us is blotted out; 3 by which the enemy was triumphed over, 4 who, summing up our offences, and searching for something to bring against us, found nothing in Him 5 in whom we conquer. Who will restore to Him the innocent blood? Who will repay Him the price with which He bought us, so is to take us from Him? Unto the sacrament of which our ransom did Thy handmaid bind her soul by the bond of faith. Let none separate her from Thy protection. Let not the " lion " and the " dragon " 6 introduce himself by force or fraud. For she will not reply that she owes nothing, lest she be convicted and got the better of by the wily deceiver; but she will answer that her '' sins are forgiven '' 7 by Him to whom no one is able to repay that price which He, owing nothing, laid down for us.

37. May she therefore rest in peace with her husband, before or after whom she married none; whom she obeyed, with patience bringing forth fruit 8 unto Thee, that she might gain him also for Thee. And inspire, O my Lord my God, inspire Thy servants my brethren, Thy sons my masters, who with voice and heart and writings I serve, that so many of them as shall read these confessions may at Thy altar remember Monica, Thy handmaid, together with Patricius, her sometime husband, by whose flesh Thou introductionst me into this life, in what manner I know not. May they with pious affection be mindful of my parents in this transitory light, of my brethren that are under Thee our Father in our Catholic mother, and of my fellow-citizens in the eternal Jerusalem, which the wandering of Thy people sigheth for from their departure until their return. That so my mother's last entreaty to me may, through my confessions more than through my prayers, be more abundantly fulfilled to her through the prayers of many. I 1 The origin of prayers for the dead dates back probably to the close of the second century. In note 3, p. 109, we have quoted from Tertullian's De Corona Militis, where he says, "Oblationes pro defunctis pro natalitiis annua die facimus." In his De Monogamia, he speaks of a widow praying for her departed husband, that "he might have rest, and be a partaker in the first resurrection."

From this time a catena of quotations from the Fathers might be given, if space permitted, showing how, beginning with early expressions of hope for the dead, there, in process of time, arose prayers even for the unregenerate, until at last there was developed purgatory on the one side, and creature-worship on the other.

That Augustine did not entertain the idea of creature-worship will be seen from his Ep. to Maximus, xvii. 5. In his De Dulcit. Quwst. 2 (where he discusses the whole question), he concludes that prayer must not be made for all, because all have not led the same life in the flesh. Still, in his Enarr. in Ps. cviii. 17, he argues from the case of the rich man in the parable, that the departed do certainly "have a care for us." Aerius, towards the close of the fourth century, objected to prayers for the dead, chiefly on the ground (see Usher's Answer to a Jesuit, iii. 258) of their uselessness. In the Church of England, as will be seen by reference to Reeling's Liturg'ue Britannfcoz, pp. 210, 335, 339, and 341, prayers for the dead were eliminated from the second Prayer Book; and to the prudence of this step Palmer bears testimony in his Origines Liturgica, iv. 10, justifying it on the ground that the retaining of these prayers implied a belief in her holding the doctrine of purgatory. Reference may be made to Epiphanius, Adv. Hcer. 75; Bishop Bull, SermonZ; and Bingham, xv. 3, sees. 15, 16, and xxii . 3, sec. 13.

238 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK X.]

BOOK TENTH.

Chap. i. In God alone is the hope and joy of man.

1. T ET me know Thee, Thou who knowest me; let me J_J know Thee, as I am known. 1 Thou strength of my soul, enter into it, and prepare it for Thyself, that Thou mayest have and hold it without "spot or wrinkle." 2 This is my hope, "therefore have I spoken;" 3 and in this hope do I rejoice, when I rejoice soberly. Other things of this life ought the less to be sorrowed for, the more they are sorrowed for; and ought the more to be sorrowed for, the less men do sorrow for them. For behold, "Thou desirest truth," 4 seeing that he who does it "cometh to the light." 6 This wish I to do in confession in my heart before Thee, and in my writing before many witnesses.

Chap. ii. That all things are manifest to God. That confession unto Him is not made by the words of the flesh, but of the soul, and the cry of reflection.

2. And from Thee, Lord, unto whose eyes the depths of man's conscience are naked/ what in me could be hidden though I were unwilling to confess to Thee ? For so should I hide Thee from myself, not myself from Thee. But now, because my groaning witnesseth that I am dissatisfied with myself, Thou shinest forth, and satisfiest, and art beloved and desired; that I may blush for myself, and renounce myself, and choose Thee, and may neither please Thee nor myself, except in Thee. To Thee then, O Lord, am I manifest, whatever I am, and with what fruit I may confess unto Thee I have spoken. Nor do I it with words and sounds of the flesh, but with the words of the soul, and that cry of reflection which Thine ear knoweth. For when I am wicked, to confess to Thee is naught but to be dissatisfied with myself; but when I am truly devout, it is naught but not to attribute it to myself, because Thou, Lord, dost "bless the righteous;" * but first Thou justifiest him "ungodly." 2 My confession, therefore, my God, in Thy sight, is made unto Thee silently, and yet not silently. For in noise it is silent, in affection it cries aloud. For neither do I give utterance to anything that is right unto men which Thou hast not heard from me before, nor dost Thou hear anything of the kind from me which Thyself saidst not first unto me.

CHAP. III.] WHY HE CONFESSETH. 239

Chap. hi. He who confesseth rightly unto God best knoweth himself.

3. What then have I to do with men, that they should hear my confessions, as if they were going to cure all my diseases ? A people curious to know the lives of others, but slow to correct their own. Why do they desire to hear from me what I am, who are unwilling to hear from Thee what they are ? And how can they tell, when they hear from me of myself, whether I speak the truth, seeing that no man knoweth what is in man, "save the spirit of man which is in him " ? But if they hear from Thee aught concerning themselves, they will not be able to say, "The Lord lieth." For what is it to hear from Thee of themselves, but to know themselves? And who is he that knoweth himself and saith, "It is false," unless he himself lieth? But because "charity believeth all things" 5 (amongst those at all events whom by union with itself it maketh one), I too, Lord, also so confess unto Thee that men may hear, to whom I cannot prove whether I confess the truth, yet do they believe me whose ears charity openeth unto me.

4. But yet do Thou, my most secret Physician, make clear to me what fruit I may reap by doing it. For the confessions of my past sins, which Thou hast "forgiven" and "covered," I that Thou mightest make me happy in Thee, changing my soul by faith and Thy sacrament, when they are read and heard, stir up the heart, that it sleep not in despair and say, "I cannot;" but that it may awake in the love of Thy mercy and the sweetness of Thy grace, by which he that is weak is strong, 2 if by it he is made conscious of his own weakness. As for the good, they take delight in hearing of the past errors of such as are now freed from them; and they delight, not because they are errors, but because they have been and are so no longer. For what fruit, then, O Lord my God, to whom my conscience maketh her daily confession, more confident in the hope of Thy mercy than in her own innocency, -for what fruit, I beseech Thee, do I confess even to men in Thy presence by this book what I am at this time, not what I have been? For that fruit I have both seen and spoken of, but what I am at this time, at the very moment of making my confessions, divers people desire to know, both who knew me and who knew me not, who have heard of or from me, but their ear is not at my heart, where I am whatsoever I am. They are desirous, then, of hearing me confess what I am? within, where they can neither stretch eye, nor ear, nor mind; they desire it as those willing to believe, but will they understand? For charity, by which they are good, says unto them that I do not lie in my confessions, and she in them believes me.

Chap. iv. That in his Confessions he may do good, he considers others.

5. But for what fruit do they desire this? Do they wish me happiness when they learn how near, by Thy gift, I come unto Thee; and to pray for me, when they learn how much I am kept back by my own weight? To such will I declare myself. For it is no small fruit, Lord my God, that by many thanks should oe given to Thee on our behalf, 1 and that by many Thou shouldest be entreated for us. Let the fraternal soul love that in me which Thou teachest should be loved, and lament that in me which Thou teachest should be lamented. Let a fraternal and not an alien soul do this, nor that "of strange children, whose mouth speaketh vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood," 2 but that fraternal one which, when it approves me, rejoices for me, but when it disapproves me, is sorry for me; because whether it approves or disapproves it loves me. To such will I declare myself; let them breathe freely at my good deeds, and sigh over my evil ones. My good deeds are Thy institutions and Thy gifts, my evil ones are my delinquencies and Thy judgments. 3 Let them breathe freely at the one, and sigh over the other; and let hymns and tears ascend into Thy sight out of the fraternal hearts Thy censers. 4 And do Thou, O Lord, who takest delight in the incense of Thy holy temple, have mercy upon me according to Thy great mercy, 5 "for Thy name's sake;" 6 and on no account leaving what Thou hast begun in me, do Thou complete what is imperfect in me.

6. This is the fruit of my confessions, not of what I was, but of what I am, that I may confess this not before Thee only, in a secret exultation with trembling, 7 and a secret sorrow with hope, but in the ears also of the believing sons of men, partakers of my joy, and sharers of my mortality, my fellowcitizens and the companions of my pilgrimage, those who are gone before, and those that are to follow after, and the comrades of my way. These are Thy servants, my brethren, those whom Thou wishest to be Thy sons; my masters, whom Thou hast commanded me to serve, if I desire to live with and of Thee.

2 Cor. i. 11. 2 Ps. cxiv. 11.

3 In note 6, p. 83, we have seen how God makes man's sin its own punishment. Reference may also be made to Augustine's Con. Advers. Leg. et Proph. i. 14, where he argues that "the punishment of a man's disobedience is found in himself, when he in his turn cannot get obedience even from himself." And again, in his De Lib. Arb. v. 18, he says, God punishes by taking from him that which he does not use well, "et qui recte facere cum possit noluit amittat posse cum velit." danger, were it not that my soul, under Thy wings, is subject unto Thee, and my weakness known unto Thee. I am a little one, but my Father liveth for ever, and my Defender is "sufficient" for me. For He is the same who begat me and who defends me; and Thou Thyself art all my good; even Thou, the Omnipotent, who art with me, and that before I am with Thee. To such, therefore, whom Thou commandest me to serve will I declare, not what I was, but what "I now am, and what I still am. But neither do I judge myself. 2 Thus then I would be heard.

Chap. v. That man knoweth not himself ivholy.

7. For it is Thou, Lord, that judgest me; 3 for although no "man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him," 4 yet is there something of man which "the spirit of man which is in him" itself knoweth not. But Thou, Lord, who hast made him, knowest him wholly. I indeed, though in Thy sight I despise myself, and reckon "myself but dust and ashes," 5 yet know something concerning Thee, which I know not concerning myself. And assuredly "now we see through a glass darkly," not yet "face to face." 6 So long, therefore, as I be "absent" from Thee, I am more "present" with myself than with Thee; 7 and yet know I that Thou canst not suffer violence; 8 but for myself I know not what temptations I am able to resist, and what I am not able. 9 But there is hope, because Thou art faithful, who wilt not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able, but wilt with the temptation also make a way to escape, that we may be able to bear it. I would therefore confess what I know concerning myself; I will confess also what I know not concerning myself. And because what I do know of myself, I know by Thee enlightening me; and what I know not of myself, so long I know not until the time when my " darkness be as the noonday " 2 in Thy sight.

Chap. VI. The love of God, in His nature superior to all creatures, is acquired by the knowledge of the senses and the exercise of reason.

8. Not with uncertain, but with assured consciousness do I love Thee, O Lord. Thou hast stricken my heart with Thy word, and I loved Thee. And also the heaven, and earth, and all that is therein, behold, on every side they say that I should love Thee; nor do they cease to speak unto all, " so that they are without excuse." 3 But more profoundly wilt Thou have mercy on whom Thou wilt have mercy, and compassion on whom Thou wilt have compassion, 4 otherwise do both heaven and earth tell forth Thy praises to deaf ears But what is it that I love in loving Thee? Not corporeal beauty, nor the splendour of time, nor the radiance of the light, so pleasant to our eyes, nor the sweet melodies of songs of all kinds, nor the fragrant smell of flowers, and ointments, and spices, not manna and honey, not limbs pleasant to the embraces of flesh. I love not these things when I love my God; and yet I love a certain kind of light, and sound, and fragrance, and food, and embrace in loving my God, who is the light, sound, fragrance, food, and embrace of my inner man where that light shineth unto my soul which no place can contain, where that soundeth which time snatcheth not away, where there is a fragrance which no breeze disperseth, where there is a food which no eating can diminish, and where that clingeth which no satiety can sunder. This is what I love, when I love my God.

9. And what is this? I asked the earth; and it answered, "I am not He;" and whatsoever are therein made the same confession. I asked the sea and the deeps, and the creeping things that lived, and they replied, " We are not thy God, seek higher than we." I asked the breezy air, and the universal air with its inhabitants answered, "Anaximenes I was deceived, I am not God." I asked the heavens, the sun, moon, and stars: " Neither," say they, " are we the God whom thou seekest." And I answered unto all these things which stand about the door of my flesh, " Ye have told me concerning my God, that ye are not He; tell me something about Him." And with a loud voice they exclaimed, " He made us." My questioning was my observing of them; and their beauty was their reply. 2 And I directed my thoughts to myself, and said, " Who art thou? " And I answered, " A man." And lo, in me there appear both body and soul, the one without, the other within. By which of these should I seek my God, whom I had sought through the body from earth to heaven, as far as I was able to send messengers the beams of mine eyes?

But the better part is that which is inner; for to it, as both president and judge, did all these my corporeal messengers render the answers of heaven and earth and all things therein, who said, "We are not God, but He made us." These things was my inner man cognizant of by the ministry of the outer; I, the inner man, knew all this I, the soul, through the senses of my body. I asked the vast bulk of the earth of my God, and it answered me, "I am not He, but He made me."

10. Is not this beauty visible to all whose senses are unimpaired? Why then doth it not speak the same things unto all? Animals, the very small and the great, see it, but they are unable to question it, because their senses are not endowed with reason to enable them to judge on what they report. But men can question it, so that "the invisible things of Him . . . are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made;" but by loving them, they are brought into subjection to them; and subjects are not able to judge. Neither do the creatures reply to such as question them, unless they can judge; nor will they alter their voice (that is, their beauty), if so be one man only sees, another both sees and questions, so as to appear one way to this man, and another to that; but appearing the same way to both, it is mute to this, it speaks to that yea, verily, it speaks unto all; but they only understand it who compare that voice received from without with the truth within. For the truth declareth unto me, "Neither heaven, nor earth, nor any body is thy God." This, their nature declareth unto him that beholdeth them. "They are a mass; a mass is less in part than in the whole." Now, my soul, thou art my better part, unto thee I speak; for thou animatest the mass of thy body, giving it life, which no body furnishes to a body; but thy God is even unto thee the Life of life.

Chap. VII. That God is to be found neither from the powers of the body nor of the soul.

11. What then is it that I love when I love my God?
Who is He that is above the head of my soul? By my soul itself will I mount up unto Him. w I will soar beyond that power of mine wherewith I cling to the body, and fill the whole structure of it with life. Not by that power do I find my God; for then the horse and the mule, "which have no understanding," 2 might find Him, since it is the same power by which their bodies also live. But there is another power, not that only by which I quicken, but that also by which I endow with sense my flesh, which the Lord hath made for me; bidding the eye not to hear, and the ear not to see; but that, for me to see by, and this, for me to hear by; and to each of the other senses its own proper seat and office, which being different, I, the single mind, do through them govern. I will soar also beyond this power of mine; for this the horse and mule possess, for they too discern through the body.

Chap. viii. Of the nature and the amazing power of memory.

12. I will soar, then, beyond this power of my nature also, ascending by degrees unto Him who made me. And I enter the fields and roomy chambers of memory, where are the treasures of countless images, imported into it from all manner of things by the senses. There is treasured up whatsoever likewise we think, either by enlarging or diminishing, or by varying in any way whatever those things which the sense hath arrived at; yea, and whatever else hath been entrusted to it and stored up, which oblivion hath not yet engulfed and buried. When I am in this storehouse, I demand that what I wish should be brought forth, and some things immediately appear; others require to be longer sought after, and are dragged, as it were, out of some hidden receptacle; others, again, hurry forth in crowds, and while another thing is sought and inquired for, they leap into view, as if to say, "Is it not we, perchance?" These I drive away with the hand of my heart from before the face of my remembrance, until what I wish be discovered making its appearance out of its secret cell. Other things suggest themselves without effort, and in continuous order, just as they are called for, those in front giving place to those that follow, and in giving place are treasured up again to be forthcoming when I wish it. All of which takes place when I repeat a thing from memory.

13. All these things, each of which entered by its own avenue, are distinctly and under general heads there laid up:
as, for example, light, and all colours and forms of bodies, by the eyes; sounds of all kinds by the ears; all smells by the passage of the nostrils; all flavours by that of the mouth; and by the sensation of the whole body is brought in what is hard or soft, hot or cold, smooth or rough, heavy or light, whether external or internal to the body. All these doth that great receptacle of memory, with its many and indescribable departments, receive, to be recalled and brought forth when required; each, entering by its own door, is laid up in it.

And yet the things themselves do not enter it, but only the images of the things perceived are there ready at hand for thought to recall. And who can tell how these images are formed, notwithstanding that it is evident by which of the senses each has been fetched in and treasured up? For even while I live in darkness and silence, I can bring out colours in memory if I wish, and discern between black and white, and what others I wish; nor yet do sounds break in and disturb what is drawn in by mine eyes, and which I am considering, seeing that they also are there, and are concealed, laid up, as it were, apart. For these too I can summon if I please, and immediately they appear. And though my tongue be at rest, and my throat silent, yet can I sing as much as I will; and those images of colours, which notwithstanding are there, do not interpose themselves and interrupt when another treasure is under consideration which flowed in through the ears. So the remaining things carried in and heaped up by the other senses, I recall at my pleasure. And I discern the scent of lilies from that of violets while smelling nothing; and I prefer honey to grape-syrup, a smooth thing to a rough, though then I neither taste nor handle, but only remember.

14. These things do I within, in that vast chamber of my memory. For there are nigh me heaven, earth, sea, and whatever I can think upon in them, besides those which I have forgotten. There also do I meet with myself, and recall myself, what, when, or where I did a thing, and how I was affected when I did it. There are all which I remember, either by personal experience or on the faith of others. Out of the same supply do I myself with the past construct now this, now that likeness of things, which either I have experienced, or, from having experienced, have believed; and thence again future actions, events, and hopes, and upon all these again do I meditate as if they were present. " I will do this or that," say I to myself in that vast womb of my mind, filled with the images of things so many and so great, ", and this or that shall follow upon it." " Oh that this or that might come to pass!" " God avert this or that!" Thus speak I to myself; and when I speak, the images of all I speak about are present, out of the same treasury of memory; nor could I say anything at all about them were the images absent.
15. Great is this power of memory, exceeding great, my God, an inner chamber large and boundless! Who has plumbed the depths thereof? Yet it is a power of mine, and appertains unto my nature; nor do I myself grasp all that I am. Therefore is the mind too narrow to contain itself. And where should that be which it doth not contain of itself? Is it outside and not in itself? How is it, then, that it doth not grasp itself? A great admiration rises upon me; astonishment seizes me. And men go forth to wonder at the heights of mountains, the huge waves of the sea, the broad flow of the rivers, the extent of the ocean, and the courses of the stars, and omit to wonder at themselves; nor do they marvel that when I spoke of all these things, I was not looking on them with my eyes, and yet could not speak of them unless those mountains, and waves, and rivers, and stars which I saw, and that ocean which I believe in, I saw inwardly in my memory, and with the same vast spaces between as when I saw them abroad. But I did not by seeing appropriate them when I looked on them with my eyes; nor are the things themselves with me, but their images. And I knew by what corporeal sense each made impression on me.

Chap. ix. Not only things, but also literature and images, are taken from the memory, and are brought forth by the act of remembering.

16. And yet are not these all that the illimitable capacity of my memory retains. Here also is all that is apprehended of the liberal sciences, and not yet forgotten removed as it were into an inner place, which is not a place; nor are they the images which are retained, but the things themselves. For what is literature, what skill in disputation, whatsoever I know of all the many kinds of questions there are, is so in my memory, as that I have not taken in the image and left the thing without, or that it should have sounded and passed away like a voice imprinted on the ear by that trace, whereby it might be recorded, as though it sounded when it no longer did so; or as an odour while it passes away, and vanishes into wind, affects the sense of smell, whence it conveys the image of itself into the memory, which we realize in recollecting; or like food, which assuredly in the belly hath now no taste, and yet hath a kind of taste in the memory, or like anything that is by touching felt by the body, and which even when removed from us is imagined by the memory. For these things themselves are not put into it, but the images of them only are caught up, with a marvellous quickness, and laid up, as it were, in most wonderful garners, and wonderfully brought forth when we remember.

CHAP. XI.] CONTENTS OF MEMORY. 249

Chap. x. Literature is not introduced to the memory through the senses, but it brought forth from its more secret places.

17. But truly when I hear that there are three kinds of questions, "Whether a thing is? what it is? of what kind it is?" I do indeed hold fast the images of the sounds of which these words are composed, and I know that those sounds passed through the air with a noise, and now are not. But the things themselves which are signified by these sounds I never arrived at by any sense of the body, nor ever perceived them otherwise than by my mind; and in my memory have I laid up not their images, but themselves, which, how they entered into me, let them tell if they are able. For I examine all the gates of my flesh, but find not by which of them they entered. For the eyes say, "If they were coloured, we announced them." The ears say, "If they sounded, we gave notice of them." The nostrils say, "If they smell, they passed in by us." The sense of taste says, "If they have no flavour, ask not me." The touch says, "If it have not body, I handled it not, and if I never handled it, I gave no notice of it."

Whence and how did these things enter into my memory? I know not how. For when I learned them, I gave not credit to the heart of another man, but perceived them in my own; and I approved them as true, and committed them to it, laying them up, as it were, whence I might fetch them when I willed. There, then, they were, even before I learned them, but were not in my memory. Where were they, then, or wherefore, when they were spoken, did I acknowledge them, and say, "So it is, it is true," unless as being already in the memory, though so put back and concealed, as it were, in more secret caverns, that had they not been drawn forth by the advice of another I would not, perchance, have been able to conceive of them?

Chap. xi. What it is to learn and to think.

18. Wherefore we find that to learn these things, whose

images we drink not in by our senses, but perceive within as they are by themselves, without images, is nothing else but by meditation as it were to concentrate, and by observing to take care that those notions which the memory did before contain scattered and confused, be laid up at hand, as it were, in that same memory, where before they lay concealed, scattered and neglected, and so the more easily present themselves to the mind well accustomed to observe them. And how many things of this sort does my memory retain which have been found out already, and, as I said, are, as it were, laid up ready to hand, which we are said to have learned and to have known; which, should we for small intervals of time cease to recall, they are again so submerged and slide back, as it were, into the more remote chambers, that they must be evoked thence again as if new (for other sphere they have none), and must be marshalled [cogenda] again that they may become known; that is to say, they must be collected [colligenda], as it were, from their dispersion; whence we have the word cogitare. For cogo [I collect] and cogito [I re-collect] have the same relation to each other as ago and agito, facio and factito. But the mind has appropriated to itself this word [cognition], so that not that which is collected anywhere, but what is collected, 1 that is marshalled, 2 in the mind, is properly said to be "cogitated." 3

Chap. xii. On the recollection of things mathematical.

19. The memory containeth also the reasons and innumerable laws of numbers and dimensions, none of which hath any sense of the body impressed, seeing they have neither colour, nor sound, nor taste, nor smell, nor sense of touch. I have heard the sound of the words by which these things are signified when they are discussed; but the sounds are one thing, the things another. For the sounds are one thing in Greek, another in Latin; but the things themselves are neither Greek, nor Latin, nor any other language. I have seen the lines of the craftsmen, even the finest, like a spider's web; but these are of another kind, they are not the images of 1 Colligitur. 2 Cogitur. 3 Cogitari.

CHAP. XIV.] CONTENTS OF MEMORY. 251

those which the eye of my flesh showed me; he knoweth them who, without any idea whatsoever of a body, perceives them within himself. I have also observed the numbers of the things with which we number all the senses of the body; but those by which we number are of another kind, nor are they the images of these, and therefore they certainly are. Let him who sees not these things mock me for saying them; and I will pity him, whilst he mocks me.

Chap. xiii. Memory retains all things.

20. All these things I retain in my memory, and how I learnt them I retain. I retain also many things which I have heard most falsely objected against them, which though they be false, yet is it not false that I have remembered them; and I remember, too, that I have distinguished between those truths and these falsehoods uttered against them; and I now see that it is one thing to distinguish these things, another to remember that I often distinguished them, when I often reflected upon them. I both remember, then, that I have often understood these tilings, and what I now distinguish and comprehend I store away in my memory, that hereafter I may remember that I understood it now. Therefore also I remember that I have remembered; so that if afterwards I shall call to mind that I have been able to remember these things, it will be through the power of memory that I shall call it to mind.

Chap. xiv. Concerning the manner in which joy and sadness may be brought back to the mind and memory.

21. This same memory contains also the affections of my mind; not in the manner in which the mind itself contains them when it suffers them, but very differently according to a power peculiar to memory. For without being joyous, I remember myself to have had joy; and without being sad, I call to mind my past sadness; and that of which I was once afraid, I remember without fear; and without desire recall a former desire. Again, on the contrary, I at times remember when joyous my past sadness, and when sad my joy. Which is not to be wondered at as regards the body: for the mind is one thing, the body another. If I, therefore, when happy, recall some past bodily pain, it is not so strange a thing. But now, as this very memory itself is mind (for when we give orders to have a thing kept in memory, we say, "See that you bear this in mind;" and when we forget a thing, we say, "It did not enter my mind," and, "It slipped from my mind," thus calling the memory itself mind), as this is so, how comes it to pass that when being joyful I remember my past sorrow, the mind has joy, the memory sorrow, the mind, from the joy that is in it, is joyful, yet the memory, from the sadness that is in it, is not sad? Does not the memory perchance belong unto the mind? Who will say so? The memory doubtless is, so to say, the belly of the mind, and joy and sadness like sweet and bitter food, which, when entrusted to the memory, are, as it were, passed into the belly, where they can be reposited, but cannot taste. It is ridiculous to imagine these to be alike; and yet they are not utterly unlike.

22. But behold, out of my memory I educe it, when I affirm that there be four perturbations of the mind, desire, joy, fear, sorrow; and whatsoever I shall be able to dispute on these, by dividing each into its peculiar species, and by defining it, there I find what I may say, and thence I educe it; yet am I not disturbed by any of these perturbations when by remembering them I call them to mind; and before I recollected and reviewed them, they were there; wherefore by remembrance could they be brought thence. Perchance, then, even as meat is in ruminating brought up out of the belly, so by calling to mind are these educed from the memory. Why, then, does not the disputant, thus recollecting, perceive in the mouth of his meditation the sweetness of joy or the bitterness of sorrow? Is the comparison unlike in this because not like in all points? For who would willingly discourse on these subjects, if, as often as we name sorrow or fear, we should be compelled to be sorrowful or fearful? And yet we could never speak of them, did we not find in our memory not merely the sounds of the names according to the images imprinted on it by the senses of the body, but the notions of the things themselves, which we never received by my door of the flesh, but which the mind itself, recognising by the experience of its own passions, entrusted to the memory, else which the memory itself retained without their being intrusted to it.

Chap. xv. In memory there are also images of things which are absent.

23. But whether by images or no, who can well affirm?
For I name a stone, I name the sun, and the things themselves are not present to my senses, but their images are near:
o my memory. I name some pain of the body, yet it is not present when there is no pain; yet if its image were not in my memory, I should be ignorant what to say concerning it, and in arguing be able to distinguish it from pleasure. I name bodily health when sound in body; the thing itself in deed is present with me, but unless its image also were in my memory, I could by no means call to mind what the sound (if this name signified. Nor would sick people know, when realth was named, what was said, unless the same image were retained by the power of memory, although the thing itself were absent from the body. I name numbers whereby we enumerate; and not their images, but they themselves are in my memory. I name the image of the sun, and this, too, is in my memory. For I do not recall the image of that image, but itself, for the image itself is present when I remember it. I name memory, and I know what I name. But where do I know it, except in the memory itself? Is it also present to itself by its image, and not by itself?

Chap. xvi. The privation of memory is forgetfulness.

24. When I name forgetfulness, and know, too, what I name, whence should I know it if I did not remember it? I do not say the sound of the name, but the thing which it signifies; which, had I forgotten, I could not know what that sound signified. "When, therefore, I remember memory, then is memory present with itself, through itself. But when I remember forgetfulness, there are present both memory and forgetfulness, memory, whereby I remember, forgetfulness, which I remember. But what is forgetfulness but the privation of memory? How, then, is that present for me to remember, since, when it is so, I cannot remember? But if what we remember we retain in memory, yet, unless we remembered forgetfulness, we could never at the hearing of the name know the thing meant by it, then is forgetfulness retained by memory. Present, therefore, it is, lest we should forget it; and being so we do forget. Is it to be inferred from this that forgetfulness, when we remember it, is not present to the memory through itself, but through its image; because, were forgetfulness present through itself, it would not lead us to remember, but to forget? Who now will investigate this? Who shall understand how it is?

25. Truly, Lord, I labour therein, and labour in myself. I am become a troublesome soil that requires overmuch labour. For we are not now searching out the tracts of heaven, or measuring the distances of the stars, or inquiring about the weight of the earth. It is I myself I, the mind who remember. It is not much to be wondered at, if what I myself am not be far from me. But what is nearer to me than myself? And, behold, I am not able to comprehend the force of my own memory, though I cannot name myself without it. For what shall I say when it is plain to me that I remember forgetfulness? Shall I affirm that that which I remember is not in my memory? Or shall I say that forgetfulness is in my memory with the view of my not forgetting? Both of these are most absurd. What third view is there? How can I assert that the image of forgetfulness is retained by my memory, and not forgetfulness itself, when I remember it? And how can I assert this, seeing that when the image of anything is imprinted on the memory, the thing itself must of necessity be present first by which that image may be imprinted? For thus do I remember Carthage; thus, all the places to which I have been; thus, the faces of men whom I have seen, and things reported by the other senses; thus, the health or sickness of the body. For when these objects were present, my memory received images from them, which, when they were present, I might gaze on and reconsider in my mind, as I remembered them when they, were absent. If, therefore, forgetfulness is retained in the memory through its image, and not through itself, then itself was once present, that its image might be taken. But when it was present, how did it write its image on the memory, seeing that forgetfulness 'by its presence blots out even what it finds already noted? And yet, in whatever way, though it be incomprehensible and inexplicable, yet most certain I am that I remember also forgetfulness itself, whereby what we do remember is blotted 'out.
Chap. xvii. God cannot be attained unto by the power of memory, which beads and birds possess.

26. Great is the power of memory; very wonderful is it, I my God, a profound and infinite manifoldness; and this thing is the mind, and this I myself am. What then am I, my God? Of what nature am I? A life various and manifold, and exceeding vast. Behold, in the numberless fields,

! and caves, and caverns of my memory, full without number of numberless kinds of things, either through images, as all bodies are; or by the presence of the things themselves, as are the arts; or by some notion or observation, as the affections of the mind are, which, even though the mind doth not suffer, the memory retains, while whatsoever is in the memory is also in the mind: through all these do I run to and fro, and fly; I penetrate on this side and that, as far as I am able, and nowhere is there an end. So great is the power of memory, so great the power of life in man, whose life is mortal.

What then shall I do, Thou my true life, my God? I will pass even beyond this power of mine which is called memory I will pass beyond it, that I may proceed to Thee, Thou sweet Light. What sayest Thou to me? Behold, I am soaring by my mind towards Thee who remainest above me. I will also pass beyond this power of mine which is called memory, wishful to reach Thee whence Thou canst be reached, and to cleave unto Thee whence it is possible to cleave unto Thee.

For even beasts and birds possess memory, else could they never find their lairs and nests again, nor many other things to which they are used; neither indeed could they become used to anything, but by their memory. I will pass, then, beyond memory also, that I may reach Him who has separated me from the four-footed beasts and the fowls of the air, making me wiser than they. I will pass beyond memory also, but where shall I find Thee, Thou truly good and assured sweetness? But where shall I find Thee? If I find Thee without memory, then am I unmindful of Thee. And how now shall I find Thee, if I do not remember Thee?

Chap. xviii. A thing when lost could not be found unless it were retained in the memory.

27. For the woman who lost her drachma, and searched for it with a lamp, 1 unless she had remembered it, would never have found it. For when it was found, whence could she know whether it were the same, had she not remembered it? I remember to have lost and found many things; and this

know thereby, that when I was searching for any of them, and was asked, "Is this it?" "Is that it?" I answered
"No," until such time as that which I sought were offered to me. Which had I not remembered, whatever it were, though it were offered me, yet would I not find it, because I could not recognise it. And thus it is always, when we search for and find anything that is lost. Notwithstanding, if anything be by accident lost from the sight, not from the memory, as any visible body, the image of it is retained within, and is searched for until it be restored to sight; and when it is found, it is recognised by the image which is within. Nor do we say that we have found what we had lost unless we recognise it; nor can we recognise it unless we remember it.
But this, though lost to the sight, was retained in the memory.

Chap. xix. What it is to remember.

28. But how is it when the memory itself loses anything, as it happens when we forget anything and try to recall it?
Where finally do we search, but in the memory itself? And there, if perchance one thing be offered for another, we refuse it, until we meet with what we seek; and when we do, we exclaim, "This is it!" which we should not do unless we knew it again, nor should we recognise it unless we remembered it. Assuredly, therefore, we had forgotten it. Or, had not the whole of it slipped our memory, but by the part by which we had hold was the other part sought for; since the memory perceived that it did not revolve together as much as it was accustomed to do, and halting, as if from the mutilation of its old habit, demanded the restoration of that which was wanting. For example, if we see or think of some man known to us, and, having forgotten his name, endeavour to recover it, whatsoever other thing presents itself is not connected with it; because it was not used to be thought of in connection with him, and is consequently rejected, until that is present whereon the knowledge reposes fittingly as its accustomed object. And whence, save from the memory itself, does that present itself? For even when we recognise it as put in mind of it by another, it is thence it comes. For we do not believe it as something new, but, as we recall it, admit what was said to be correct. But if it were entirely blotted out of the mind, we should not, even when put in mind of it, recollect it. For we have not as yet entirely forgotten what we remember that we have forgotten. A lost notion, then, which we have entirely forgotten, we cannot even search for.

1 Luke xv. 8.

CHAP. XX.] WE RECOGNISE WHAT WE REMEMBER. 257

Chap. xx. We should not seek for God and the happy life unless we had
29. How, then, do I seek Thee, Lord? For when I seek Thee, my God, I seek a happy life. I will seek Thee, that my soul may live. 2 For my body liveth by my soul, and my soul liveth by Thee. How, then, do I seek a happy life, seeing that it is not mine till I can say, "It is enough!" in that place where I ought to say it? How do I seek it? Is it by remembrance, as though I had forgotten it, knowing too that I had forgotten it? or, longing to learn it as a thing unknown, which either I had never known, or had so forgotten it as not even to remember that I had forgotten it? Is not a happy life the thing that all desire, and is there any one who altogether desires it not? But where did they acquire the knowledge of it, that they so desire it? Where have they

1 See note, p. 75, above. s Amos v. 4.

CON. B

seen it, that they so love it? Truly we have it, but how I know not. Yea, there is another way in which, when any one hath it, he is happy; and some there be that are happy in hope. These have it in an inferior kind to those that are happy in fact; and yet are they better off than they who are happy neither in fact nor in hope. And even these, had they it not in some way, would not so much desire to be happy, which that they do desire is most certain. How they come to know it, I cannot tell, but they have it by some kind of knowledge unknown to me, who am in much doubt as to whether it be in the memory; for if it be there, then have we been happy once; whether all individually, or as in that man who first sinned, in whom also we all died, 1 and from whom we are all born with misery, I do not now ask; but I ask whether the happy life be in the memory? For did we not know it, we should not love it. We hear the name, and we all acknowledge that we desire the thing; for we are not delighted with the sound only. For when a Greek hears it spoken in Latin, he does not feel delighted, for he knows not what is spoken; but we are delighted, 2 as he too would be if he heard it in Greek; because the thing itself is neither Greek nor Latin, which Greeks and Latins, and men of all other tongues, long so earnestly to obtain. It is then known unto all, and could they with one voice be asked whether they wished to be happy, without doubt they would all answer that they would. And this could not be unless the thing itself, of which it is the name, were retained in their memory.

Chap. xxi. How a happy life may be retained in the memory.
30. But is it so as one who has seen Carthage remembers it? No. For a happy life is not visible to the eye, because it is not a body. Is it, then, as we remember numbers? No. For he that hath these in his knowledge strives not to attain further; but a happy life we have in our knowledge, and, therefore, do we love it, while yet we wish further to attain it that we may be happy. Is it, then, as we remember

1 1 Cor. xv. 22; see p. 234, note 2, and note p. 68, above.

2 That is, as knowing Latin.

CHAP. XXT.] MEMORY AND HAPPINESS. 259

deloquence? No. For although some, when they hear this name, call the thing to mind, who, indeed, are not yet eloquent, and many who wish to be so, whence it appears to be in their knowledge; yet have these by their bodily perceptions noticed that others are eloquent, and been delighted with it, and long to be so, although they would not be delighted save for some interior knowledge, nor desire to be so unless they were delighted, but a happy life we can by no bodily perception make experience of in others. Is it, then, as we remember joy? It may be so; for my joy I remember, even when sad, like as I do a happy life when I am miserable. Nor did I ever with perception of the body either see, hear, smell, taste, or touch my joy; but I experienced it in my mind when I rejoiced; and the knowledge of it clung to my memory, so that I can call it to mind, sometimes with disdain and at others with desire, according to the difference of the things wherein I now remember that I rejoiced. For even from unclean things have I been bathed with a certain joy, which now calling to mind, I detest and execrate; at other times, from good and honest things, which, with longing, I call to mind, though perchance they be not nigh at hand, and then with sadness do I call to mind a former joy.

31. Where and when, then, did I experience my happy life, that I should call it to mind, and love and long for it? Nor is it I alone or a few others who wish to be happy, but truly all; which, unless by certain knowledge we knew, we should not wish with so certain a will. But how is this, that if two men be asked whether they would wish to serve as soldiers, one, it may be, would reply that he would, the other that he would not; but if they were asked whether they would wish to be happy, both of them would unhesitatingly say that they would; and this one would wish to serve, and the other not, from no other motive but to be happy? Is it, perchance, that as one joys in this, and another in that, so do all men agree in their wish for happiness, as they would agree, were they asked, in wishing to have joy, and this joy they call a happy life? Although, then, one pursues joy in this way, and another in that, all have one goal, which they strive to attain, namely, to have joy. This life, being a thing which no one can say he has not experienced, it is on that account found in the memory, and recognised whenever the name of a happy life is heard.

Chap. xxir. A happy life is to rejoice in God, and for God.

3 2. Let it be far, O Lord, let it be far from the heart of Thy servant who confesseth unto Thee; let it be far from me to think myself happy, be the joy what it may. For there is a joy which is not granted to the " wicked," 1 but to those who worship Thee thankfully, whose joy Thou Thyself art. And the happy life is this, to rejoice unto Thee, in Thee, and for Thee; this it is, and there is no other. 2 But those who think there is another follow after another joy, and that not the true one. Their will, however, is not turned away from some shadow of joy.

Chap. xxiii. All toish to rejoice in the Truth.

33. It is not, then, certain that all men wish to be happy, since those who wish not to rejoice in Thee, which is the only happy life, do not verily desire the happy life. Or do all desire this, but because "the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh," so that they "cannot do the things that they would," 3 they fall upon that which they are able to do, and with that are content; because that which they are not able to do, they do not so will as to make them able ? 4 For I ask of every man, whether he would rather rejoice in truth or in falsehood. They will no more hesitate to say, "in truth " than to say, " that they wish to be happy." For a happy life is joy in the truth. For this is joy in Thee, who art "the truth," 6 O God, "my light," 6 "the health of my countenance, and my God." 1 All wish for this happy life; this life do all wish for, which is the only happy one; joy in the truth do all wish for. 2 I have had experience of many who wished to deceive, but not one who wished to be deceived. Where, then, did they know this happy life, save where they knew also the truth? For they love it, too, since they would not be deceived. And when they love a happy life, which is naught else but joy in the truth, assuredly they love also the truth; which yet they would not love were there not some knowledge of it in the memory. Wherefore, then, do they not rejoice in it? Why are they not happy? Because they are more entirely occupied with other things which rather make them miserable, than that which would make them happy, which they remember so little of. For there is yet a little light in men; let them walk let them "walk," that the "darkness" seize them not.

34. Why, then, doth truth beget hatred, and that man of thine, preaching the truth, become an enemy unto them, whereas a happy life is loved, which is naught else but joy in the truth; unless that truth is loved in such a sort as that those who love aught else wish that to be the truth which they love, and, as they are willing to be deceived, are unwilling to be convinced that they are so? Therefore do they hate the truth for the sake of that thing which they love instead of the truth. They love truth when she shines on them, and hate her when she rebukes them. For, because they are not willing to be deceived, and wish to deceive, they love her when she reveals herself, and hate her when she reveals them. On that account shall she so requite them, that those who were unwilling to be discovered by her she both discovers against their will, and discovers not herself unto them. Thus, thus, truly thus doth the human mind, so blind and sick, so base and unseemly, desire to lie concealed, but wishes not that anything should be concealed from it. But the opposite is rendered unto it, that itself is not concealed from the truth, but the truth is concealed from it. Yet, even while thus wretched, it prefers to rejoice in truth rather than in falsehood. Happy then will it be, when, no trouble intervening, it shall rejoice in that only truth by whom all things else are true.

Chap. xxiv. He who finds truth, finds God.

35. Behold how I have enlarged in my memory seeking Thee, Lord; and out of it have I not found Thee. Nor have I found aught concerning Thee, but what I have retained in memory from the time I learned Thee. For from the time I learned Thee have I never forgotten Thee. For where I found truth, there found I my God, who is the Truth itself, 1 which from the time I learned it have I not forgotten. And thus since the time I learned Thee, Thou abidest in my memory; and there do I find Thee whencesoever I call Thee to remembrance, and delight in Thee. These are my holy delights, which Thou hast bestowed upon me in Thy mercy, having respect unto my poverty.

Chap. xxA r . He is glad that God dwells in his memory.

36. But where in my memory abidest Thou, O Lord, where dost Thou there abide? What manner of chamber hast Thou there formed for Thyself? What sort of sanctuary hast Thou erected for Thyself? Thou hast granted this honour to my memory, to take up Thy abode in it; but in what quarter of it Thou abidest, I am considering. For in calling Thee to mind, 2 I soared beyond those parts of it which the beasts also possess, since I found Thee not there amongst the images of corporeal things; and I arrived at those parts where I had committed the affections of my mind, nor there did I find Thee. And I entered into the very seat of my mind, which it has in my memory, since the mind remembers itself

also nor wert Thou there. For as Thou art not a bodily image, nor the affection of a living creature, as when we rejoice, condole, desire, fear, remember, forget, or aught of the kind; so neither art Thou the mind itself, because Thou art the Lord God of the mind; and all these things are changed, but Thou remainest unchangeable over all, yet vouchsafer to dwell in my memory, from the time I learned Thee. But why do I now seek in what part of it Thou dwellest, as if truly there were places in it? Thou dost dwell in it assuredly, since I have remembered Thee from the time I learned Thee, and I find Thee in it when I call Thee to mind.

Chap. xxvi. God everywhere answers those who take counsel of Him.

37. Where, then, did I find Thee, so as to be able to learn Thee? For Thou wert not in my memory before I learned Thee. Where, then, did I find Thee, so as to be able to learn Thee, but in Thee above me? Place there is none; we go both "backward" and " forward," I and there is no place.
Everywhere, Truth, dost Thou direct all who consult Thee, and dost at once answer all, though they consult Thee on divers things. Clearly dost Thou answer, though all do not with clearness hear. All consult Thee upon whatever they wish, though they hear not always that which they wish. He is Thy best servant who does not so much look to hear that from Thee which he himself wisheth, as to wish that which he heareth from Thee.

Chap, xxvii. He grieves that he was so long without God.

38. Too late did I love Thee, Fairness, so ancient, and yet so new! Too late did I love Thee! For behold, Thou wert within, and I without, and there did I seek Thee; I, unlovely, rushed heedlessly among the things of beauty Thou madest. Thou wert with me, but I was not with Thee. Those things kept me far from Thee, which, unless they were in Thee, were not. Thou calledst, and criedst aloud, and forcedst open my deafness. Thou didst gleam and shine, and chase away my blindness. Thou didst exhale odours, and I drew in my breath and do pant after Thee. I tasted, and do hunger and thirst. Thou didst touch me, and I burned for Thy peace.

Chap, xxviii. On the misery of human life.

39. When I shall cleave unto Thee with all my being, then shall I in nothing have pain and labour; and my life shall be a real life, being wholly full of Thee. But now since he whom Thou fillest is the one Thou liftest up, I am a burden to myself, as not being full of Thee. Joys of sorrow contend with sorrows of joy; and on which side the victory may be I know not. Woe is me! Lord, have pity on me. My evil sorrows contend with my good joys; and on which side the victory may be I know not. Woe is me! Lord, have pity on me. Woe is me! Lo, I hide not my wounds; Thou art the Physician, I the sick; Thou merciful, I miserable. Is not the life of man upon earth a temptation? Woe unto the prosperity of this world, once and again, from fear of misfortune and a corruption of joy! Woe unto the adversities of this world, once and again, and for the third time, from the desire of prosperity; and

Chap. xxix. All hope is in the mercy of God.

40. And my whole hope is only in Thy exceeding great mercy. Give what Thou commandest, and command what Thou wilt. Thou imposest continency upon us, 2 " nevertheless, when I perceived," saith one, "that I could not otherwise obtain her, except God gave her me; ... that was a point of wisdom also to know whose gift she was." 3 For by continency are we bound up and brought into one, whence we were scattered abroad into many. For he loves Thee too little who loves aught with Thee, which he loves not for Thee, 4 O love, who ever burnest, and art never quenched! charity, my God, kindle me! Thou commandest continency; give what Thou commandest, and command what Thou wilt.

Chap. xxx. Of the perverse images of dreams, which he wishes to have taken away.

1 We have ever to endure temptation, either in the sense of a testing, as when it is said, "God did tempt Abraham" (Gen. xxii. 1); or with the additional idea of yielding to the temptation, and so committing sin, as in the use of the word in the Lord's Prayer (Matt. vi. 13); for, as Dyke says in his Michael and the Dragon (Works, i. 203, 204): "No sooner have we bathed and washed our souls in the waters of Repentance, but we must presently expect the fiery darts of Satan's temptations to be driving at us. What we get and gain from Satan by Repentance, he seeks to regain and recover by his Temptations. We must not think to pass quietly out of Egypt without Pharaoh's pursuit, nor to travel the wilderness of this world without the opposition of the Amalekites." Compare Augustine, In Ev. Joann. Tract, xliii. 6, and Serm. Ivii. 9. See also p. 82, note, above.

2 In his 38th Sermon, he distinguishes between continentia and sustinentia; the first guarding us from the allurements of worldliness and sin, while the second enables us to endure the troubles of life.

4 In his De Trin. ix. 13 ("In what desire and love differ"), he says, that when the creature is loved for itself, and the love of it is not referred to its Creator, it is desire (cupiditas) and not true love. See also p. 207, note 1, above.

cconcubinage; and as to marriage itself, Thou hast advised something better than Thou hast allowed. And because Thou didst give it, it was done; and that before I became a dispenser of Thy sacrament. But there still exist in my memory of which I have spoken much the images of such things as my habits had fixed there; and these rush into my thoughts, though strengthless, when I am awake; but in sleep they do so not only so as to give pleasure, but even to obtain consent, and what very nearly resembles reality. 1 Yea, to such an extent prevails the illusion of the image, both in my soul and in my flesh, that the false persuade me, when sleeping, unto that which the true are not able when waking. Am I not myself at that time, Lord my God? And there is yet so much difference between myself and myself, in that instant wherein I pass back from waking to sleeping, or return from sleeping to waking! Where, then, is the reason which when waking resists such suggestions? And if the things themselves be forced on it, I remain unmoved. Is it shut up with the eyes? Or is it put to sleep with the bodily senses? But whence, then, comes it to pass, that even in slumber we often resist, and, bearing our purpose in mind, and continuing most chastely in it, yield no assent to such allurements? And there is yet so much difference that, when it happeneth otherwise, upon awaking we return to peace of conscience; and by this same diversity do we discover that it was not we that did it, while we still feel sorry that in some way it was done in us.

correspond to the threefold nature of our Lord's temptation in the wilderness.
See also p. 85, note 5, above.

1 In Augustine's view, then, dreams appear to result from our thoughts and feelings when awake. In this he has the support of Aristotle (Ethics, i. 13), as also that of Solomon, who says (Eccles. v. 3), "A dream cometh through the multitude of business." An apt illustration of this is found in the life of the great Danish sculptor, Thorwaldsen. It is said that he could not satisfy himself with his models for The Christ, in the Frauenkirche at Copenhagen, as Da Vinci before him was never able to paint the face of the Christ in His noble fresco of the Last Supper, and that it was only in consequence of a dream (that dream doubtless the result of his stedfast search for an ideal) that this great work was accomplished. But see Ep. clix.

CHAP. XXXI.] EVIL DREAMS. 267

42. Is not Thy hand able, Almighty God, to heal all the diseases of my soul, 1 and by Thy more abundant grace to quench even the lascivious motions of my sleep? Thou wilt increase in me, Lord, Thy gifts more and more, that my soul may follow me to Thee, disengaged from the bird-lime of concupiscence; that it may not be in rebellion against itself, and even in dreams not simply not, through sensual images, commit those deformities of corruption, even to the pollution of the flesh, but that it may not even consent unto them. For it is no great thing for the Almighty, who is "able to do . . . above all that we ask or think," 2 to bring it about that no such influence not even so slight a one as a sign might restrain should afford gratification to the chaste affection even of one sleeping; and that not only in this life, but at my present age. But what I still am in this species of my ill, have I confessed unto my good Lord; rejoicing with trembling 3 in that which Thou hast given me, and bewailing myself for that wherein I am still imperfect; trusting that Thou wilt perfect Thy mercies in me, even to the fulness of peace, which both that which is within and that which is without 4 shall have with Thee, when death is swallowed up in victory. 5

Chap. xxxi. About to speak of the temptations of the lust of the flesh, he first complains of the lust of eating and drinking.

43. There is another evil of the day that I would were "sufficient" unto it. 6 For by eating and drinking we repair the daily decays of the body, until Thou destroyest both food and stomach, when Thou shalt destroy my want with an amazing satiety, and shalt clothe this corruptible with an eternal incorruption. 7 But now is necessity sweet unto me, and against this sweetness do I fight, lest I be enthralled; and I carry on a daily war by fastings, 8 oftentimes "bringing my body into subjection," * and my pains are expelled by pleasure. For hunger and thirst are in some sort pains; they consume and destroy like unto a fever, unless the medicine of nourishment relieve us. The which, since it is at hand through the comfort we receive of Thy gifts, with which land and water and air serve our infirmity, our calamity is called pleasure.

44. This much hast Thou taught me, that I should bring myself to take food as medicine. But during the time that I am passing from the uneasiness of want to the calmness of satiety, even in the very passage doth that snare of concupiscence lie in wait for me. For the passage itself is pleasure, nor is there any other way of passing thither, whither necessity compels us to pass. And whereas health is the reason of eating and drinking, there joineth itself as an handmaid a perilous delight, which mostly tries to precede it, in order that I may do for her sake what I say I do, or desire to do, for health's sake. Nor have both the same limit; for what is sufficient for health is too little for pleasure. And oftentimes it is doubtful whether it be the necessary care of the body which still asks nourishment, or whether a sensual snare of desire offers its ministry. In this uncertainty does my unhappy soul rejoice, and therein prepares an excuse as a defence, glad that it doth not appear what may be sufficient for the moderation of health, that so under the pretence of health it may conceal the business of pleasure. These temptations do I daily endeavour to resist, and I summon Thy right hand to my help, and refer my excitements to Thee, because as yet I have no resolve in this matter.

45. I hear the voice of my God commanding, let not "your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness." 8 " Drunkenness," it is far from me; Thou wilt have mercy, that it approach not near unto me. But " surfeiting " sometimes creepeth upon Thy servant; Thou wilt have mercy, that it may be far from me. For no man can be continent unless Thou give it. 3 Many things which we pray for dost Thou give us; and what good soever we receive before we prayed for it, do we receive from Thee, and that we might afterwards know this did we receive it from Thee. Drunkard was I never, but I have known drunkards to be made sober men by Thee. Thy doing, then, was it, that they who never were such might not be so, as from Thee it was that they who have been so heretofore might not remain so always; and from Thee, too, was it, that both might know from whom it was. I heard another voice of Thine, " Go not after thy lusts, but refrain thyself from thine appetites." * And by Thy favour have I heard this saying likewise, which I have much delighted in, " Neither if we eat, are we the better; neither if we eat not, are we the worse;" 2 which is to say, that neither shall the one make me to abound, nor the other to be wretched. I heard also another voice, " For I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound. ... I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." * Lo! a soldier of the celestial camp not dust as we are. But remember, Lord, " that we are dust," 4 and that of dust Thou hast created man; 5 and he " was lost, and is found." 6 Nor could he do this of his own power, seeing that he whom I so loved, saying these things through the afflatus of Thy inspiration, was of that same dust. " I can," saith he, " do all things through Him which strengtheneth me." 7 Strengthen me, that I may be able. Give what Thou commandest, and command what Thou wilt. 8 He confesses to have received, and when he glorieth, he glorieth in the Lord. 9 Another have I heard entreating that he might receive, " Take from me," saith he, " the greediness of the belly;" 10 by which it appeareth, my holy God, that Thou givest when what Thou commandest to be done is done.

46. Thou hast taught me, good Father, that "unto the pure all things are pure;" x but " it is evil for that man who eateth with offence;" 2 " and that every creature of Thine is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving;" 3 and that " meat commendeth us not to God;" 4 and that no man should "judge us in meat or in drink;" 5 and that he that eateth, let him not despise him that eateth not; and let not him that eateth not judge him that eateth. 6 These things have I learned, thanks and praise be unto Thee, my God and Master, who dost knock at my ears and enlighten my heart; deliver me out of all temptation. It is not the uncleanness of meat that I fear, but the uncleanness of lusting. I know that permission was granted unto Noah to eat every kind of flesh 7 that was good for food; 8 that Elias was fed with flesh; 9 that John, endued with a wonderful abstinence, was not polluted by the living creatures (that is, the locusts 10) which he fed on. I know, too, that Esau was deceived by a longing for lentiles, 11 and that David took blame to himself for desiring water, 12 and that our King was tempted not by flesh but bread. 13 And the people in the wilderness, therefore, also deserved reproof, not because they desired flesh, but because, in their desire for food, they murmured against the Lord. 14

47. Placed, then, in the midst of these temptations, I strive daily against longing for food and drink. For it is not of such a nature as that I am able to resolve to cut it off once for all, and not touch it afterwards, as I was able to do with concubinage. The bridle of the throat, therefore, is to be held in the mean of slackness and tightness. 16 And who, Lord, is

Chap, xxxii. Of the charms of perfumes which are more easily overcome.

48. With the attractions of odours I am not much troubled. When absent I do not seek them; when present I do not refuse them; and am prepared ever to be without them. At any rate thus I appear to myself; perchance I am deceived. For that also is a lamentable darkness wherein my capacity that is in me is concealed, so that my mind, making inquiry into herself concerning her own powers, ventures not readily to credit herself; because that which is already in it is, for the most part, concealed, unless experience reveal it. And no man ought to feel secure 6 in this life, the whole of which is called a temptation, 7 that he, who could be made better from worse, may not also from better be made worse. Our sole hope, our sole confidence, our sole assured promise, is Thy mercy.

As Augustine, in his De Mor. Ecc. Oath. sec. 39, says of all transient things, we " should use them as far as is required for the purposes and duties of life, with the moderation of an employer instead of the ardour of a lover."

"Christ's Temptation," p. 11), " through vain prefidence of God's protection, run in times of contagion into infected houses, which upon just calling a man may: but for one to run out of his calling in the way of an ordinary visitation, he shall find that God's angels have commission to protect him no longer than he is in his way (Ps. xci. 11), and that being out of it, this arrow of the Lord shall sooner hit him than another that is not half so confident." We should not, as Fuller quaintly says, "hollo in the ears of a sleeping temptation; " and when we are tempted, let us remember that if (Hibbert, Syntagma Theologicum, p. 342) "a giant knock while the door is shut, he may with ease be still kept out; but if once open, that he gets in but a limb of himself, then there is no course left to keep out the remaining bulk." 272 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK X.]

Chap, xxxiii. He overcame the pleasures of the ear, although in the church he frequently delighted in the song, not in the thing sung.
49. The delights of the ear had more powerfully inveigled and conquered me, but Thou didst unbind and liberate me.
Now, in those airs which Thy words breathe soul into, when sung with a sweet and trained voice, do I somewhat repose; yet not so as to cling to them, but so as to free myself when I wish. But with the words which are their life do they, that they may gain admission into me, strive after a place of some honour in my heart; and I can hardly assign them a fitting one. Sometimes I appear to myself to give them more respect than is fitting, as I perceive that our minds are more devoutly and earnestly elevated into a flame of piety by the holy words themselves when they are thus sung, than when they are not; and that all affections of our spirit, by their own diversity, have their appropriate measures in the voice and singing, wherewith by I know not what secret relationship they are stimulated. But the gratification of my flesh, to which the mind ought never to be given over to be enervated, often beguiles me, while the sense does not so attend on reason as to follow her patiently; but having gained admission merely for her sake, it strives even to run on before her, and be her leader. Thus in these things do I sin unknowing, but afterwards do I know it.

50. Sometimes, again, avoiding very earnestly this same deception, I err out of too great preciseness; and sometimes so much as to desire that every air of the pleasant songs to which David's Psalter is often used, be banished both from my ears and those of the Church itself; and that way seemed unto me safer which I remembered to have been often related to me of Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria, who obliged the reader of the psalm to give utterance to it with so slight an inflection of voice, that it was more like speaking than singing. Notwithstanding, when I call to mind the tears I shed at the songs of Thy Church, at the outset of my recovered faith, and how even now I am moved not by the singing but by what is sung, when they are sung with a clear and skilfully modulated voice, I then acknowledge the great utility of this custom. Thus vacillate I between dangerous pleasure and tried soundness; being inclined rather (though I pronounce no irrevocable opinion upon the subject) to approve of the use of singing in the church, that so by the delights of the ear the weaker minds may be stimulated to a devotional frame. Yet when it happens to me to be more moved by the singing than by what is sung, I confess myself to have sinned criminally, and then I would rather not have heard the singing. See now the condition I am in! Weep with me, and weep for me, you who so control your inward feelings as that good results ensue. As for you who do not thus act, these things concern you not. But Thou, Lord my God, give ear, behold and see, and have mercy upon me, and heal me, 1 Thou, in whose sight I am become a puzzle to myself; and "this is my infirmity." 2

Chat, xxxiv. Of the very dangerous allurements of the eyes; on account of beauty of form, God, the Creator, is to be praised.
51. There remain the delights of these eyes of my flesh, concerning which to make my confessions in the hearing of the ears of Thy temple, those fraternal and devout ears; and so to conclude the temptations of "the lust of the flesh" which still assail me, groaning and desiring to be clothed upon with my house from heaven. 4 The eyes delight in fair and varied forms, and bright and pleasing colours. Suffer not these to take possession of my soul; let God rather possess it, He who made these things "very good" 5 indeed; yet is He my good, not these. And these move me while awake, during the day; nor is rest from them granted me, as there is from the voices of melody, sometimes, in silence, from them all. For that queen of colours, the light, flooding all that we look upon, wherever I be during the day, gliding past me in manifold forms, doth soothe me when busied about other things, and not noticing it. And so strongly doth it insinuate itself, that if it be suddenly withdrawn it is looked for longingly, and if long absent doth sadden the mind.

with the feet of charity, never going astray. Or that which Isaac saw, when his fleshly "eyes were dim, so that he could not see" 1 by reason of old age; it was permitted him, not knowingly to bless his sons, but in blessing them to know them. Or that which Jacob saw, when he too, blind through great age, with an enlightened heart, in the persons of his own sons, threw light upon the races of the future people, presignified in them; and laid his hands, mystically crossed, upon his grandchildren by Joseph, not as their father, looking outwardly, corrected them, but as he himself distinguished them. 2 This is the light, the only one, and all those who see and love it are one. But that corporeal light of which I was speaking seasoneth the life of the world for her blind lovers, with a tempting and fatal sweetness. But they who know how to praise Thee for it, "0 God, the world's great Architect," 3 take it up in Thy hymn, and are not taken up with it 4 in their sleep. Such desire I to be. I resist seductions of the eyes, lest my feet with which I advance on Thy way be entangled; and I raise my invisible eyes to Thee, that Thou wouldst be pleased to "pluck my feet out of the net." 5 Thou dost continually pluck them out, for they are ensnared. Thou never ceasest to pluck them out, but I constantly remain fast in the snares set all around me; because Thou "that keepest Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep." 6
53. What numberless things, made by divers arts and manufactures, both in our apparel, shoes, vessels, and every kind of work, in pictures, too, and sundry images, and these going far beyond necessary and moderate use and holy signification, have men added for the enthrallment of the eyes; following outwardly what they make, forsaking inwardly Him by whom they were made, yea, and destroying that which they themselves were made! But I, my God and my Joy, do hence also sing a hymn unto Thee, and offer a sacrifice of praise unto my Sanctifier, 1 because those beautiful patterns, which through the medium of men's souls are conveyed into their artistic hands, 2 emanate from that Beauty which is above our souls, which my soul sigheth after day and night. But as for the makers and followers of those outward beauties, 3 they from thence derive the way of approving them, but not of using them. 3 And though they see Him not, yet is He there, that they might not go astray, but keep their strength for Thee, 4 and not dissipate it upon delicious lassitudes. And I, though I both say and perceive this, impede my course with such beauties, but Thou dost rescue me, O Lord, Thou dost rescue me; " for Thy loving-kindness is before mine eyes." 5

For I am taken miserably, and Thou rescuest me mercifully; sometimes not perceiving it, in that I had come upon them hesitatingly; at other times with pain, because I was held fast by them.

Chap. xxxv. Another kind of temptation is curiosity, which in stimulated by the lu.st of the eyes.

54. In addition to this there is another form of temptation, more complex in its peril. For besides that concupiscence of the flesh which lieth in the gratification of all senses and pleasures, wherein its slaves who " are far from Thee perish," 6 there pertaineth to the soul, through the same senses of the body, a certain vain and curious longing, cloaked under the name of knowledge and learning, not of having pleasure in the flesh, but of making experiments through the flesh. This longing, since it originates in an appetite for knowledge, and the sight being the chief amongst the senses in the acquisition of knowledge, is called in divine language, " the lust of the eyes." 7 For seeing belongeth properly to the eyes; yet we apply this word to the other senses also, when we exercise them in the search after knowledge. For we do not say, Listen how it glows, smell how it glistens, taste how it shines, or feel how it flashes, since all these are said to be seen. And yet we say not only, See how it shineth, which the eyes alone can perceive; but also, See how it soundeth, see how it smelleth, see how it tasteth, see how hard it is. And thus the general experience of the senses, as was said before, is termed "the lust of the eyes," because the function of seeing, wherein the eyes hold the pre-eminence, the other senses by way of similitude take possession of, whensoever they seek out any knowledge.

55. But by this is it more clearly discerned, when pleasure and when curiosity is pursued by the senses; for pleasure follows after objects that are beautiful, melodious, fragrant, savoury, soft; but curiosity, for experiment's sake, seeks the contrary of these, not with a view of undergoing uneasiness, but from the passion of experimenting upon and knowing them. For what pleasure is there to see, in a lacerated corpse, that which makes you shudder ? And yet if it lie near, we flock thither, to be made sad, and to turn pale. Even in sleep they fear lest they should see it. Just as if when awake any one compelled them to go and see it, or any report of its beauty had attracted them ! Thus also is it with the other senses, which it were tedious to pursue. From this malady of curiosity are all those strange sights exhibited in the theatre. Hence do we proceed to search out the secret powers of nature (which is beside our end), which to know profits not, and wherein men desire nothing but to know. Hence, too, with that same end of perverted knowledge we consult magical arts. Hence, again, even in religion itself, is God tempted, when signs and wonders are eagerly asked of Him, not desired for any saving end, but to make trial only.

56. In this so vast a wilderness, replete with snares and

1 Augustine's great end was to attain the knowledge of God. Hence, in his Soliloquia, i. 7, we read: " Deum et animam scire cupio. Nihilne plus ? Nihil omnino." And he only esteemed the knowledge of physical laws so far as they would lead to Him. (See v. sec. 7, above, and the note there.) In his De Ordine, it. 14, 15, etc., writing at the time of his conversion, he had contended that the knowledge of the liberal sciences would lead to a knowledge of the divine wisdom; but in his Retractations (i. 3, sec. 2) he regrets this, pointing out that while many holy men have not this knowledge, many who have it are not holy. Compare also Enchir. c. 16; Serm. lxviii. 1, 2; and De Civ, Dei, ix. 22.

CHAP. XXXV.] THE MANIFOLD TEMPTATIONS OF CURIOsITY. 277

dangers, lo, many of them have I lopped off, and expelled from my heart, as Thou, O God of my salvation, hast enabled me to do. And yet when dare I say, since so many things of this kind buzz around our daily life, when dare I say that no such thing makes me intent to see it, or creates in me vain solicitude? It is true that the theatres never now carry me away, nor do I now care to know the courses of the stars, nor hath my soul at any time consulted departed spirits; all sacrilegious oaths I abhor. Lord my God, to whom I owe all humble and single-hearted service, with what subtlety of suggestion does the enemy influence me to require some sign from Thee!

But by our King, and by our pure and chaste country Jerusalem, I beseech Thee, that as any consenting unto such thoughts is far from me, so may it always be farther and farther. But when I entreat Thee for the salvation of any, the end I aim at is far otherwise, and Thou who doest what Thou wilt, givest and wilt give me willingly to " follow " Thee. 1

57. Nevertheless, in how many most minute and contemptible things is our curiosity daily tempted, and who can number how often we succumb? How often, when people are narrating idle tales, do we begin by tolerating them, lest we should give offence unto the weak; and then gradually we listen willingly! I do not now-a-days go to the circus to see a dog chasing a hare; 2 but if by chance I pass such a coursing in the fields, it possibly distracts me even from some serious thought, and draws me after it, not that I turn the body of my beast aside, but the inclination of my mind. And except Thou, by demonstrating to me my weakness, dost speedily warn me, either through the sight itself, by some reflection to rise to Thee, or wholly to despise and pass it by, I, vain one, am absorbed by it. How is it, when sitting at home, a lizard catching flies, or a spider entangling them as they rush into her nets, oftentimes arrests me? Is the feeling of curiosity

not the same because these are such tiny creatures? From them I proceed to praise Thee, the wonderful Creator and Disposer of all things; but it is not this that first attracts my attention. It is one thing to get up quickly, and another not to fall, and of such things is my life full; and my only hope is in Thy exceeding great mercy. For when this heart of ours is made the receptacle of such things, and bears crowds of this abounding vanity, then are our prayers often interrupted and disturbed thereby; and whilst in Thy presence we direct the voice of our heart to Thine, this so great a matter is broken off by the influx of I know not what idle thoughts.

Chap. xxxvi. A third kind is "pride," which is pleasing to man, not to God,

58. Shall we, then, account this too amongst such things as are to be lightly esteemed, or shall anything restore us to hope, save Thy complete mercy, since Thou hast begun to change us? And Thou knowest to what extent Thou hast already changed me, Thou who first healest me of the lust of vindicating myself, that so Thou mightest forgive all my remaining "iniquities," and heal all my "diseases," and redeem my life from corruption, and crown me with "loving-kindness and tender mercies," and satisfy my desire with "good things," 1 who didst restrain my pride with Thy fear, and subdue my neck to Thy "yoke." And now I bear it, and it is "light" 2 unto me, because so hast Thou promised, and made it, and so in truth it was, though I knew it not, when I feared to take it up. But, Lord, Thou who alone reignest without pride, because Thou art the only true Lord, who hast no lord, hath this third kind of temptation left me, or can it leave me during this life?

59. The desire to be feared and loved of men, with no other view than that I may experience a joy therein which is no joy, is a miserable life, and unseemly ostentation. Hence especially it arises that we do not love Thee, nor devoutly fear Thee. And therefore dost Thou resist the proud, but givest grace unto the humble; 3 and Thou thunderest upon the ambitious designs of the world, and "the foundations of the hills" tremble. 4 Because now certain offices of human society render it necessary to be loved and feared of men, the adversary of our true blessedness presseth hard upon us, everywhere scattering his snares of "well done, well done;" that while acquiring them eagerly, we may be caught unawares, and disunite our joy from Thy truth, and fix it on the deceits of men; and take pleasure in being loved and feared, not for Thy sake, but in Thy stead, by which means, being made like unto him, he may have them as his, not in harmony of love, but in the fellowship of punishment; who aspired to exalt his throne in the north, 1 that dark and cold they might serve him, imitating Thee in perverse and distorted ways. But we, Lord, lo, we are Thy "little flock;" 2 do Thou possess us, stretch Thy wings over us, and let us take refuge under them. Be Thou our glory; let us be loved for Thy sake, and Thy word feared in us. They who desire to be commended of men when Thou blamest, will not be defended of men when Thou judgest; nor will they be delivered when Thou condemnest. But when not the sinner is praised in the desires of his soul, nor he blessed who doeth unjustly, 3 but a man is praised for some gift that Thou hast bestowed upon him, and he is more gratified at the praise for himself, than that he possesses the gift for which he is praised, such a one is praised while Thou blamest. And better truly is he who praised than the one who was praised. For the gift of God in man was pleasing to the one, while the other was better pleased with the gift of man than that of God.

Chap, xxxvii. He is forcibly goaded on by the love of praise.

60. By these temptations, O Lord, are we daily tried; yea, unceasingly are we tried. Our daily " furnace " 4 is the human tongue. And in this respect also dost Thou command us to be continent. Give what Thou commandest, and command what Thou wilt. Eegarding this matter, Thou knowest the groans of my heart, and the rivers 5 of mine eyes. For I am not able to ascertain how far I am clean of this plague, and I stand in great fear of my " secret faults," 6 which Thine eyes perceive, though mine do not. For in other kinds of temptations I have some sort of power of examining myself; but in this, hardly any. For, both as regards the pleasures of the flesh and an idle curiosity, I see how far I have been able to hold my mind in check when I do without them, either voluntarily or by reason of their not being at hand; 1 for then I inquire of myself how much more or less troublesome it is to me not to have them. Eiches truly which are sought for in order that they may minister to some one of these three " lusts," 2 or to two, or the whole of them, if the mind be not able to see clearly whether, when it hath them, it despiseth them, they may be cast on one side, that so it may prove itself. But if we desire to test our power of doing without praise, need we live ill, and that so flagitiously and immoderately as that every one who knows us shall detest us ? What greater madness than this can be either said or conceived ? But if praise both is wont and ought to be the companion of a good life and of good works, we should as little forego its companionship as a good life itself. But unless a thing be absent, I do not know whether I shall be contented or troubled at being without it.

61. What, then, do I confess unto Thee, Lord, in this kind of temptation? What, save that I am delighted with praise, but more with the truth itself than with praise? For were I to have my choice, whether I had rather, being mad, or astray on all things, be praised by all men, or, being firm and well-assured in the truth, be blamed by all, I see which I should choose. Yet would I be unwilling that the approval of another should even add to my joy for any good I have. Yet I admit that it doth increase it, and, more than that, that dispraise doth diminish it. And when I am disquieted at this misery of mine, an excuse presents itself to me, the value of which Thou, God, knowest, for it renders me uncertain. For since it is not continency alone that Thou hast enjoined upon us, that is, from what things to hold back our love, but righteousness also, that is, upon what to bestow it, and hast wished us to love not Thee only, but also our neighbour, I often, when gratified by intelligent praise, I appear to myself to be gratified by the proficiency or towardliness of my neighbour, and again to be sorry for evil in him when I hear him dispraise either that which he understands not, or is good. For I am sometimes grieved at mine own praise, either when those things which I am displeased at in myself be praised in me, or even lesser and trifling goods are more valued than they should be. But, again, how do I know whether I am thus affected, because I am unwilling that he who praiseth me should differ from me concerning myself not as being moved with consideration for him, but because the same good things which please me in myself are more pleasing to me when they also please another? For, in a sort, I am not praised when my judgment of myself is not praised; since either those things which are displeasing to me are praised, or those more so which are less pleasing to me. Am I then uncertain of myself in this matter?

62. Behold, Truth, in Thee do I see that I ought not to be moved at my own praises for my own sake, but for my neighbour's good. And whether it be so, in truth I know not. For concerning this I know less of myself than dost Thou. I beseech Thee now, my God, to reveal to me myself also, that I may confess unto my brethren, who are to pray for me, what I find in myself weak. Once again let me more diligently examine myself. 2 If, in mine own praise, I am moved with consideration for my neighbour, why am I less moved if some other man be unjustly dispraised than if it be myself? Why am I more irritated at that reproach which is

8 It may be well, in connection with the striking piece of soul-anatomy in this and the last two sections, to advert to other passages in which Augustine speaks of the temptation arising from the praise of men. In Serm. ccexxxix. 1, he says that he does not altogether dislike praise when it comes from the good, though feeling it to be a snare, and does not reject it: "Ne ingrati sint quibus pra:dieo." That is, as he says above, he accepted it for his "neighbour's good," since, had his neighbour not been ready to give praise, it would have indicated cast upon myself, than at that which is with equal injustice cast upon another in my presence? Am I ignorant of this also? or does it remain that I deceive myself, 1 and do not the "truth" 2 before Thee in my heart and tongue? Put such madness far from me, O Lord, lest my mouth be to me the oil of sinners, to anoint my head. 3

Chap. xxxviii. Vain-glory is the highest danger.

63. "lam poor and needy," 4 yet better am I while in secret groanings I displease myself, and seek for Thy mercy, until what is lacking in me be renewed and made complete, even up to that peace of which the eye of the proud is ignorant. Yet the word which proceeceth out of the mouth, and actions known to men, have a most dangerous temptation from the love of praise, which, for the establishing of a certain excellency of our own, gathers together solicited suffrages. It tempts, even when within I reprove myself for it, on the very ground that it is reproved; and often man glories more vainly of the very scorn of vain-glory; wherefore it is not any longer scorn of vain-glory whereof it glories, for he does not truly contemn it when he inwardly glories.

Chap. xxxix. Of the vice of those who, while pleasing themselves, displease God.

64. Within also, within is another evil, arising out of the same kind of temptation; whereby they become empty who please themselves in themselves, although they please not, or displease, or aim at pleasing others. But in pleasing them-a wrong condition of heart in him. We are, therefore, as he argues in his De Serm. Bom. in Mon. ii. 1, 2, 6, to see that the design of our acts he not that men should see and praise us (compare also Enarr. in Ps. lxv. 2). If they praise us it is well, since it shows that their heart is right; but ii we "act rightly only because of the praise of men" (Matt. vi. 2, 5), we seek our own glory and not that of God. 3 Ps. cxli. 5, recording to the Vulg. and LXX. The Authorized Version (with which the Targum is in accord) gives the more probable sense, when it makes the oil to be that of the righteous and not that of the sinner: "Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness; and let him reprove me, it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head."

elves, they much displease Thee, not merely taking pleasure in things not good as if they were good, but in Thy good things as though they were their own; or even as if in thine, yet as though of their own merits; or even as if hough of Thy grace, yet not with friendly rejoicings, but as nvyng that grace to others. I In all these and similar perils and abours Thou perceivest the trembling of my heart, and I rather feel my wounds to be cured by Thee than not inflicted by me.

Chap. xl. The only safe resting-place for the soul is to be found in God.

65. Where hast Thou not accompanied me, O Truth, 2 eaching me both what to avoid and what to desire, when I submitted to Thee what I could perceive of sublunary things, and asked Thy counsel? With my external senses, as I could, I viewed the world, and noted the life which my body derives from me, and these my senses. Thence I advanced inwardly into the recesses of my memory, the manifold ooms, wondrously full of multitudinous wealth; and I conidered and was afraid, and could discern none of these things without Thee, and found none of them to be Thee. STor was I myself the discoverer of these things, I, who went over them all, and laboured to distinguish and to value everything according to its dignity, accepting some things upon lie report of my senses, and questioning about others which I elt to be mixed up with myself, distinguishing and numberng the reporters themselves, and in the vast storehouse of my memory investigating some things, laying up others, taking mt others. Neither was I myself when I did this (that is, that ability of mine whereby I did it), nor was it Thou, for Thou art that never-failing light which I took counsel of as to them all, whether they were what they were, and what was their worth; and I heard Thee teaching and commanding me. A.nd this I do often; this is a delight to me, and, as far as I can get relief from necessary duties, to this gratification do I resort. Nor in all these which I review when consulting Thee, find I a secure place for my soul, save in Thee, into whom my scattered members may be gathered together, and nothing of me depart from Thee. 1 And sometimes Thou dost introduce me to a most rare affection, inwardly, to an inexplicable sweetness, which, if it should be perfected in me, I know not to what point that life might not arrive. But by these wretched weights 2 of mine do I relapse into these things, and am sucked in by my old customs, and am held, and sorrow much, yet am much held. To such an extent does the burden of habit press us down. In this way I can be, but will not; in that I will, but cannot, on both ways miserable.

Chap. xli. Having conquered his triple desire, he arrives at salvation.

66. And thus have I reflected upon the wearinesses of my sins, in that threefold "lust," 3 and have invoked Thy right hand to my aid. For with a wounded heart have I seen Thy brightness, and being beaten back I exclaimed, "Who can attain unto it?" "I am cut off from before Thine eyes." 4
Thou art the Truth, who presidest over all things, but I, through my covetousness, wished not to lose Thee, but with Thee wished to possess a lie; as no one wishes so to speak falsely as himself to be ignorant of the truth. So then I lost Thee, because Thou deignest not to be enjoyed with a lia

67. Whom could I find to reconcile me to Thee? Was I to solicit the angels? By what prayer? By what sacraments?
Many striving to return unto Thee, and not able of themselves, have, as I am told, tried this, and have fallen into a longing for curious visions, 5 and were held worthy to be deceived.

5 It would be easy so to do, since even amongst believers, as we find from Evodius' letter to Augustine (Ep. clvi.), there was a prevalent belief that the blessed dead visited the earth, and that visions had an important bearing on human affairs. See also Augustine's answer to Evodius, in Ep. clix.; Chrysostom, De Sacer. vi. 4; and on Visions, see sec. 41, note, above.

i.HAP. XLIII.] THE MEDIATOR, GOD AND MAN. 285

Ir or they, being exalted, sought Thee by the pride of learning, trusting themselves forward rather than beating their breasts, and so by correspondence of heart drew unto themselves the princes of the air, 1 the conspirators and companions in pride, by whom, through the power of magic, 2 they were deceived, i.e., seeking a mediator by whom they might be cleansed; but none was there. For the devil it was, transforming himself into an angel of light. 3 And he much allured proud flesh, in that he had no fleshly body. For they were mortal, and sinful; but Thou, O Lord, to whom they arrogantly sought to be reconciled, art immortal, and sinless. But a mediator between God and man ought to have something like unto God, and something like unto man; lest being in both like unto man, he should be far from God; or if in both like unto God, he should be far from man, and so should not be a mediator. That deceitful mediator, then, by whom in Thy secret judgments pride deserved to be deceived, hath one thing in common with man, that is, sin; another he would appear to have with God, and, not being clothed with mortality of flesh, would boast that he was immortal. 4 But since "the wages of sin is death," 5 this hath he in common with men, that together with them he should be condemned to death.

Chap. xliii. That Jesus Christ, at the same time God and man, is the true and most efficacious Mediator.

68. But the true Mediator, whom in Thy secret mercy Thou hast pointed out to the humble, and didst send, that by His example 6 also they might learn the same humility that "Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus," 7 appeared between mortal sinners and the immortal Just One mortal with men, just with God; that because the reward of righteousness is life and peace, He might, by righteousness conjoined with God, cancel the death of justified sinners, which He willed to have in common with them. 1 Hence He was pointed out to holy men of old; to the intent that they, through faith in His Passion to come, 2 even as we through faith in that which is past, might be saved. For as man He was Mediator; but as the Word He was not between, 3 because equal to God, and God with God, and together with the Holy Spirit 4 one God.

69. How hast Thou loved us, 5 O good Father, who sparedst not Thine only Son, but deliverrdst Him up for us wicked ones! 6

1 Not that our Lord is to be supposed, as some have held, to have been under the law of death in Adam, because "in Adam all die" (1 Cor. xv. 22; see the whole of c. 23, in De Civ. Dei, xiii., and compare ix. sec. 34, note 2, above); for he says in Serm. ccxxxii. 5: "As there was nothing in us from which life could spring, so there was nothing in Him from which death could come." He laid down His life (John x. 18), and as being partaker of the divine nature, could see no corruption (Acts ii. 27). This is the explanation Augustine gives in his comment on Ps. lxxxv. 5 (quoted in the next section) of Christ's being "free among the dead." So also in his De Trin. xiii. 18, he says he was thus free because "solus enim a debito mortis liber est mortuus."

The true analogy between the first and second Adam is surely then to be found in our Lord's being free from the law of death by reason of His divine nature, and Adam before his transgression being able to avert death by partaking of the Tree of Life. Christ was, it is true, a child of Adam, but a child of Adam miraculously born. See note, p. 68, above.

4 Some mss. omit Cum spiritu sancto.

5 Christ did not, as in the words of a well-known hymn, " change the wrath to love. " For, as Augustine remarks in a very beautiful passage in Ev. Joh. Tract. ex. 6, God loved us before the foundation of the world, and the reconcilement wrought by Christ must not be "so understood as if the Son reconciled us unto Him in this respect, that He now began to love those whom He formerly hated, in the same way as enemy is reconciled to enemy, so that thereafter they become friends, and mutual love takes the place of their mutual hatred; but we were reconciled unto Him who already loved us, but with whom we were at enmity because of our sin. Whether I say the truth on this let the apostle testify, when he says: ' God commendeth His love towards us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us ' " (Rom. v. 8, 9). He similarly applies the text last quoted in his De Trin. xiii. 15. See also ibid. sec. 21, where he speaks of the wrath of God, and ibid. iv. 2. both his life and doctrine, pointing to his Manichreanism and the sinfulness of life before baptism. In his Answer to Petilian, iii. 11, 20, etc., and Serm. 3, sec. 19, on Ps. xxxvi., he alludes at length to the charges brought against him, referring then finally to his own confessions in book iii. above.

CHAP. I. THE DESIGN OF HIS CONFESSIONS. 289

BOOK ELEVENTH.

Chap. i. By confession he desires to stimulate towards God his own love and that of his readers.

1. 1 LOKD, since eternity is Thine, art Thou ignorant of the things which I say unto Thee? Or seest Thou at the time that which cometh to pass in time? Why, therefore, do I place before Thee so many relations of things? Not surely that Thou mightest know them through me, but that I may awaken my own love and that of my readers towards Thee, that we may all say, "Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised." * I have already said, and shall say, for the love of Thy love do I this. For we also pray, and yet Truth says, "Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask Him." 2 Therefore do we make known unto Thee our love, in confessing unto Thee our own miseries and Thy mercies upon us, that Thou mayest free us altogether, since Thou hast begun, that we may cease to be wretched in ourselves, and that we may be blessed in Thee; since Thou hast called us, that we may be poor in spirit, and meek, and mourners, and hungering and thirsting after righteousness, and merciful, and pure in heart, and peacemakers. 3 Behold, I have told unto Thee many things, which I could and which I would, for Thou first wouldest that I should confess unto Thee, the Lord my God, for Thou art good, since Thy "mercy endureth for ever." 4

290 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE [BOOK XI.]

Chap. ii. He begs of God that through the Holy Scriptures he may be led to truth.

2. But when shall I suffice with the tongue of my pen to express all Thy exhortations, and all Thy terrors, and comforts, and guidances, whereby Thou hast led me to preach Thy Word and to dispense Thy Sacrament * unto Thy people? And if I suffice to utter these things in order, the drops 2 of time are dear to me. Long time have I burned to meditate in Thy law, and in it to confess to Thee my knowledge and ignorance, the beginning of Thine enlightening, and the remains of my darkness, until infirmity be swallowed up by strength. And I would not that to aught else those hours should flow away, which I find free from the necessities of refreshing my body, and the care of my mind, and of the service which we owe to men, and which, though we owe not, even yet we pay. 8

3. O Lord my God, hear my prayer, and let Thy mercy regard my longing, since it burns not for myself alone, but because it desires to benefit brotherly charity; and Thou seest into my heart, that so it is. I would sacrifice to Thee the
1 He very touchingly alludes in Serm. ccclv. 2 to the way in which he was forced against his will (as was frequently the custom in those days), first, to become a presbyter (a.d. 391), and, four years later, coadjutor to Valerius, Bishop of Hippo (Ep. xxxi. 4, and Ep. ccxiii. 4), whom on his death he succeeded.

His own wish was to establish a monastery, and to this end he sold his patrimony, "which consisted of only a few small fields" (Ep. cxxvi. 7). He absolutely dreaded to become a bishop, and as he knew his name was highly esteemed in the Church, he avoided cities in which the see was vacant. His former backsliding had made him humble; and he tells us in the sermon above referred to "Cavebam hoc, et agebam quantae poteram, ut in loco humili salvaber in alto periclitarer." Augustine also alludes to his ordination in Ep. xxix. addressed to Bishop Valerius.

2 " He alludes to the hour-glasses of his time, which went by water, as ours do now by sand." W. W.

3 Augustine, in common with other bishops, had his time much invaded by those who sought his arbitration or judicial decision in secular matters, and in his De Op. Monach. sec. 37, he says, what many who have much mental toil will readily appreciate, that he would rather have spent the time not occupied in prayer and the study of the Scriptures in working with his hands, as did the monks, than have to bear these tumultuosisshnas perplexitates. In the year 426 we find him (Ep. ccxiii.) designating Eraclius, in public assembly, as his successor in the see, and to relieve him (though, meanwhile, remaining a presbyter) of these anxious duties. See vi. sec. 16, and note 1, above; and also ibid. sec. 3.

Circumcise from all rashness and from all lying my inward and outward lips. 3 Let Thy Scriptures be my chaste delights. Neither let me be deceived in them, nor deceive out of them. 4 Lord, hear and pity, Lord my God, light of the blind, and strength of the weak; even also light of those that see, and strength of the strong, hearken unto my soul, and hear it crying "out of the depths." 6 For unless Thine ears be present in the depths also, whither shall we go? whither shall we cry ? " The day is Thine, and the night also is Thine." 6

At Thy nod the moments ilee by. Grant thereof space for our meditations amongst the hidden things of Thy law, nor close it against us who knock. For not in vain hast Thou willed that the obscure secret of so many pages should be written. Nor is it that those forests have not their harts, 7 betaking
4 Augustine is always careful to distinguish between the certain truths of faith and doctrine which all may know, and the mysteries of Scripture which all have not the ability equally to apprehend. "Among the things," he says (De Doctr. Christ, ii. 14), "that are plainly laid down in Scripture, are to be found all matters that concern faith, and the manner of life. " As to the Scriptures that are obscure, he is slow to come to conclusions, lest he should " be deceived in them or deceive out of them." In his De Gen. ad Lit. i. 37, he gives a useful warning against forcing our own meaning on Scripture in doubtful questions, and, ibid. viii. 5, we have the memorable words: "Melius est dubitare de rebus occultis, quam litigare de incertis. " For examples of how careful he is in such matters not to go beyond what is written, see his answer to the question raised by Evodius, a question which reminds us of certain modern speculations (see The Unseen Universe, arts. 61, 201, etc.), whether the soul on departing from the body has not still a body of some kind, and at least some of the senses proper to a body; and also (Ep. clxiv.) his endeavours to unravel Evodius' difficulties as to Christ's preaching to the spirits in prison (1 Pet. iii. 18-21). Similarly, he says, as to the Antichrist of 2 Thess. ii. 1-7 (De Civ. Dei, xx. 19): " I frankly confess I know not what he means. I will, nevertheless, mention such conjectures as I have heard or read." See notes, pp. 48 and 115, above.

5 Ps. cxxx. 1. Ps. lxxiv. 16.

7 Ps. xxix. 9. In his comment on this place as given in the Old Version, "vox Domini perficientis cervos," he makes the forest with its thick darkness to symbolize the mysteries of Scripture, while the harts ruminating thereon represent the pious Christian meditating on those mysteries (see vi. sec. 3, note, above). In this same passage he speaks of those who are thus being perfected as overcomthemselves therein, and ranging, and walking, and feeding, lying down, and ruminating. Perfect me, Lord, and reveal them unto me. Behold, Thy voice is my joy, Thy voice surpasseth the abundance of pleasures. Give that which I love, for I do love; and this hast Thou given. Abandon not Thine own gifts, nor despise Thy grass that thirsteth. Let me confess unto Thee whatsoever I shall have found in Thy books, and let me hear the voice of praise, and let me imbibe Thee, and reflect on the wonderful things of Thy law; I even from the beginning, wherein Thou madest the heaven and the earth, unto the everlasting kingdom of Thy holy city that is with Thee.

4. Lord, have mercy on me and hear my desire. For I think that it is not of the earth, nor of gold and silver, and precious stones, nor gorgeous apparel, nor honours and powers, nor the pleasures of the flesh, nor necessaries for the body, and this life of our pilgrimage; all which are added to those that seek Thy kingdom and Thy righteousness. 8 Behold, Lord my God, whence is my desire. The unrighteous have told me of delights, but not such as Thy law, Lord. 8 Behold whence is my desire. Behold, Father, look and see, and approve; and let it be pleasing in the sight of Thy mercy, that I may find grace before Thee, that the secret things of Thy Word may be opened unto me when I knock. 4 I beseech, by our Lord Jesus Christ, Thy Son, "the Man of Thy right hand, the Son of man, whom Thou madest strong for Thyself," 5 as Thy Mediator and ours, through whom Thou hast sought us, although not seeking Thee, but didst seek us that we might seek Thee, 6 Thy Word through whom Thou hast made all things, 7 and amongst them me also, ing the poisoned tongues. This is an allusion to the fabled power the stags had of enticing serpents from their holes by their breath, and then destroying them.

Augustine is very fond of this kind of fable from natural history. In his Enarr. in Ps. cxxix. and cxi., we have similar allusions to the supposed habits of stags; and, ibid. ci., we have the well-known fable of the pelican in its charity reviving its young, and feeding them with its own blood. This use of fables was very common with the mediaeval writers, and those familiar with the writings of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries will recall many illustrations of it amongst the preachers of those days.

Thy Only-begotten, through whom Thou hast called to adoption the believing people, and therein me also. I beseech Thee through Him, who sitteth at Thy right hand, and "maketh intercession for us," 1 "in whom are hid all treasures of wisdom and knowledge." 2 Him 3 do I seek in Thy books. Of Him did Moses write; 4 this saith Himself; this saith the Truth.

Chap. hi. He begins from the creation of the world not understanding the Hebrew text.

5. Let me hear and understand how in the beginning Thou didst make the heaven and the earth. 5 Moses wrote this; he wrote and departed, passed hence from Thee to Thee. Nor now is he before me; for if he were I would hold him, and ask him, and would adjure him by Thee that he would open unto me these things, and I would lend the ears of my body to the sounds bursting; forth from his mouth. And should he speak in the Hebrew tongue, in vain would it beat on my senses, nor would aught touch my mind; but if in Latin, I should know what he said. But whence should I know whether he said what was true? But if I knew this even, should I know it from him? Verily within me, within in the chamber of my thought, Truth, neither Hebrew, nor Greek, nor Latin, nor barbarian, without the organs of voice and tongue, without the sound of syllables, would say, "He speaks the truth," and I, forthwith assured of it, confidently would say

6 Augustine was not singular amongst the early Fathers in not knowing Hebrew, for of the Greeks only Origen, and of the Latins Jerome, knew anything of it. We find him confessing his ignorance both here and elsewhere (Enarr. in Ps. cxxxvi. 7, and De Doctr.
Christ, ii. 22); and though he recommends a knowledge of Hebrew as well as Greek, to correct "the endless diversity of the Latin translators" (De. Doctr. Christ, ii. 16), he speaks as strongly as does Grinfield, in his Apology for the Septuagint, in favour of the claims of that version to "biblical and canonical authority" (Eps. xxviii., lxxii., and lxxv.; De Civ. Dei, xviii. 42, 43; De Doctr. Christ, ii. 22). He discountenanced Jerome's new translation, probably from fear of giving offence, and, as we gather from Ep.
lxxi. 5, not without cause. From the tumult he there describes as ensuing upon Jerome's version being read, the outcry would appear to have been as great as when, on the change of the old style of reckoning to the new, the ignorant mob clamoured to have back their pleven days!
unto that man of Thine, "Thou speakest the truth." As, then, I cannot inquire of him, I beseech Thee, Thee, Truth, full of whom he spake truth, Thee, my God, I beseech, forgive my sins; and do Thou, who didst give to that Thy servant to speak these things, grant to me also to understand them.

Chap. iv. Heaven and earth cry out that they have been created by Ood.

6. Behold, the heaven and earth are; they proclaim that they were made, for they are changed and varied. Whereas whatsoever hath not been made, and yet hath being, hath nothing in it which there was not before; this is what it is to be changed and varied. They also proclaim that they made not themselves; "therefore we are, because we have been made; we were not therefore before we were, so that we could have made ourselves." And the voice of those that speak is in itself an evidence. Thou, therefore, Lord, didst make these things; Thou who art beautiful, for they are beautiful; Thou who art good, for they are good; Thou who art, for they are. Nor even so are they beautiful, nor good, nor are they, as Thou their Creator art; compared with whom they are neither beautiful, nor good, nor are at all. 1 These things we know, thanks be to Thee. And our knowledge, compared with Thy knowledge, is ignorance.

Chap. v. Ood created the world not from any certain matter, but in His own loord.

7. But how didst Thou make the heaven and the earth, and what was the instrument of Thy so mighty work? For it was not as a human worker fashioning body from body, according to the fancy of his mind, in somewise able to assign a form which it perceives in itself by its inner eye. 2 And whence should he be able to do this, hadst not Thou made

1 It was the doctrine of Aristotle that excellence of character is the proper object of love, and in proportion as we recognise such excellence in others are we attracted to become like them (see Sidgwick's Methods of Ethics, book iv. c. 5, sec. 4). If this be true of the creature, how much more should it be so of the Creator, who is the perfection of all that we can conceive of goodness and truth.
Compare De Trin. viii. 3-6, De Vera Relig. 57, and an extract from Athauese Coquerel in Archbishop Thomson's Bampton Lectures, note 73.

that mind? And he assigns to it already existing, and as it were having a being, a form, as clay, or stone, or wood, or gold, or such like. And whence should these things be, hadst not Thou appointed them? Thou didst make for the workman his body, Thou the mind commanding the limbs, Thou the matter whereof he makes anything, 1 Thou the capacity whereby he may apprehend his art, and see within what he may do without, Thou the sense of his body, by which, as by an interpreter, he may from mind unto matter convey that which he doeth, and report to his mind what may have been done, that it within may consult the truth, presiding over itself, whether it be well done. All these things praise Thee, the Creator of all. But how dost Thou make them? How, O God, didst Thou make heaven and earth? Truly, neither in the heaven nor in the earth didst Thou make heaven and earth; nor in the air, nor in the waters, since these also belong to the heaven and the earth; nor in the whole world didst Thou make the whole world; because there was no place wherein it could be made before it was made, that it might be; nor didst Thou hold anything in Thy hand wherewith to make heaven and earth. For whence couldest Thou have what Thou hadst not made, whereof to make anything? For what is, save because Thou art? Therefore Thou didst speak and they were made, 2 and in Thy Word Thou madest these things. 8

Chap. vi. He did not, however, create it by a sounding and passing word.

8. But how didst Thou speak? Was it in that manner in which the voice came from the cloud, saying, "This is my beloved Son"?* For that voice was uttered and passed away,

1 That is, the artificer makes, God creates. The creation of matter is distinctively a doctrine of revelation. The ancient philosophers believed in the eternity of matter. As Lucretius puts it (i. 51): "Nullam rem e nihilo gigni divinitus unquam." See Burton, Bampton Lectures, lect. iii. and notes 18-21, and Mansel, Bampton Lectures, lect. iii. note 12. See also p. 77, note, above, for the Manichsean doctrine as to the v*; and The Unseen Universe, arts. 85, 86, 151, and 160, for the modern doctrine of "continuity." * Ps. xxxiii. 9. 3 Ibid. ver. 6. Matt. xviL 5.
I began and ended. The syllables sounded and passed by, the second after the first, the third after the second, and thence in order, until the last after the rest, and silence after the last. Hence it is clear and plain that the motion of a creature expressed it, itself temporal, obeying Thy eternal will. And these thy words formed at the time, the outer ear conveyed to the intelligent mind, whose inner ear lay attentive to Thy eternal word. But it compared these words sounding in time with Thy eternal word in silence, and said, "It is different, very different. These words are far beneath me, nor are they, since they flee and pass away; but the Word of my Lord remaineth above me for ever." If, then, in sounding and fleeting words Thou didst say that heaven and earth should be made, and didst thus make heaven and earth, there was already a corporeal creature before heaven and earth by whose temporal motions that voice might take its course in time. But there was nothing corporeal before heaven and earth; or if there were, certainly Thou without a transitory voice hadst created that whence Thou wouldest make the passing voice, by which to say that the heaven and the earth should be made. For whatsoever that were of which such a voice was made, unless it were made by Thee, it could not be at all. By what word of Thine was it decreed that a body might be made, whereby these words might be made?

Chap. vii. By His co-eternal Word He speaks, and all things are done.

9. Thou callest us, therefore, to understand the Word, God with Thee, God; 1 which is spoken eternally, and by it are all things spoken eternally. For what was spoken was not finished, and another spoken until all were spoken; but all things at once and for ever. For otherwise have we time and change, and not a true eternity, nor a true immortality. This I know, my God, and give thanks. I know, I confess to Thee, Lord, and whosoever is not unthankful to certain truth, knows and blesses Thee with me. We know, Lord, we know; since in proportion as anything is not what it was, and is what it was not, in that proportion does it die and i arise. Not anything, therefore, of Thy Word giveth place and cometh into place again, because it is truly immortal and eternal. And, therefore, unto the Word co-eternal with Thee, i Thou dost at once and for ever say all that Thou dost say;

and whatever Thou sayest shall be made, is made; nor dost
Thou makest otherwise than by speaking; yet all things are not made both together and everlasting which Thou makest by speaking.

Chap. viii. That Word itself is the beginning of all things, in the which we are instructed as to evangelical truth.

10. Why is this, I beseech Thee, Lord my God? I see it, however, but how I shall express it, I know not, unless that everything which begins to be and ceases to be, then begins and ceases when in Thy eternal Reason it is known that it ought to begin or cease where nothing beginneth or I ceaseth. The same is Thy Word, which is also "the Beginning," because also It speaketh unto us. 1 Thus, in the gospel He speaketh through the flesh; and this sounded outwardly in the ears of men, that it might be believed and sought inwardly, and that it might be found in the eternal Truth, where the good and only Master teacheth all His disciples. There, O Lord, I hear Thy voice, the voice of one speaking unto me, since He speaketh unto us who teacheth us. But He that

1 John viii. 25, Old Ver. Though some would read, Qui et loquitur, making it correspond to the Vulgate, instead of Quia et loquitur, as above, the latter is doubtless the correct reading, since we find the text similarly quoted In Ev. Joh. Tract, xxxviii. 11, where he enlarges on " The Beginning," comparing principium with px*>; It will assist to the understanding of this section to refer to the early part of the note on p. 153, above, where the Platonic view of the Logos, as ἡμινίδερος and -ημπιξποπίκος, or in the "bosom of the Father " and "made flesh," is given; which terminology, as Dr. Newman tells us (Arians, pt. i. c. 2, sec. 4), was accepted by the Church. Augustine, consistently with this idea, says (on John viii. 25, as above): " For if the Beginning, as it is in itself, had remained so with the Father as not to receive the form of a servant and speak as man with men, how could they have believed in Him, since their weak hearts could not have heard the word intelligently without some voice that would appeal to their senses? Therefore, said He, believe me to be the Beginning; for that you may believe, I not only am, but also speak to you." Newman, as quoted above, may be referred to for the significance of &p%n as applied to the Son, and ibid. sec. 3, also, on the "Word." For the difference between a mere "voice" and the "Word," compare Aug. Serm. ccxciii. sec. 3, andOrigen, In Joann. iL 36.

teacheth us not, although He speaketh, speaketh not to us. Moreover, who teacheth us, unless it be the immutable Truth? For even when we are admonished through a changeable creature, we are led to the Truth immutable? There we learn truly while we stand and hear Him, and rejoice greatly.
"because of the Bridegroom's voice," 1 restoring us to that whence we are. And, therefore, the Beginning, because unless It remained, there would not, where we strayed, be whither to return. But when we return from error, it is by knowing that we return. But that we may know, He teacheth us, because He is the Beginning and speaketh unto us.

Chap. ix. Wisdom and the Beginning.

What is that which shines through me, and strikes my heart without injury, and I both shudder and burn ? I shudder inasmuch as I am unlike it; and I burn inasmuch as I am like it. It is Wisdom itself that shines through me, clearing my cloudiness, which again overwhelms me, fainting from it, in the darkness and amount of my punishment. For my strength is brought down in need, 2 so that I cannot endure my blessings, until Thou, O Lord, who hast been gracious to all mine iniquities, heal also all mine infirmities; because Thou shalt also redeem my life from corruption, and crown me with Thy loving-kindness and mercy, and shalt satisfy my desire with good things, because my youth shall be renewed like the eagle's. 3 For by hope we are saved; and through patience we await Thy promises. 4 Let him that is able hear Thee discoursing within. I will with confidence cry out from Thy oracle, How wonderful are Thy works, Lord, in Wisdom hast Thou made them all. 5 And this Wisdom is the Beginning, and in that Beginning hast Thou made heaven and earth.

Chap. X. The rashness of those who inquire what God did before He created heaven and earth.

1 2. Lo, are they not full of their ancient way, who say to us, " What was God doing before He made heaven and earth ?

B'or if," say they, " He were unoccupied, and did nothing, why does He not for ever also, and from henceforth, cease from working, as in times past He did ? For if any new motion has arisen in God, and a new will, to form a creature which He had never before formed, however can that be a true eternity where there ariseth a will which was not before?
For the will of God is not a creature, but before the creature; because nothing could be created unless the will of the Creator were before it. The will of God, therefore, pertaineth to His very Substance. But if anything hath arisen in the Substance of God which was not before, that Substance is not truly called eternal. But if it was the eternal will of God that the creature should be, why was not the creature also from eternity?

Chap. xi. They who ask this have not as yet followed the eternity of God, which is exempt from the relation of time.

13. Those who say these things do not as yet understand Thee, Thou Wisdom of God, Thou light of souls; not as yet do they understand how these things be made which are made by and in Thee. They even endeavour to comprehend things eternal; but as yet their heart flieth about in the past and future motions of things, and is still wavering.

Who shall hold it and fix it, that it may rest a little, and by degrees catch the glory of that ever-standing eternity, and compare it with the times which never stand, and see that it is incomparable; and that a long time cannot become long, save from the many motions that pass by, which cannot at the same instant be prolonged; but that in the Eternal nothing passeth away, but that the whole is present; but no 1 time is wholly present; and let him see that all time past is forced on by the future, and that all the future folio weth 1 from the past, and that all, both past and future, is created and issues from that which is always present? Who will hold the heart of man, that it may stand still, and see how the still-standing eternity, itself neither future nor past, uttereth the times future and past? Can my hand accomplish this, or the hand of my mouth by persuasion bring about a thing so great? 1

Chap. xii. What God did before the creation of the world.

14. Behold, I answer to him who asks, "What was God doing before He made heaven and earth?" I answer not, as a certain person is reported to have done facetiously (avoiding the pressure of the question), "He was preparing hell," saith he, "for those who pry into mysteries." It is one thing to perceive, another to laugh, these things I answer not. For more willingly would I have answered, "I know not what I know not," than that I should make him a laughing-stock who asketh deep things, and gain praise as one who answereth false things. But I say that Thou, our God, art the Creator of every creature; and if by the term "heaven and earth" every creature is understood, I boldly say, "That before God made heaven and earth, He made not anything. For if He did, what did He make unless the creature?" And would that I knew whatever I desire to know to my advantage, as I know that no creature was made before any creature was made.

Chap. xiii. Before the times created by God, times were not.

15. But if the roving thought of any one should wander through the images of bygone time, and wonder that Thou, the God Almighty, and All-creating, and All-sustaining, the Architect of heaven and earth, didst for innumerable ages refrain from so great a work before Thou wouldst make it, let him awake and consider that he wonders at false things. For whence could innumerable ages pass by which Thou didst not make, since Thou art the Author and Creator of all ages? Or what times should those be which were not made by Thee? Or how should they pass by if they had not been? Shice, therefore, Thou art the Creator of all times, if any time was before Thou madest heaven and earth, why is it said that Thou didst refrain from working? For that very time Thou madest, lor could times pass by before Thou madest times. But if before leaven and earth there was no time, why is it asked, What lidst Thou then? For there was no "then" when time was not.

16. Nor dost Thou by time precede time; else wouldst lot Thou precede all times. But in the excellency of an omnipresent eternity, Thou precedest all times past, and survivest all future times, because they are future, and when they have come they will be past; but "Thou art the same, ind Thy years shall have no end." I Thy years neither go jior come; but ours both go and come, that all may come.

All Thy years stand at once, since they do stand; nor were they when departing excluded by coming years, because they pass not away; but all these of ours shall be when all shall jease to be. Thy years are one day, and Thy day is not jdaily, but to-day; because Thy to-day yields not with to-morrow, for neither doth it follow yesterday. Thy to-day is eternity; therefore didst Thou beget the Co-eternal, to whom Thou saidst, "This day have I begotten Thee." 2 Thou hast made all time; and before all times Thou art, nor in any time was there not time.

Chap. xiv. Neither time past nor future, but the present only, really is.

17. At no time, therefore, hadst Thou not made anything, because Thou hadst made time itself. And no times are co-eternal with Thee, because Thou remainest for ever; but should these continue, they would not be times. For what is time? Who can easily and briefly explain it? Who even in thought can comprehend it, even to the pronouncing of a word concerning it? But what in speaking do we refer to more familiarly and knowingly than time? And certainly we understand when we speak of it; we understand also when we hear it spoken of by another. What, then, is time? If no one ask of me, I know; if I wish to explain to him who asks, I know not. Yet I say with confidence, that I know that if nothing passed away, there would not be past time; and if nothing were coming, there would not be future time; and if nothing were, there would not be present time. Those two times, therefore, past and future, how are they, when even the past now is not, and the future is not as yet? But should the present be always present, and should it not pass into time past, time truly it could not be, but eternity. If, then, time present if it be time only comes into existence because it passes into time past, how do we say that even this is, whose cause of being is that it shall not be namely, so that we cannot truly say that time is, unless because it tends not to be?

1 Ps. cii. 27. J Ps. ii. 7, and Heb. v. 6.

, Chap. xv. There is only a moment of present time.

18. And yet we say that "time is long and time is short;" nor do we speak of this save of time past and future. A long time past, for example, we call a hundred years ago; in like manner a long time to come, a hundred years hence. But a short time past we call, say, ten days ago; and a short time to come, ten days hence. But in what sense is that long or short which is not? For the past is not now, and the future is not yet. Therefore let us not say, "It is long;" but let us say of the past, "It hath been long," and of the future, "It will be long." O my Lord, my light, shall not even here Thy truth deride man? For that past time which was long, was it long when it was already past, or when it was as yet present? For then it might be long when there was that which could be long, but when past it no longer was; wherefore that could not be long which was not at all. Let us not, therefore, say, "Time past hath been long;" for we shall not find what may have been long, seeing that since it was past it is not; but let us say "that present time was long, because when it was present it was long." For it had not as yet passed away so as not to be, and therefore there was that which could be long. But after it passed, that ceased also to be long which ceased to be.

19. Let us therefore see, O human soul, whether present time can be long; for to thee is it given to perceive and to measure periods of time. What wilt thou reply to me? Is a hundred years when present a long time? See, first, whether a hundred years can be present. For if the first year of these is current, that is present, but the other ninety and nine are future. And thus, if we fix on any middle year of this hundred as present, those before it are past, those after it are future; wherefore a hundred years cannot be present. See at least whether that year itself which is current can be present. For if its first month be current, the rest are future; if the second, the first hath already passed, and the remainder are not yet. Therefore neither is the year which is current as a whole present; and if it is not present as a whole, then the year is not present. For twelve months make the year, of which each individual month which is current is itself present, but the rest are either past or future. Although neither is that month which is current present, but one day only: if the first, the rest being to come. if the last, the rest being past; if any of the middle, then between past and future.

20. Behold, the present time, which alone we found could be called long, is abridged to the space scarcely of one day. But let us discuss even that, for there is not one day present as a whole. For it is made up of four-and-twenty hours of night and day, whereof the first hath the rest future, the last hath them past, but any one of the intervening hath those before it past, those after it future. And that one hour passeth away in fleeting particles. Whatever of it hath flown away is past, whatever remaineth is future. If any portion of time be conceived which cannot now be divided into even the minutest particles of moments, this only is that which may be called present; which, however, flies so rapidly from future to past, that it cannot be extended by any delay. For if it be extended, it is divided into the past and future; but the present hath no space. Where, therefore, is the time which we may call long? Is it future? Indeed we do not say, "It is long," because it is not yet, so as to be long; but we say, "It will be long." When, then, will it be? For if even then, since as yet it is future, it will not be long, because what may be long is not as yet; but it shall be long, when from the future, which as yet is not, it shall already have begun to be, and will have become present, so that there could be that which may be long; then doth the present time cry out in the words above that it cannot be long.

Chap. xvi. Time can only be perceived or measured while it is passing.

21. And yet, O Lord, we perceive intervals of times, and we compare them with themselves, and we say some are longer, others shorter. We even measure by how much shorter or longer this time may be than that; and we answer, "That this is double or treble, while that is but once, or only as much as that." But we measure times passing when we measure them by perceiving them; but past times, which now are not, or future times, which as yet are not, who can measure them? Unless, perchance, any one will dare to say, that that can be measured which is not. When, therefore, time is passing, it can be perceived and measured; but when it has passed, it cannot, since it is not.

Chap. xvii. Nevertheless there is time past and future.
22. I ask, Father, I do not affirm. O my God, rule and guide me. " Who is there who can say to me that there are not three times (as we learned when boys, and as we have taught boys), the past, present, and future, but only present, because these two are not? Or are they also; but when from future it becometh present, cometh it forth from some secret place, and when from the present it becometh past, doth it retire into anything secret? For where have they, who have foretold future things, seen these things, if as yet they are not? For that which is not cannot be seen. And they who relate things past could not relate them as true, did they not perceive them in their mind. Which things, if they were not, they could in no wise be discerned. There are therefore things both future and past.

Chap. xviii. Past and future times cannot be thought of bxd as present.

23. Suffer me, O Lord, to seek further; O my Hope, let not my purpose be confounded. For if there are times past and future, I desire to know where they are. But if as yet I do not succeed, I still know, wherever they are, that they are not there as future or past, but as present For if there also they be future, they are not as yet there; if even there they be past, they are no longer there. Wheresoever, therefore they are, whatsoever they are, they are only so as present. Although past things are related as true, they are drawn out from the memory, not the things themselves, which have passed, but the words conceived from the images of the things which they have formed in the mind as footprints in their passage through the senses. My childhood, indeed, which no longer is, is in time past, which now is not; but when I call to mind its image, and speak of it, I behold it in the present, because it is as yet in my memory. Whether there be a like cause of foretelling future things, that of things which as yet are not the images may be perceived as already existing, I confess, my God, I know not. This certainly I know, that we generally think before on our future actions, and that this premeditation is present; but that the action whereon we premeditate is not yet, because it is future; which when we shall have entered upon, and have begun to do that which we were premeditating, then shall that action be, because then it is not future, but present.

CHAP. XVIII] WE THINK OF THINGS AS PRESENT. 305

24. In whatever manner, therefore, this secret preconception of future things may be, nothing can be seen, save what is. But what now is is not future, but present. When, therefore, they say that things future are seen, it is not themselves, which as yet are not (that is, which are future); but their causes or their signs perhaps are seen, the which already are. Therefore, to those already beholding them, they are not future, but present, from which future things conceived in the mind are foretold. Which conceptions again now are, and they who foretell those things behold these conceptions present before them. Let now so multitudinous a variety of things afford me some example. I behold daybreak; I foretell that the sun is about to rise. That which I behold is present; what I foretell is future, not that the sun is future, which already is; but his rising, which is not yet. Yet even its rising I could not predict unless I had an image of it in my mind, as now I have while I speak. But that dawn which I see in the sky is not the rising of the sun, although it may go before it, nor that imagination in my mind; which two are seen as present, that the other which is future may be foretold. Future things, therefore, are not as yet; and if they are not as yet, they are not. And if they are not, they cannot be seen at all; but they can be foretold from things present which now are, and are seen.

CON. U

Chap. xrx. We are ignorant in what manner God teaches future things.

25. Thou, therefore, Ruler of Thy creatures, what is the method by which Thou teachest souls those things which are future? For Thou hast taught Thy prophets. What is that way by which Thou, to whom nothing is future, dost teach future things; or rather of future things dost teach present? For what is not, of a certainty cannot be taught. Too far is this way from my view; it is too mighty for me, I cannot attain unto it but by Thee I shall be enabled, when Thou shalt have granted it, sweet light of my hidden eyes.

Chap. xx. In what manner time may properly be designated.

26. But what now is manifest and clear is, that neither are there future nor past things. Nor is it fitly said, " There are three times, past, present, and future; " but perchance it might be fitly said, " There are three times; a present of things past, a present of things present, and a present of things future." For these three do somehow exist in the soul, and otherwise I see them not: present of things past, memory; present of things present, sight; present of things future, expectation. If of these things we are permitted to speak, I see three times, and I grant there are three. It may also be said, " There are three times, past, present, and future," as usage falsely has it. See, I trouble not, nor gainsay, nor reprove; provided always that which is said may be understood, that neither the future, nor that which is past, now is. For there are but few things which we speak properly, many things improperly; but what we may wish to say is understood,

1 Ps. cxxxix. 6.

CHAP. XXI.] HE ASKS GOD TO TEACH HIM. 307

Chap. xxi. How time may be measured.

27. I have just now said, then, that we measure times as they pass, that we may be able to say that this time is twice as much as that one, or that this is only as much as that, and so of any other of the parts of time which we are able to tell by measuring. Wherefore, as I said, we measure times as they pass. And if any one should ask me, " Whence dost thou know ? " I can answer, " I know, because we measure; nor can we measure things that are not; and things past and future are not." But how do we measure present time, since it hath not space ? It is measured while it passeth; but when it shall have passed, it is not measured; for there will not be aught that can be measured. But whence, in what way, and whither doth it pass while it is being measured ? Whence, but from the future ? Which way, save through the present ? Whither, but into the past ? From that, therefore, which as yet is not, through that which hath no space, into that which now is not. But what do we measure, unless time in some space ? For we say not single, and double, and triple, and equal, or in any other way in which we speak of time, unless with respect to the spaces of times. In what space, then, do we measure passing time ? Is it in the future, whence it passeth over ? But what yet we measure not, is not. Or is it in the present, by which it passeth ? But no space, we do not measure. Or in the past, whither it passeth ? But that which is not now, we measure not.

Chap. xxii. He prays God that He would explain this most entangled enigma.

28. My soul yearns to know this most entangled enigma. Forbear to shut up, O Lord my God, good Father, through Christ I beseech Thee, forbear to shut up these things, both usual and hidden, from my desire, that it may be hindered from penetrating them; but let them dawn through Thy enlightening mercy, O Lord. Of whom shall I inquire concerning these things ? And to whom shall I with more advantage confess my ignorance than to Thee, to whom these my studies, so vehemently kindled towards Thy Scriptures, are not troublesome? Give that which I love; for I do love, and this hast Thou given me. Give, Father, who truly knowest to give good gifts unto Thy children. 1 Give, since I have undertaken to know, and trouble is before me until Thou dost open it. 2 Through Christ, I beseech Thee, in His name, Holy of Holies, let no man interrupt me. For I believed, and therefore do I speak. 3 This is my hope; for this do I live, that I may contemplate the delights of the Lord. 4 Behold, Thou hast made my days old, 5 and they pass away, and in what manner I know not. And we speak as to time and time, times and times, "How long is the time since he said this?" "How long the time since he did this?" and, "How long the time since I saw that?" and, "This syllable hath double the time of that single short syllable." These words we speak, and these we hear; and we are understood, and we understand.

They are most manifest and most usual, and the same things again lie hid too deeply, and the discovery of them is new.

Chap, xxiii. That time is a certain extension.

29. I have heard from a learned man that the motions of the sun, moon, and stars constituted time, and I assented not. 6 For why should not rather the motions of all bodies be time? What if the lights of heaven should cease, and a potter's wheel run round, would there be no time by which we might measure those revolutions, and say either that it turned with equal pauses, or, if it were moved at one time more slowly, at 1 Matt. vii. 11. * Ps. lxxiii. 16. 8 Ps. cxvi. 10.

4 Ps. xxvii. 4. 5 Ps. xxxix. 5.

6 Compare Gillies (Analysis of Aristotle, 2. p. 138): "As our conception of space originates in that of body, and our conception of motion in that of space, so our conception of time originates in that of motion; and particularly in those regular and equable motions carried on in the heavens, the parts of which, from their perfect similarity to each other, are correct measures of the continuous and successive quantity called Time, with which they are conceived to co-exist. Time, therefore, may be defined the perceived number of successive movements; for, as number ascertains the greater or lesser quantity of things numbered, so time ascertains the greater or lesser quantity of motion performed." And with this accords Monboddo's definition of time (Ancient Metaphysics, vol. i. book 4, chap. i.), as "the measure of the duration of things that exist in succession by the motion of the heavenly bodies." See xii. sec. 40, and note, below.
another more quickly, that some revolutions were longer, others less so? Or while we were saying this, should we not also be speaking in time? Or should there in our words be some syllables long, others short, but because those sounded in a longer time, these in a shorter? God grant to men to see in a small thing ideas common to things great and small. Both the stars and luminaries of heaven are "for signs and for seasons, and for days and years." * No doubt they are; but neither should I say that the circuit of that wooden wheel was a day, nor yet should he say that therefore there was no time.

30. I desire to know the power and nature of time, by which we measure the motions of bodies, and say (for example) that this motion is twice as long as that. For, I ask, since "day" declares not the stay only of the sun upon the earth, according to which day is one thing, night another, but also its entire circuit from east even to east, according to which we say, "So many days have passed" (the nights being included when we say "so many days," and their spaces not counted apart), since, then, the day is finished by the motion of the sun, and by his circuit from east to east, I ask, whether the motion itself is the day, or the period in which that motion is completed, or both? For if the first be the day, then would there be a day although the sun should finish that course in so small a space of time as an hour. If the second, then that would not be a day if from one sunrise to another there were but so short a period as an hour, but the sun must go round four-and-twenty times to complete a day.

If both, neither could that be called a day if the sun should run his entire round in the space of an hour; nor that, if, while the sun stood still, so much time should pass as the sun is accustomed to accomplish his whole course in from morning to morning. I shall not therefore now ask, what that is which is called day, but what time is, by which we, measuring the circuit of the sun, should say that it was accomplished in half the space of time it was wont, if it had been completed in so small a space as twelve hours; and comparing both times, we should call that single, this double time, although the sun should run his course from east to east sometimes in that single, sometimes in that double time. Let no man then tell me that the motions of the heavenly bodies are times, because, when at the prayer of one the sun stood still in order that he might achieve his victorious battle, the sun stood still, but time went on. For in such space of time as was sufficient was that battle fought and ended. I see that time, then, is a certain extension. But do I see it, or do I seem to see it? Thou, Light and Truth, wilt show me.

Chap. xxiv. That time is not amotion of a body which we measure by time.

31. Dost Thou command that I should assent, if any one should say that time is "the motion of a body?" Thou dost not command me. For I hear that no body is moved but in time. This Thou sayest; but that the very motion of a body is time, I hear not; Thou sayest it not. For when a body is moved, I by time measure how long it may be moving from the time in which it began to be moved till it left off. And if I saw not whence it began, and it continued to be moved, so that I see not when it leaves off, I cannot measure unless, perchance, from the time I began until I cease to see. But if I look long, I only proclaim that the time is long, but not how long it may be; because when we say, "How long," we speak by comparison, as, "This is as long as that," or, "This is double as long as that," or any other thing of the kind. But if we were able to note down the distances of places whence and whither cometh the body which is moved, or its parts, if it moved as in a wheel, we can say in how much time the motion of the body or its part, from this place unto that, was performed. Since, then, the motion of a body is one thing, that by which we measure how long it is another, who cannot see which of these is rather to be called time? For, although a body be sometimes moved, sometimes stand still, we measure not its motion only, but also its standing still, by time; and we say, "It stood still as much as it moved;" or, "It stood still twice or thrice as long as it moved;" and if any other space which our measuring hath either determined or imagined, more or less, as we are accustomed to say. Time, therefore, is not the motion of a body.

1 Josh. x. 12-14.

CHAP. XXVI.] HE APPEALS TO GOD FOR LIGHT 311

Chap. xxv. He calls on God to enlighten his mind.
32. And I confess unto Thee, Lord, that I am as yet ignorant as to what time is, and again I confess unto Thee, Lord, that I know that I speak these things in time, and that I have already long spoken of time, and that very "long" is not long save by the stay of time. How, then, know I this, when I know not what time is? Or is it, perchance, that I know not in what wise I may express what I know? Alas for me, that I do not at least know the extent of my own ignorance! Behold, my God, before Thee I lie not. As I speak, so is my heart. Thou shalt light my candle; Thou, O Lord my God, wilt enlighten my darkness. 1

Chap. xxvi. We measure longer events by shorter in time.

33. Doth not my soul pour out unto Thee truly in confession that I do measure times? But do I thus measure, my God, and know not what I measure? I measure the motion of a body by time; and the time itself do I not measure? But, in truth, could I measure the motion of a body, how long it is, and how long it is in coming from this place to that, unless I should measure the time in which it is moved? How, therefore, do I measure this very time itself? Or do we by a shorter time measure a longer, as by the space of a cubit the space of a crossbeam? For thus, indeed, we seem by the space of a short syllable to measure the space of a long syllable, and to say that this is double. Thus we measure the spaces of stanzas by the spaces of the verses, and the spaces of the verses by the spaces of the feet, and the spaces of the feet by the spaces of the syllables, and the spaces of long by the spaces of short syllables; not measuring by pages (for in that manner we measure spaces, not times), but when in uttering the words they pass by, and we say, "It is a long stanza, because it is [ ] 1

1 Ps. xviii. 28.

made up of so many verses; long verses, because -they consist of so many feet; long feet, because they are prolonged by so many syllables; a long syllable, because double a short one." But neither thus is any certain measure of time obtained; since it is possible that a shorter verse, if it be pronounced more fully, may take up more time than a longer one, if pronounced more hurriedly. Thus for a stanza, thus for a foot, thus for a syllable. Whence it appeared to me that time is nothing else than protraction; but of what I know not. It is wonderful to me, if it be not of the mind itself. For what do I measure, I beseech Thee, my God, even when I say either indefinitely, "This time is longer than that;" or even definitely, "This is double that"? That I measure time, I know. But I measure not the future, for it is not yet; nor do I measure the present, because it is extended by no space; nor do I measure the past, because it no longer is. What, therefore, do I measure? Is it times passing, not past? For thus had I said.

Chap. xxvii. Times are measured in proportion as they pass by.

34. Persevere, my mind, and give earnest heed. God is our helper; He made us, and not we ourselves. 1 Give heed, where truth dawns. Lo, suppose the voice of a body begins to sound, and does sound, and soundeth on, and lo! it ceases, it is now silence, and that voice is past and is no longer a voice. It was future before it sounded, and could not be measured, because as yet it was not; and now it cannot, because it no longer is. Then, therefore, while it was sounding, it might, because there was then that which might be measured. But even then it did not stand still, for it was going and passing away. Could it, then, on that account be measured the more? For, while passing, it was being extended into some space of time, in which it might be measured, since the present hath no space. If, therefore, then it might be measured, lo! suppose another voice hath begun to sound, and still soundeth, in a continued tenor without any interruption, we can measure it while it is sounding; for when it shall have ceased to sound, it will be already past, and there will not be that which can be measured. Let us measure it truly, and let us say how much it is. But as yet it sounds, nor can it be measured, save from that instant in which it began to sound, even to the end in which it left off. For the interval itself we measure from some beginning unto some end. On which account, a voice which is not yet ended cannot be measured, so that it may be said how long or how short it may be; nor can it be said to be equal to another, or single or double in respect of it, or the like. But when it is ended, it no longer is. In what manner, therefore, may it be measured? And yet we measure times; still not those which as yet are not, nor those which no longer are, nor those which are protracted by some delay, nor those which have no limits. We, therefore, measure neither future times, nor past, nor present, nor those passing by; and yet we do | measure times.

1 Ps. c. 3.

35. Deus Creator omnium; this verse of eight syllables alternates between short and long syllables. The four short, then, the first, third, fifth, and seventh, are single in respect of the four long, the second, fourth, sixth, and eighth. Each of these hath a double time to every one of those. I pronounce them, report on them, and thus it is, as is perceived by common sense. By common sense, then, I measure a long by a short syllable, and I find that it has twice as much. But when one sounds after another, if the former be short, the latter long, how shall I hold the short one, and how measuring shall I apply it to the long, so that I may find out that this has twice as much, when indeed the long does not begin to sound unless the short leaves off sounding? That very long one I measure not as present, since I measure it not save when ended. But its ending is its passing away. What, then, is it that I can measure? Where is the short syllable by which I measure? Where is the long one which I measure? Both have sounded, have flown, have passed away, and are no longer; and still I measure, and I confidently answer (so far as is trusted to a practised sense), that as to space of time this syllable is single, that double. Nor could

314 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [HOOK XI.

I do this, unless because they have past, and are ended.
: Therefore do I not measure themselves, which now are not, but something in my memory, which remains fixed.

36. In thee, my mind, I measure times. 1 Do not overwhelm me with thy clamour. That is, do not overwhelm thyself with the multitude of thy impressions. In thee, I say, I measure times; the impression which things as they pass by make on thee, and which, when they have past by, remains, that I measure as time present, not those things which have passed by, that the impression should be made.

This I measure when I measure times. Either, then, these are times, or I do not measure times. What when we measure silence, and say that this silence hath lasted as long as that voice lasts? Do we not extend our thought to the measure of a voice, as if it sounded, so that we may be able to declare something concerning the intervals of silence in a given space of time? For when both the voice and tongue are still, we go over in thought poems and verses, and any discourse, or dimensions of motions; and declare concerning the spaces of times, how much this may be in respect of that, not otherwise than if uttering them we should pronounce them. Should any one wish to utter a lengthened sound, and had with forethought determined how long it should be, that man hath in silence verily gone through a space of time, and, committing it to memory, he begins to utter that speech, which sounds until it be extended to the end proposed; truly

1 With the argument in this and the previous sections, compare Dr. Reid's remarks in his Intellectual Powers, iii. 5: "We may measure duration by the succession of thoughts in the mind, as we measure length by inches or feet, but the notion or idea of duration must be antecedent to the mensuration of it, as the notion of length is antecedent to its being measured. . . . Reason, from the contemplation of finite extended things, leads us necessarily to the belief of an immensity that contains them. In like manner, memory gives us the conception and belief of finite intervals of duration. From the contemplation of these, reason leads us necessarily to the belief of an eternity, which comprehends all things that have a beginning and an end." The student will with advantage examine a monograph on this subject by C. Fortlage, entitled, Aurelii Augustini doctrina ale tempore ex libro xi. Confessionum de promta, Aristotelicce, Kantianee, aliarumque theoriarum recensione aucta, et congruis hodierixe philosophic ideis amplificata (Heidelbergte, 1836). He sa)’s that amongst all the philosophers none have so nearly approached truth as Augustine.

CHAP. XXVIII.] TIME IN RELATION TO THE MIND. 315

it hath sounded, and will sound. For what of it is already finished hath verily sounded, but what remains will sound; and thus does it pass on, until the present intention carry over the future into the past; the past increasing by the diminution of the future, until, by the consumption of the future, all be past.

Chap, xxviii. Time in the human mind, which expects, considers, and remembers.

37. But how is that future diminished or consumed which as yet is not? Or how doth the past, which is no longer, increase, unless in the mind which enacteth this there are three things done? For it both expects, and considers, and remembers, that that which it expecteth, through that which it considereth, may pass into that which it remembereth. Who, therefore, denieth that future things as yet are not? But yet there is already in the mind the expectation of things future. And who denies that past things are now no longer? But, however, there is still in the mind the memory of things past. And who denies that time present wants space, because it passeth away in a moment? But yet our consideration endureth, through which that which may be present may proceed to become absent. Future time, which is not, is not therefore long; but a "long future" is "a long expectation of the future." Nor is time past, which is now no longer, long; but a long past is "a long memory of the past."

38. I am about to repeat a psalm that I know. Before I begin, my attention is extended to the whole; but when I have begun, as much of it as becomes past by my saying it is extended in my memory; and the life of this action of mine is divided between my memory, on account of what I have repeated, and my expectation, on account of what I am about to repeat; yet my consideration is present with me, through which that which was future may be carried over so that it may become past. Which the more it is done and repeated, by so much (expectation being shortened) the memory is enlarged, until the whole expectation be exhausted, when that whole action being ended shall have passed into memory. And what takes place in the entire psalm, takes place also in each individual part of it, and in each individual syllable this holds in the longer action, of which that psalm is per chance a portion; the same holds in the whole life of man, o which all the actions of man are parts; the same holds in th whole age of the sons of men, of which all the lives of mei are parts.

everlasting. But I have been divided amid times, the order of which I know not; and my thoughts, even the inmost bowels of my soul, are mangled with tumultuous varieties, until I flow together unto Thee, purged and molten in the fire of Thy love. 1

Chap. XXX. Again he refutes the empty question, "What did God be/ore the creation of the world?"

40. And I will be immoveable, and fixed in Thee, in my mould, Thy truth; nor will I endure the questions of men, who by a penal disease thirst for more than they can hold, and say, "What did God make before He made heaven and earth?" Or, "How came it into His mind to make anything, when He never before made anything?" Grant to them, O Lord, to think well what they say, and to see that where there is no time, they cannot say "never." What, therefore, He is said "never to have made," what else is it but to say, that in no time was it made? Let them therefore see that there could be no time without a created being. 2 and let them cease to speak that vanity. Let them also be extended unto those things which are before, 3 and understand that Thou, the eternal Creator of all times, art before all times, and that no times are co-eternal with Thee, nor any creature, even if there be any creature beyond all times.

Chap. xxxi. How the knowledge of God differs from that of man.

41. Lord my God, what is that secret place of Thy mystery, and how far thence have the consequences of my transgressions cast me? Heal my eyes, that I may enjoy Thy light. Surely, if there be a mind, so greatly abounding in knowledge and foreknowledge, to which all things past and future are so known as one psalm is well known to me, that mind is exceedingly wonderful, and very astonishing; because whatever is so past, and whatever is to come of after ages, is no more concealed from Him than was it hidden from me when singing that psalm, what and how much of it had been sung from the beginning, what and how much remained unto the end. But far be it that Thou, the Creator of the universe, the Creator of souls and bodies, far be it that Thou shouldst know all things future and past. Far, far more wonderfully, and far more mysteriously, Thou knowest them. 1 For it is not as the feelings of one singing known things, or hearing a known song, are through expectation of future words, and in remembrance of those that are past varied, and his senses divided, that anything happeneth unto Thee, unchangeably eternal, that is, the truly eternal 2 Creator of minds. As, then, Thou in the Beginning knewest the heaven and the earth without any change of Thy knowledge, so in the Beginning didst Thou make heaven and earth without any distraction of Thy action* Let him who understandeth confess unto Thee; and let him who understandeth not, confess unto Thee. Oh, how exalted art Thou, and yet the humble in heart are Thy dwelling-place; for Thou raisest up those that are bowed down, 4 and they whose exaltation Thou art fell not.

1 Dean Mansel's argument, in his Bampton Lectures, as to our knowledge of the Infinite, is well worthy of consideration. He refers to Augustine's views on the subject of this book in note 13 to his third lecture, and in the text itself says: "The limited character of all existence which can be conceived as having a continuous duration, or as made up of successive moments, is so far manifest, that it has been assumed almost as an axiom, by philosophical theologians, that in the existence of God there is no distinction between past, present, and future. 'In the changes of things,' says Augustine, 'there is a past and a future; in God there is a present, in which neither past nor future can be.' 'Eternity,' says Boethius, 'is the perfect possession of interminable life, and of all that life at once; ' and Aquinas, accepting the definition, adds, 'Eternity has no succession, but exists all together.' But whether this assertion be literally true or not (and this we have no means of ascertaining), it is clear that such a mode of existence is altogether inconceivable by us, and that the words in which it is described represent not thought, but the refusal to think at all." See notes to xiii. 12, below.

2 "With God, indeed, all things are arranged and fixed; and when He seemeth to act upon sudden motive, He doth nothing but what He foreknew that He should do from eternity " (Aug. in Ps. cvi. 35). With this passage may well be compared Dean Mansel's remarks (Bampton Lectures, lect. vi., and notes 23-25) on the doctrine, that the world is but a machine and is not under the continual government and direction of God. See also notes on pp. 83 and 223, above.

HE CONTINUES HIS EXPLANATION OF THE FIRST CHAPTER OF GENESIS ACCORDING TO THE SEPTUAGINT, AND BY ITS ASSISTANCE HE ARGUES, ESPECIALLY, CONCERNING THE DOUBLE HEAVEN, AND THE FORMLESS MATTER OUT OF WHICH THE WHOLE WORLD MAY HAVE BEEN CREATED; AFTERWARDS OF THE INTERPRETATIONS OF OTHERS NOT DISALLOWED, AND SETS FORTH AT GREAT LENGTH THE SENSE OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURE.

Chap. I. The discovery of truth is difficult, but God has promised that he who seeks shall find.

1. TV/THY heart, Lord, affected by the words of Thy Holy Scripture, is much busied in this poverty of my life; and therefore, for the most part, is the want of human intelligence copious in language, because inquiry speaks more than discovery, and because demanding is longer than obtaining, and the hand that knocks is more active than the hand that receives. We hold the promise; who shall break it? "If God be for us, who can be against us?" 1 "Ask, and ye shall have; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: for everyone that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." 2 These are Thine own promises; and who need fear to be deceived where the Truth promiseth?

Chap. n. Of the double heaven, the visible, and the heaven of heavens.

2. The weakness of my tongue confesseth unto Thy Highness, seeing that Thou madest heaven and earth. This heaven which I see, and this earth upon which I tread (from which is this earth that I carry about me), Thou hast made. But where is that heaven of heavens, Lord, of which we hear in the words of the Psalm, The heaven of heavens are the Lord's but the earth hath He given to the children of men? 1 Where is the heaven, which we behold not, in comparison of which all this, which we behold, is earth? For this corporeal whole not as a whole everywhere, hath thus received its beautiful figure in these lower parts, of which the bottom is our earth but compared with that heaven of heavens, even the heaven of our earth is but earth; yea, each of these great bodies is not absurdly called earth, as compared with that, I know not what manner of heaven, which is the Lord's, not the sons' of men.

Chap. hi. OfFJie darkness upon the deep, and of the invisible and formless earth.

3. And truly this earth was invisible and formless, 2 and there was I know not what profundity of the deep upon which there was no light, 3 because it had no form. Therefore didst Thou command that it should be written, that darkness was upon the face of the deep; what else was it than the absence of light? 4 For had there been light, where should it have been save by being above all, showing itself aloft, and enlightening? Where, therefore, light was as yet not, why was it that darkness was present, unless because light was absent? Darkness therefore was upon it, because the light above was absent; as silence is there present where sound is not. And what is it to have silence there, but not to have sound there? Hast not Thou, Lord, taught this soul which confesseth unto Thee? Hast not Thou taught me, O Lord, that before Thou didst form and separate this formless matter,

"firmament of heaven" (Gen. i. 17) in which the stars have their courses; nor both these together; but that "third heaven" to which Paul was "caught up" (2 Cor. xii. 1) in his rapture, and where God most manifests His glory, and the angels do Him homage.

CHAP. VI.] HIS OLD NOTIONS AS TO MATTER. 321

there was nothing, neither colour, nor figure, nor body, nor spirit? Yet not altogether nothing; there was a certain formlessness without any shape.

Chap. iv. From the formlessness of matter, the beautiful world has arisen.

4. What, then, should it be called, that even in some ways it might be conveyed to those of duller mind, save by some conventional word? But what, in all parts of the world, can be found nearer to a total formlessness than the earth and the deep? For, from their being of the lowest position, they are less beautiful than are the other higher parts, all transparent and shining. Why, therefore, may I not consider the formlessness of matter which Thou hadst created without shape, whereof to make this shapely world to be fittingly intimated unto men by the name of earth invisible and formless?

Chap. v. What may have been the form of matter.

5. So that when herein thought seeketh what the sense may arrive at, and saith to itself, "It is no intelligible form, such as life or justice, because it is the matter of bodies; nor perceptible by the senses, because in the invisible and formless there is nothing which can be seen and felt; while human thought saith these things to itself, it may endeavour either to know it by being ignorant, or by knowing it to be ignorant.

Chap. v. He confesses that at one time he himself thought erroneously of matter.

6. But were I, O Lord, by my mouth and by my pen to confess unto Thee the whole, whatever Thou hast taught me concerning that matter, the name of which hearing beforehand, and not understanding (they who could not understand it telling me of it), I conceived it as having innumerable and varied forms. And therefore did I not conceive it; my mind revolved in disturbed order foul and horrible "forms," but yet "forms;" and I called it formless, not that it lacked form, but because it had such as, did it appear, my mind would turn from, as unwonted and incongruous, and at which human weakness would be disturbed. But even that which I did conceive was formless, not by the privation of all form, but in comparison of more beautiful forms; and true reason persuaded me that I ought altogether to remove from it all remnants of any form whatever, if I wished to conceive matter wholly without form; and I could not. For sooner could I imagine that that which should be deprived of all form was not at all, than conceive anything between form and nothing, neither formed, nor nothing, formless, nearly nothing. And my mind hence ceased to question my spirit, filled (as it was) with the images of formed bodies, and changing and varying them according to its will; and I applied myself to the bodies themselves, and looked more deeply into their mutability, by which they cease to be what they had been, and begin to be what they were not; and this same transit from form unto form I have looked upon to be through some formless condition, not through a very nothing; but I desired to know, not to guess. And if my voice and my pen should confess the whole unto Thee, whatsoever Thou hast untied for me concerning this question, who of my readers would endure to take in the whole? Nor yet, therefore, shall my heart cease to give Thee honour, and a song of praise, for those things which it is not able to express. For the mutability of mutable things is itself capable of all those forms into which mutable things are changed. And this mutability, what is it? Is it soul? Is it body? Is it the outer appearance of soul or body? Could it be said, "Nothing were something," and "That which is, is not," I would say that this were it; and yet in some manner was it already, since it could receive these visible and compound shapes.

1 See iii. sec. 11, and p. 142, note, above.

Chap. vii. Out of nothing God made heaven and earth.

7. And whence and in what manner was this, unless from Thee, from whom are all things, in so far as they are? But by how much the farther from Thee, so much the more unlike unto Thee; for it is not distance of place. Thou, therefore, Lord, who art not one thing in one place, and otherwise in another, but the Self-same, and the Self-same, and the Selfsame, I Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty, didst in the beginning, 2 which is of Thee, in Thy Wisdom, which was born of Thy Substance, create something, and that out of nothing. 3 For Thou didst create heaven and earth, not out of Thyself, for then they would be equal to Thine Onlybegotten, and thereby even to Thee; 4 and in no wise would it be right that anything should be equal to Thee which was not of Thee. And aught else except Thee there was not whence Thou mightest create these things, God, One Trinity, and Trine Unity; and, therefore, out of nothing didst Thou create heaven and earth, a great thing and a small, because Thou art Almighty and Good, to make all things good, even the great heaven and the small earth. Thou wast, and there was nought else from which Thou didst create heaven and earth; two such things, one near unto Thee, the other near to nothing, 5 one to which Thou shouldest be superior, the other to which nothing should be inferior.

CHAP. VIII.] THE WORLD CREATED OUT OF NOTHING. 323

Chap. viii. Heaven and earth were made " in the beginning;" afterwards the ivorld, during six days, from shapeless matter.

8. But that heaven of heavens was for Thee, Lord; but the earth, which Thou hast given to the sons of men, G to be seen and touched, was not such as now we see and touch. For it was invisible and " without form," 7 and there was a deep over which there was not light; or, darkness was over the deep, that is, more than in the deep. For this deep of waters, now visible, has, even in its depths, a light suitable to its nature, perceptible in some manner unto fishes and creeping things in the bottom of it. But the entire deep was almost nothing, since hitherto it was altogether formless; yet there was then that which could be formed. For Thou, O Lord, hast made the world of a formless matter, which matter, out of nothing, Thou hast made almost nothing, out of which to make those great things which we, sons of men, wonder at.

For very wonderful is this corporeal heaven, of which firmament, between water and water, the second day after the creation of light, Thou saidst, Let it be made, and it was made. 1 Which firmament Thou calledst heaven, that is, the heaven of this earth and sea, which Thou madest on the third day, by giving a visible shape to the formless matter which Thou madest before all days. For even already hadst Thou made a heaven before all days, but that was the heaven of this heaven; because in the beginning Thou hadst made heaven and earth. But the earth itself which Thou hadst made was formless matter, because it was invisible and without form, and darkness was upon the deep. Of which invisible and formless earth, of which formlessness, of which almost nothing, Thou mightest make all these things of which this changeable world consists, and yet consisteth not; whose very changeableness appears in this, that times can be observed and numbered in it. Because times are made by the changes of things, while the shapes, whose matter is the invisible earth aforesaid, are varied and turned.

Chap. ix. That the heaven of heavens was an intellectual creature, but that the earth was invisible and formless before the days that it was made.

9. And therefore the Spirit, the Teacher of Thy servant, 2 when He relates that Thou didst in the Beginning create heaven and earth, is silent as to times, silent as to days. For, doubtless, that heaven of heavens, which Thou in the Beginning didst create, is some intellectual creature, which, although in no wise co-eternal unto Thee, the Trinity, is yet a partaker of Thy eternity, and by reason of the sweetness of that most happy contemplation of Thyself, doth greatly restrain its own mutability, and without any failure, from the time in which it was created, in clinging unto Thee, surpasses all the rolling change of times. But this shapelessness this earth invisible and without form has not itself been numbered among the days. For where there is no shape nor order, nothing either cometh or goeth; and where this is not, there certainly are no days, nor any vicissitude of spaces of times.

CHAP. XL] THE DEEP THINGS OF GOD. 325

Chap. X. He begs of God that he may live in the true light, and may be instructed as to the mysteries of the sacred books.

10. Oh, let Truth, the light of my heart, not my own darkness, speak unto me! I have descended to that, and am darkened. But thence, even thence, did I love Thee. I went astray, and remembered Thee. I heard Thy voice behind me bidding me return, and scarcely did I hear it for the tumults of the unquiet ones. And now, behold, I return burning and panting after Thy fountain. Let no one prohibit me; of this will I drink, and so have life. Let me not be my own life; from myself have I badly lived, death was I unto myself; in Thee do I revive. Do Thou speak unto me; do Thou discourse unto me. In Thy books have I believed, and their words are very deep. 2

Chap. XI. What may be discovered to him by God.

11. Already hast Thou told me, O Lord, with a strong voice, in my inner ear, that Thou art eternal, having alone immortality. 3 Since Thou art not changed by any shape or motion, nor is Thy will altered by times, because no will which changes is immortal. This in Thy sight is clear to me, and let it become more and more clear, I beseech Thee; and in that manifestation let me abide more soberly under Thy wings. Likewise hast Thou said to me, Lord, with a strong voice, in my inner ear, that Thou hast made all natures and substances, which are not what Thou Thyself art, and yet they are; and that only is not from Thee which is not, and the motion of the will from Thee who art, to that which in a less degree is, because such motion is guilt and sin; 4 and that no

2 As Gregory the Great has it, Revelation is a river broad and deep, " In quo et agnus ambulet, et elephas natet." And these deep things of God are to be learned only by patient searching. We must, says St. Chrysostom (De Prec. serm. ii.), dive down into the sea as those who would fetch up pearls from its depths. The very mysteriousness of Scripture is, doubtless, intended by God to stimulate us to search the Scriptures, and to strengthen our spiritual insight.

one's sin doth either hurt Thee, or disturb the order of Thy rule, 1 either first or last. This, in Thy sight, is clear to me, and let it become more and more clear, I beseech Thee; and in that manifestation let me abide more soberly under Thy wings.

1 2. Likewise hast Thou said to me, with a strong voice, in my inner ear, that that creature, whose will Thou alone art, is not co-eternal unto Thee, and which, with a most persevering purity 2 drawing its support from Thee, doth, in no place and

^> at no time, put forth its own mutability; 3 and Thyself being ever present with it, unto Whom with its entire affection it holds itself, having no future to expect nor conveying into the past what it remembereth, is varied by no change, nor extended into any times. 4 blessed one, if any such there be, in clinging unto Thy Blessedness; blest in Thee, its everlasting Inhabitant and its Enlightener! Nor do I find what the heaven of heavens, which is the Lord's, can be better called than Thine house, which contemplateth Thy delight without any defection of going forth to another; a pure mind, most peacefully one, by that stability of peace of holy spirits, 5 the citizens of Thy city " in the heavenly places," above these heavenly places which are seen. 6

13. Whence the soul, whose wandering has been made far away, may understand, if now she thirsts for Thee, if now her tears have become bread to her, while it is daily said unto her
"Where is thy God ?" 7 if she now seeketh of Thee one thing, and desire th that she may dwell in Thy house all the days of her life. 8 And what is her life but Thee? And what are Thy days but Thy eternity, as Thy years which fail not, because Thou art the same?

Hence, therefore, can the soul, which is able, understand how far beyond all times Thou art eternal; when Thy house, which has not wandered from Thee, although it be not co-eternal with Thee, yet by continually and unfailingly clinging unto Thee, suffers no vicissitude of times. This in Thy sight is clear unto me, and may it become more and more clear unto me, I beseech Thee; and in this manifestation may I abide more soberly under Thy wings.

14. Behold, I know not what shapelessness there is in those changes of these last and lowest creatures. And who shall tell me, unless it be some one who, through the emptiness of his own heart, wanders and is staggered by his own fancies? Who, unless such a one, would tell me that (all figure being diminished and consumed), if the formlessness only remain, through which the thing was changed and was turned from one figure into another, that that can exhibit the changes of times? For surely it could not be, because without the change of motions times are not, and there is no change where there is no figure.

15. Which things considered as much as Thou givest, my God, as much as Thou excitest me to "knock," and as much as Thou openest unto me when I knock, 1 two things I find which Thou hast made, not within the compass of time, since neither is co-eternal with Thee. One, which is so formed that, without any failing of contemplation, without any interval of change, although changeable, yet not changed, it may fully enjoy Thy eternity and unchangeableness; the other, which was so formless, that it had not that by which it could be changed from one form into another, either of motion or of repose, whereby it might be subject unto time. But this Thou didst not leave to be formless, since before all days, in the beginning Thou createdst heaven and earth, these two things of which I spoke. But the earth was invisible and without form, and darkness was upon the deep. 2 By which words its shapelessness is conveyed unto us, that by degrees those minds may be drawn on which cannot wholly conceive the privation of all form without coming to nothing, whence another heaven might be created, and another earth visible and well-formed, and water beautifully ordered, and whatever besides is, in the formation of this world, recorded to have been, not without days, created; because such things are so that in them the vicissitudes of times may take place, on account of the appointed changes of motions and of forms. 1

Chap. xiii. Of the intellectual heaven and formless earth, out of which, on another day, the firmament was formed.

16. Meanwhile I conceive this, my God, when I hear Thy Scripture speak, saying, In the beginning God made heaven and earth; but the earth was invisible and without form, and darkness was upon the deep, and not stating on what day Thou didst create these things. Thus, meanwhile, do I conceive, that it is on account of that heaven of heavens, that intellectual heaven, where to understand is to know all at once, not "in part," not "darkly," not "through a glass," 2 but as a whole, in manifestation, "face to face." not this thing now, that anon, but (as has been said) to know at once without any change of times; and on account of the invisible and formless earth, without any change of times; which change is wont to have "this thing now, that anon," because, where there is no form there can be no distinction between "this" or "that;" it is, then, on account of these two, a primitively formed, and a wholly formless; the one heaven, but the heaven of heavens, the other earth, but the earth invisible and formless; on account of these two do I meanwhile conceive that Thy Scripture said without mention of days, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." For immediately it added of what earth it spake. And when on the second day the firmament is recorded to have been created, and called heaven, it suggests to us of which heaven He spake before without mention of days.

Chap. xiv. Of the depth of the Sacred Scripture, and its enemies.

17. Wonderful is the depth of Thy oracles, whose surface is before us, inviting the little ones; and yet wonderful is the depth, my God, wonderful is the depth. 3 It is awe to look into it; an awe of honour, and a tremor of love. The enemies thereof I hate vehemently. 1 Oh, if Thou wouldest slay them with Thy two-edged sword, 2 that they be not its enemies!

For thus do I love, that they should be slain unto themselves that they may live unto Thee. But behold others not reprovers, but praisers of the book of Genesis, "The Spirit of God," say they, "Who by His servant Moses wrote these things, willed not that these words should be thus understood. He willed not that it should be understood as Thou sayest, but as we say." Unto whom, God of us all, Thyself being Judge, do I thus answer.

Chap. xv. He argues against adversaries concerning the heaven of heavens.

18. "Will you say that these things are false, which, with a strong voice, Truth tells me in my inner ear, concerning the very eternity of the Creator, that His substance is in no wise changed by time, nor that His will is separate from His substance? Wherefore, He willeth not one thing now, another anon, but once and for ever He willeth all things that He willeth; not again and again, nor now this, now that; nor willeth afterwards what He willeth not before, nor willeth not what before He willed. Because such a will is mutable, and no mutable thing is eternal; but our God is eternal. 3 Likewise He tells me, tells me in my inner ear, that the expectation of future things is turned to sight when they have come; and this same sight is turned to memory when they have passed. Moreover, all thought which is thus varied is mutable, and nothing mutable is eternal; but our God is eternal." These things I sum up and put together, and I find that my God, the eternal God, hath not made any creature by any new will, nor that His knowledge suffereth anything transitory.

19. What, therefore, will ye say, ye objectors? Are these things false? "No," they say. "What is this? Is it false?

then, that every nature already formed, or matter formable, is only from Illim who is supremely good, because He is supreme?"
"Neither do we deny this," say they. "What then? do you deny this, that there is a certain sublime creature, clinging with a chaste love with the true and truly eternal God, that although it is not co-eternal with Him, yet it separateth itself not from Him, nor itoweth into any variety and vicissitude of times, but resteth in the truest contemplation of Him only?" Since Thou, o God, showest Thyself unto him, and sufficest him, who loveth Thee as much as Thou commandest, and, therefore, he declineth not from Thee, nor toward himself. I This is the house of God, not earthly, nor of any celestial bulk corporeal, but a spiritual house and a partaker of Thy eternity, because without blemish for ever, for Thou hast made it last for ever and ever; Thou hast given it a law, which it shall not pass. Nor yet is it co-eternal with Thee, O God, because not without beginning, for it was made.

20. For although we find no time before it, for wisdom was created before all things, not certainly that Wisdom manifestly co-eternal and equal unto Thee, our God, His Father, and by Whom all things were created, and in Whom, as the Beginning, Thou createdst heaven and earth; but truly that wisdom which has been created, namely, the intellectual nature, which, in the contemplation of light, is light. For this, although created, is also called wisdom. But as great as is the difference between the Light which enlighteneth and that which is enlightened, so great is the difference between the Wisdom that

1 In his De Vera Rehg, c. 18, he says: "We must confess that the angels are in their nature mutable as God is Immutable. Yet by that will with which they love God more Hum themselves, they remain linn and stable ill Him, and enjoy His majesty, being most willingly subject to Him alone."

21. Hence comes it so to be of Thee, our God, as to be manifestly another than Thou, and not the Self-same/ Since, although we hud time not only not before it, but not in it (it being proper ever to behold Thy face, nor is ever turned aside from it, wherefore it happens that it is varied by no change), yet is there in it that mutability itself whence it would become dark and cold, but that, clinging unto Thee with sublime love, it shineh and gloweth from Thee like a perpetual noon. Holy Ghost? Is not this house of God, not indeed co-eternal with God, yet, according to its measure, eternal in the heavens, 1 where in vain you seek for changes of times, because you will not find them? For that surpasseth all extension, and every revolving space of time, to which it is ever good to cleave fast to God." 2 "It is," say they. "What, therefore, of those things which my heart cried out unto my God, when within it heard the voice of His praise, what then do you contend is false? Or is it because the matter was formless, wherein, as there was no form, there was no order? But where there was no order there could not be any change of times; and yet this 'almost nothing,' inasmuch as it was not altogether nothing, was verily from Him, from Whom is whatever is, in what state soever anything is." 3 "This also," say they, "we do not deny."

Chap. XVI. He wishes to have no intercourse with those who deny Divine Truth.

23. With such as grant that all these things which Thy truth indicates to my mind are true, I desire to confer a little before Thee, my God. For let those who deny these things bark and drown their own voices with their clamour as much as they please; I will endeavour to persuade them to be quiet, and to suffer Thy word to reach them. But should they be unwilling, and should they repel me, I beseech, O my God, that Thou "be not silent to me." 3 Do Thou speak truly in my heart, for Thou only so speakest, and I will send them away blowing upon the dust from without, and raising it up into their own eyes; and I will myself enter into my chamber, 4 and sing there unto Thee songs of love, groaning with groanings unutterable 5 in my pilgrimage, and remembering Jerusalem, with heart raised up towards it 6

As Daniel in his captivity daily opened his window towards Jerusalem, though far out of sight, when he went to God in Jerusalem my country, Jerusalem my mother, and Thyself, the Euler over it, the Enlightener, the Father, the Guardian, the Husband, the chaste and strong delight, the solid joy, and all good things ineffable, even all at the same time, because the one supreme and true Good. And I will not be turned away until Thou collect all that I am, from this dispersion * and deformity, into the peace of that very dear mother, where are the first-fruits of my spirit, 2 whence these things are assured to me, and Thou conform and confirm it for ever, my God, my Mercy. But with reference to those who say not that all these things which are true are false, who honour Thy Holy Scripture set forth by holy Moses, placing it, as with us, on the summit of an authority 3 to be followed, and yet who contradict us in some particulars, I thus speak:

Be Thou, O our God, judge between my confessions and their contradictions.

Chap. xvii. He mentions five explanations of the words of Genesis i. 1.

24. For they say, "Although these things be true, yet Moses regarded not those two things, when by divine revelation he said, ' In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.' 4 Under the name of heaven he did not indicate that spiritual or intellectual creature which always beholds the face of God; nor under the name of earth, that shapeless matter." " What then ? " " That man," say they, " meant as we say; this it is that he declared by those words." " What is that ? " " By the name of heaven and earth," say they, " did he first wish to set forth, universally and briefly, all this his devotions, so may the believing soul, in this captivity of the flesh, look towards ' Jeru salen which is above ' (Gal. iv. 26). And as Paul was to the Colossians (ii. 5), so may the believer be with the glorified spirits, ' though absent in the flesh,' yet with them ' in the spirit, 'joying and beholding their heavenly ' order. ' And as the lark sweetly sings while she soars on high, but is suddenly silenced when she falls to the earth, so is the frame of the soul most delightful and divine while it keeps in the views of God by contemplation. Alas, we make there too short a stay, fall down again, and lay by our music ! " (Fawcett's Ed. p. 327.)

visible world, that afterwards by the enumeration of the "days he might distribute, as if in detail, all those things which it pleased the Holy Spirit thus to reveal. For such men were that rude and carnal people to which he spoke, that he judged it prudent that only those works of God as were visible should be entrusted to them." They agree, however, that the earth invisible and formless, and the darksome deep (out of which it is subsequently pointed out that all these visible things, which are known to all, were made and set in order during those " days"), may not unsuitably be understood of this formless matter.
25. What, now, if another should say "That this same formlessness and confusion of matter was first introduced under the name of heaven and earth, because out of it this visible world, with all those natures which most manifestly appear in it, and which is wont to be called by the name of heaven and earth, was created and perfected " ? But what if another should say, that " That invisible and visible nature is not inaptly called heaven and earth; and that consequently the universal creation, which God in His wisdom hath made, that is, ' in the beginning,' was comprehended under these two words. Yet, since all things have been made, not of the substance of God, but out of nothing 1 (because they are not that same thing that God is, and there is in them all a certain mutability, whether they remain, as doth the eternal house of God, or be changed, as are the soul and body of man), therefore, that the common matter of all things invisible and visible, as yet shapeless, but still capable of form, out of which was to be created heaven and earth (that is, the invisible and visible creature already formed), was spoken of by the same names by which the earth invisible and formless and the darkness upon the deep would be called; with this difference, however, that the earth invisible and formless is understood as corporeal matter, before it had any manner of form, but the darkness upon the deep as spiritual matter, before it was restrained at all of its unlimited fluidity, and before the enlightening of wisdom."

CHAP. XVIII.] THE Koyal LAW. 335

26. Should any man wish, he may still say, "That the already perfected and formed natures, invisible and visible, are not signified under the name of heaven and earth when it is read, ' In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth; ' but that the yet same formless beginning of things, the matter capable of being formed and made, was called by these names, because contained in it there were these confused things not as yet distinguished by their qualities and forms, the which now being digested in their own orders, are called heaven and earth, the former being the spiritual, the latter the corporeal creature."

Chap, xviii. What error is harmless in Sacred Scripture.

27. All which things having been heard and considered, I am unwilling to contend about words, 1 for that is profitable to nothing but to the subverting of the hearers. 2 But the law is good to edify, if a man use it lawfully; 3 for the end of it " is charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned." 4 And well did our Master know, upon which two commandments He hung all the Law and the Prophets. 5 And what doth it hinder me, O my God, Thou light of my eyes in secret, while ardently confessing these things, since by these words many things may be understood, all of which are yet true, what, I say, doth it hinder me, should I think otherwise of what the writer thought than some other man thinketh? Indeed, all of us who read endeavour to 1 Tim. i. 8. 4 Ibid. ver. 5.

5 Matt. xxii. 40. For he says in his Con. Faust, xvii. 6, remarking on John i. 17, a text which he often quotes in this connection: "The law itself by being fulfilled becomes grace and truth. Grace is the fulfilment of love." And so in ibid. xix. 27 we read: 'From the words, 'I came not to destroy the law but to fulfil it,' we are not to understand that Christ by His precepts filled up what was wanting in the law; but what the literal command failed in doing from the pride and disobedience of men is accomplished by grace. ... So, the apostle says, 'faith worketh by love.' So, again, we read in Serm. cxxv.: "Quiaveuit dare caritatem, et caritas perficit legem; merito dixit non veni legem solvere sed implere." And hence in his letter to Jerome (Ep. clxvii. 19), he speaks of the "royal law" as being "the law of liberty, which is the law of love." See p 348, note 4, above.

trace out and to understand that which he whom we read wished to convey; and as we believe him to speak truly, we dare not suppose that he has spoken anything which we either know or suppose to be false. Since, therefore, each person endeavours to understand in the Holy Scriptures that which the writer understood, what hurt is it if a man understand what Thou, the light of all true-speaking minds, dost show him to be true although he whom he reads understood not this, seeing that he also understood a Truth, not, however, this Truth?

Chap. xix. He enumerates the things concerning which all agree.

28. For it is true, Lord, that Thou hast made heaven and earth; it is also true, that the Beginning is Thy "Wisdom, in Which Thou hast made all things. 1 It is likewise true, that this visible world hath its own great parts, the heaven and the earth, which in a short compass comprehends all made and created natures. It is also true, that everything mutable sets before our minds a certain want of form, whereof it taketh a form, or is changed and turned. It is true, that that is subject to no times which so cleaveth to the changeless form as that, though it be mutable, it is not changed. It is true, that the formlessness, which is almost nothing, cannot have changes of times. It is true, that that of which anything is made may by a certain mode of speech be called by the name of that thing which is made of it; whence that formlessness of which heaven and earth were made might be called "heaven and earth." It is true, that of all things having form, nothing is nearer to the formless than the earth and the deep. It is true, that not only every created and formed thing, but also whatever is capable of creation and of form, Thou hast made, "by whom are all things." 2 It is true, that everything that is formed from that which is formless was formless before it was formed.

29. From all these truths, of which they doubt not whose inner eye Thou hast granted to see such things, and who immovably believe Moses, Thy servant, to have spoken in the spirit of truth; from all these, then, he taketh one who saith, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," that is, "In His Word, co-eternal with Himself, God made the intelligible and the sensible, or the spiritual and corporeal creature."

He taketh another, who saith, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," that is, "In His Word, co-eternal with Himself, God made the universal mass of this corporeal world, with all those manifest and known natures which it containeth." He, another, who saith, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," that is, "In His Word, co-eternal with Himself, God made the formless matter of the spiritual 1 and corporeal creature." He, another, who saith, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," that is, "In His Word, co-eternal with Himself, God made the formless matter of the corporeal creature, wherein heaven and earth lay as yet confused, which being now distinguished and formed, we, at this day, see in the mass of this world." He, another, who saith, "In the beginning God created heaven and earth," that is, "In the very beginning of creating and working, God made that formless matter confusedly containing heaven and

1 Augustine, in his letter to Jerome (Ep. clxvi. 4) on "The origin of the human soul," says: "The soul, whether it be termed material or immaterial, has a certain nature of its own, created from a substance superior to the elements of this world." And in his De Oen. ad Lit. vii. 10, he speaks of the soul being formed from a certain "spiritual matter," even as flesh was formed from the earth. It should be observed that at one time Augustine held to the theory that the souls of infants were created by God out of nothing at each fresh birth, and only rejected this view for that of its being generated by the parents with the body Under the pressure of the Pelagian controversy. The first doctrine was generally held by the Schoolmen; and William of Conches maintained this belief on the authority of Augustine, apparently being unaware of any modification in his opinion: "Cum Augustino," he says (Victor Cousin, Ouvrages ined. d'Abelard, p. 673), "credo et sentio quotidié novas animas non ex traduce, non ex aliqua substantia, sed ex nihilo, solo jussu creatoris creari." Those who held the first-named belief were called Creatiani; those who held the second, Traduciani. It may be noted as to the word "Traduciani," that Tertullian, in his De Anima, chaps. 24-27, etc., frequently uses the word tradux in this connection.

Augustine, in his Retractations, ii. 45, refers to his letter to Jerome, and urges that if so obscure a matter is to be discussed at all, that solution only should be received: "Quae contraria non sit apertissimis rebus quas de originali peccato fides catholica novit in parvulis, nisi regenerentur in Christo, sine dubitatione damnandis." On Tertullian's views, see Bishop Kaye, p. 178, etc.

earth, out of which, being formed, they now stand out, and are manifest, with all the things that are in them."

Chap. xxi. Of the explanation of the words, "The earth vjas invisible."

30. And as concerns the understanding of the following words, out of all those truths he selected one to himself, who saith, "But the earth was invisible and without form, and darkness was upon the deep," that is, "That corporeal thing, which God made, was as yet the formless matter of corporeal things, without order, without light." He taketh another, who saith, "But the earth was invisible and without form, and darkness was upon the deep," that is, "This whole, which is called heaven and earth, was as yet formless and darksome matter, out of which the corporeal heaven and the corporeal earth were to be made, with all things therein which are known to our corporeal senses." He, another, who saith, "But the earth was invisible and without form, and darkness was upon the deep," that is, "This whole, which is called heaven and earth, was as yet a formless and darksome matter, out of which were to be made that intelligible heaven, which is otherwise called the heaven of heavens, and the earth, namely, the whole corporeal nature, under which name may also be comprised this corporeal heaven, that is, from which every invisible and visible creature would be created." He, another, who saith, "But the earth was invisible and without form, and darkness was upon the deep," "The Scripture called not that formlessness by the name of heaven and earth, but that formlessness itself," saith he, "already was, which he named the earth invisible and formless and the darksome deep, of which he had said before, that God had made the heaven and the earth, namely, the spiritual and corporeal creature." He, another, who saith, "But the earth was invisible and formless, and darkness was upon the deep," that is, "There was already a formless matter, whereof the Scripture before said, that God had made heaven and earth, namely, the entire corporeal mass of the world, divided into two very great parts, the superior and the inferior, with all those familiar and known creatures which are in them."
Chap. xxii. He discusses whether matter was from eternity, or was made by God. 1

31. For, should any one endeavour to contend against these last two opinions, thus, "If you will not admit that this formlessness of matter appears to be called by the name of heaven and earth, then there was something which God had not made out of which He could make heaven and earth; for Scripture hath not told us that God made this matter, unless we understand it to be implied in the term of heaven and earth, or of earth only, when it is said, 'In the beginning God created heaven and earth,' as that which follows, but the earth was invisible and formless, although it was pleasing to him so to call the formless matter, we may not yet understand any but that which God made in that text which hath been already written, 'God made heaven and earth.' " The maintainers of either one or the other of these two opinions which we have put last will, when they have heard these things, answer and say, "We deny not indeed that this formless matter was created by God, the God of whom are all things, very good; for, as we say that that is a greater good which is created and formed, so we acknowledge that that is a minor good which is capable of creation and form, but yet good. But yet the Scripture hath not declared that God made this formlessness, any more than it hath declared many other things; as the Cherubim,' and 'Seraphim,' 2 and those of which the apostle distinctly speaks, 'Thrones,' * Dominions,' 'Principalities,' 'Powers,' 3 all of which it is manifest God made. Or if in that which is said, 'He made heaven and earth,' all things are comprehended, what do we say of the waters upon which the Spirit of God moved? For if they are understood as incorporated in the word earth, how then can formless matter be meant in the term earth when we see the waters so beautiful? Or if it be so meant, why then is it written that out of the same formlessness the firmament was made and called heaven, and yet it is not written that the waters were made? For those waters, which we perceive flowing in so beautiful a manner, remain not formless and invisible. But if, then, they received that beauty when God said, Let the water which is under the firmament be gathered together, 1 so that the gathering be the very formation, what will be answered concerning the waters which are above the firmament, because if formless they would not have deserved to receive a seat so honourable, nor is it written by what word they were formed? If, then, Genesis is silent as to anything that God has made, which, however, neither sound faith nor unerring understanding doubteth that God hath made, 2 let not any sober teaching dare to say that these waters were co-eternal with God because we find them mentioned in the book of Genesis; but when they were created, we find not. Why truth instructing us may we not understand that that formless matter, which the Scripture calls the earth invisible and without form, and the darksome deep, 3 have been made by God out of nothing, and therefore that they are not co-eternal with Him, although that narrative hath failed to tell when they were made ? "

Chap, xxiii. Two kinds of disagreements in the books to be explained.

32. These things, therefore, being heard and perceived according to my weakness of apprehension, which I confess unto Thee, Lord, who knowest it, I see that two sorts of differences may arise when by signs anything is related, even by true reporters, one concerning the truth of the things, the other concerning the meaning of him who reports them. For in one way we inquire, concerning the forming of the creature, what is true; but in another, what Moses, that excellent servant of Thy faith, would have wished that the reader and hearer should understand by these words. As for the first kind, let all those depart from me who imagine themselves to know as true what is false. And as for the other also, let all depart from me who imagine Moses to have spoken things that are false. But let me be united in Thee, O Lord, with them, and in Thee delight myself with them that feed on Thy truth, in the breadth of charity; and let us approach together unto the words of Thy book, and in them make search for Thy will, through the will of Thy servant by whose pen Thou hast dispensed them.

Chap, xxiv. Out of the many true things, it is not asserted confidently that Moses understood this or that.

33. But which of us, amid so many truths which occur to inquirers in these words, understood as they are in different ways, shall so discover that one interpretation as to confidently say " that Moses thought this," and " that in that narrative he wished this to be understood," as confidently as he says "that this is true," whether he thought this thing or the other ? For behold, O my God, I Thy servant, who in this book have vowed unto Thee
a sacrifice of confession, and beseech Thee that of Thy mercy I may pay my vows unto Thee, 1 behold, can I, as I confidently assert that Thou in Thy immutable word hast created all things, invisible and visible, with equal confidence assert that Moses . meant nothing else than this when he wrote, " In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." 2 No. Because it is not as clear to me that this was in his mind when he wrote these things, as I see it to be certain in Thy truth. For his thoughts might be set upon the very beginning of the creation when he said, " In the beginning; " and he might wish it to be understood that, in this place, " the heaven and the earth" were no formed and perfected nature, whether spiritual or corporeal, but each of them newly begun, and as yet formless. Because I see, that whichever of these had been said, it might have been said truly; but which of them he may have thought in these words, I do not so perceive. Although, whether it were one of these, or some other meaning which

2 It is curious to note here Fichte's strange idea (Anweisung zum seligen Leben, Werke, v. 479), that St. John, at the commencement of his Gospel, in his teaching as to the " Word," intended to confute the Mosaic statement, which Fichte since it ran counter to that idea of "the absolute " which he made the point of departure in his philosophy antagonizes as a heathen and Jewish error. On "In the Beginning," see p. 297, note 1, above.

lias not been mentioned by me, that this great man saw in his mind when he used these words, I make no doubt but that he saw it truly, and expressed it suitably.

Chap. xxv. It behoves interpreters, when disagreeing concerning obscure places, to regard God the Author of truth, and the rule of charity.

34. Let no one now trouble me by saying, " Moses thought not as you say, but as I say." For should he ask me, " Whence knowest thou that Moses thought this which you deduce from his words ? " I ought to take it contentedly, 1 and reply perhaps as I have before, or somewhat more fully should he be obstinate. But when he says, " Moses meant not what you say, but what I say," and yet denies not what each of us says, and that both are true, O my God, life of the poor, in whose bosom there is no contradiction, pour down into my heart Thy soothings, that I may patiently bear with such as say this to me; not because they are divine, and because they have seen in the heart of Thy servant what they say, but because they are proud, and have not known the opinion of Moses, but love their own, not because it is true, but because it is their own. Otherwise they would equally love another true opinion, as I love what they say when they speak what is true; not because it is theirs, but because it is true, and therefore now not theirs because true. But if they therefore love that because it is true, it is now both theirs and mine, since it is common to all the lovers of truth. But because they contend that Moses meant not what I say, but what they themselves say, this I neither like nor love; because, though it were so, yet that rashness is not of knowledge, but of audacity; and not vision, but vanity brought it forth. And therefore, Lord, are Thy judgments to be dreaded, since Thy truth is neither mine, nor his, nor another's, but of all of us, whom Thou publicly callest to have it in common, warning us terribly not to hold it as specially for ourselves, lest we be deprived of it. For whosoever claims to himself as his own that which Thou appointed to all to enjoy, and desires that to be his own which belongs to all, is forced away from what is common to all to that which is his own that is, from truth to falsehood. For he that "speaketh a lie, speaketh of his own." 1

1 See p. 8, note, and p. 291, note 4, above.

CHAP. XXVI.] THE LAW OF LOVE TO BE MAINTAINED. 343

35. Hearken, God, Thou best Judge! Truth itself, hearken to what I shall say to this gainsayer; hearken, for before Thee I say it, and before my brethren who use Thy law lawfully, to the end of charity; 2 hearken and behold what I shall say to him, if it be pleasing unto Thee. For this brotherly and peaceful word do I return unto him: " If we both see that that which thou sayest is true, and if we both see that what I say is true, where, I ask, do we see it ? Certainly not I in thee, nor thou in me, but both in the unchangeable truth itself, 3 which is above our minds." When, therefore, we may not contend about the very light of the Lord our God, why do we contend about the thoughts of our neighbour, which we cannot so see as incommutable truth is seen; when, if Moses himself had appeared to us and said, " This I meant," not so should we see it, but believe it ? Let us not, then, " be puffed up for one against the other," 4 above that which is written; let us love the Lord our God with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our mind, and our neighbour as ourself. 5 As to which two precepts of charity, unless we believe that Moses meant whatever in these books he did mean, we shall make God a liar when we think otherwise concerning our fellow-servants' mind than He hath taught us. Behold, now, how foolish it is, in so great an abundance of the truest opinions which can be extracted from these words, rashly to affirm which of them Moses particularly meant; and with pernicious contentions to offend charity itself, on account of which he hath spoken all the things whose words we endeavour to explain!

Chap. xxvi. What he might have asked of God had he been enjoined to write the book of Genesis.

givest my sins, since Thou commandest me that I should love my neighbour as myself, I cannot believe that Thou gavest to Moses, Thy most faithful servant, a less gift than I should wish and desire for myself from Thee, had I been born in his time, and hadst Thou placed me in that position that through the service of my heart and of my tongue those books might be distributed, which so long after were to profit all nations, and through the whole world, from so great a pinnacle of authority, were to surmount the words of all false and proud teachings. I should have wished truly had I then been Moses (for we all come from the same mass; and what is man, saving that Thou art mindful of him ? 1 ). I should then, had I been at that time what he was, and enjoined by Thee to write the book of Genesis, have wished that such a power of expression and such a method of arrangement should be given me, that they who cannot as yet understand how God creates might not reject the words as surpassing their powers; and they who are already able to do this, would find, in what true opinion soever they had by thought arrived at, that it was not passed over in the few words of Thy servant; and should another man by the light of truth have discovered another, neither should that fail to be found in those same words.

Chap, xxvii. The style of speaking in the book of Genesis is simple and clear.

37. For as a fountain in a limited space is more plentiful, and affords supply for more streams over larger spaces than any one of those streams which, after a wide interval, is derived from the same fountain; so the narrative of Thy dispenser, destined to benefit many who were likely to discourse thereon, does, from a limited measure of language, overflow into streams of clear truth, whence each one may draw out for himself that truth which he can concerning these subjects, this one that truth, that one another, by larger circumlocutions of discourse. For some, when they read or hear these words, think that God as a man or some mass gifted with immense power, by some new and sudden resolve,

1 Pa. viii. 8.
had, outside itself, as if at distant places, created heaven and earth, two great bodies above and below, wherein all things were to be contained. And when they hear, God said, Let it be made, and it was made, they think of words begun and ended, sounding in times and passing away, after the departure of which that came into being which was commanded to be; and whatever else of the kind their familiarity with the world * would suggest. In whom, being as yet little ones, 2 while their weakness by this humble kind of speech is carried on as if in a mother's bosom, their faith is healthfully built up, by which they have and hold as certain that God made all natures, which in wondrous variety their senses perceive on every side. Which words, if any one despising them, as if trivial, with proud weakness shall have stretched himself beyond his fostering cradle, he will, alas, fall miserably. Have pity, O Lord God, lest they who pass by trample on the unfledged bird; and send Thine angel, who may restore it to its nest, that it may live until it can fly. 3

Chap, xxviii. The words, " In the beginning" and, " The heaven and the earth" are differently understood.

38. But others, to whom these words are no longer a nest, but shady fruit-bowers, see the fruits concealed in them, fly around rejoicing, and chirpingly search and pluck them. For they see when they read or hear these words, God, that all times past and future are surmounted by Thy eternal and stable abiding, and still that there is no temporal creature which Thou hast not made. And by Thy will, because it is that which Thou art, Thou hast made all things, not by any changed will, nor by a will which before was not, not out of Thyself, in Thine own likeness, the form of all things, but out of nothing, a formless unlikeness which should be formed by Thy likeness (having recourse to Thee the One, after their settled capacity, according as it has been given to each thing in his kind), and might all be made very good; whether they remain around Thee, or, being by degrees removed in time and place, make or undergo beautiful variations. These things they see, and rejoice in the light of Thy truth, in the little degree they here may.

39. Again, another of these directs his attention to that which is said, " In the beginning God made the heaven and the earth," and beholdeth Wisdom, the Beginning, 1 because It also speaketh unto us. 2 Another likewise directs his attention to the same words, and by " beginning " understands the commencement of things created; and receives it thus, In the beginning He made, as if it were said, He at first made.

And among those who understand " In the beginning " to mean, that " in Thy Wisdom Thou hast created heaven and earth," one believes the matter out of which the heaven and earth were to be created to be there called " heaven and earth;"

another, that they are natures already formed and distinct; another, one formed nature, and that a spiritual, under the name of heaven, the other formless, of corporeal matter, under the name of earth. But they who under the name of " heaven and earth " understand matter as yet formless, out of which were to be formed heaven and earth, do not themselves understand it in one manner; but one, that matter out of which the intelligible and the sensible creature were to be completed; another, that only out of which this sensible corporeal mass was to come, holding in its vast bosom these visible and prepared natures. Nor are they who believe that the creatures already set in order and arranged are in this place called heaven and earth of one accord; but the one, both the invisible and visible; the other, the visible only, in which we admire the luminous heaven and darksome earth, and the things that are therein.

Chap. xxix. Concerning the opinion of those who explain it "At first He made."

40. But he who does not otherwise understand, " In the beginning He made," than if it were said, " At first He made," can only truly understand heaven and earth of the matter of heaven and earth, namely, of the universal, that is, intelligible and corporeal creation. For if he would have it of the universe, as already formed, it might rightly be asked of him: " If at first God made this, what made He afterwards ?" And after the universe he will find nothing; thereupon must he, though unwilling, hear, "How is this first, if there is nothing afterwards ?"

But when he says that God made matter first formless, then formed, he is not absurd if he be but able to discern what precedes by eternity, what by time, what by choice, what by origin. By eternity, as God is before all things; by time, as the ' flower is before the fruit; by choice, as the fruit is before the flower; by origin, as sound is before the tune. Of these four, J the first and last which I have referred to are with much difficulty understood; the two middle very easily. For an uncommon and too lofty vision it is to behold, Lord, Thy Eternity, immutably making things mutable, and thereby before them.
Who is so acute of mind as to be able without great labour to discover how the sound is prior to the tune, because a tune is a formed sound; and a thing not formed may exist, but that which existeth not cannot be formed? 1 So is the matter prior to that which is made from it; not prior because it maketh it, since itself is rather made, nor is it prior by an interval of time. For we do not as to time first utter formless sounds without singing, and then adapt or fashion them into the form of a song, just as wood or silver from which a chest or vessel is made. Because such materials do by time also precede the forms of the things which are made from them; but in singing this is not so. For when it is sung, its sound is heard at the same time; seeing there is not first a formless sound, which is afterwards formed into a song. For as soon as it shall have first sounded it passeth away; nor canst thou find anything of it, which being recalled thou canst by art compose. And, therefore, the song is absorbed in its own sound, which sound of it is its matter. Because this same is formed that it may be a tune; and therefore, as I was saying, the matter of the sound is prior to the form of the tune, not before through any power of making it a tune; for neither is a sound the composer of 1 See a similar argument in his Con. adv. Leg. et Proph. i. 9; and sec. 29, and note, above.

348 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK XII

the tune, but is sent forth from the body and is subjected to the soul of the singer, that from it he may form a tune. Nor is it first in time, for it is given forth together with the tune; nor first in choice, for a sound is not better than a tune, since a tune is not merely a sound, but a beautiful sound. But it is first in origin, because the tune is not formed that it may become a sound, but the sound is formed that it may become a tune. By this example, let him who is able understand that the matter of things was first made, and called heaven and earth, because out of it heaven and earth were made. Not that it was made first in time, because the forms of things give rise to time, 1 but that was formless; but now, in time, it is perceived together with its form. Nor yet can anything be related concerning that matter, unless as if it were prior in time, while it is considered last (because things formed are assuredly superior to things formless), and is preceded by the Eternity of the Creator, so that there might be out of nothing that from which something might be made.

Chap. xxx. In the great diversity of opinions, it becomes all to unite charity and Divine Truth.

41. In this diversity of true opinions let Truth itself beget concord; 2 and may our God have mercy upon us, that we may use the law lawfully, 3 the end of the commandment, pure charity. 4 And by this if any one asks of me, "Which of these was the meaning of Thy servant Moses?" these were not the

1 See xi. sec. 29, above, and Gillies' note thereon; and compare with it Augustine's De. Gen. ad Lit. v. 5: "In vain we inquire after time before the creation as though we could find time before time, for if there were no motion of the spiritual or corporeal creatures whereby through the present the future might succeed the past, there would be no time at all. But the creature could not have motion unless it were. Time, therefore, begins rather from the creation, than creation from time, but both are from God."

2 See p. 291, note 4, above. 8 1 Tim. i. 8.

4 See p. 335, note, above; and on the supremacy of this law of love, may be compared Jeremy Taylor's curious story (Works, iv. 477, Eden's ed.): "St. Lewis, the king, having sent Ivo, Bishop of Chartres, on an embassy, the bishop met a woman on the way, grave, sad, fantastic, and melancholy, with fire in one hand, and water in the other. He asked what those symbols meant. She answered, ' My purpose is with fire to burn Paradise, and with my water to quench the flames of hell, that men may serve God without the incentives of hope and fear, and purely for the love of God. ' "

CHAP. XXXI.] MOSES SAW THE TRUTH. 349

utterances of my confessions, should I not confess unto Thee, " I know not;" and yet I know that those opinions are true, with the exception of those carnal ones concerning which I have spoken what I thought well. However, these words of Thy Book affright not those little ones of good hope, treating few of high things in a humble fashion, and few things in varied ways. 1 But let all, whom I acknowledge to see and speak the truth in these words, love one another, and equally love Thee, our God, fountain of truth, if we thirst not for vain things, but for it; yea, let us so honour this servant of Thine, the dispenser of this Scripture, full of Thy Spirit, as to believe that when Thou revealedst Thyself to him, and he wrote these things, he intended that which in them chiefly excels both for light of truth and fruitfulness of profit.

Chap. xxxi. Moses is supposed to have perceived whatever of truth can be discovered in his ivords.

42. Thus, when one shall say, "He [Moses] meant as I do," and another, " Nay, but as I do," I suppose that I am speaking more religiously when I say, " Why not rather as both, if both be true? " And if there be a third truth, or a fourth, and if any one seek any truth altogether different in those words, why may not he be believed to have seen all these, through whom one God hath tempered the Holy Scriptures to the senses of many, about to see therein things true but different? I certainly, and I fearlessly declare it from my heart, were I to write anything to have the highest authority, should prefer so to write, that whatever of truth any one might apprehend concerning these matters, my words should re-echo, rather than that I should set down one true opinion so clearly on this as that I should exclude the rest, that which was false in which could not offend me. Therefore am I unwilling, my God, to be so headstrong as not to believe that from Thee this man [Moses] hath received so much. He, surely, when he wrote those words, perceived and thought whatever of truth we have been able to discover, yea, and whatever we have not been able, nor yet are able, though still it may be found in them.

Chap, xxxii. First, the sense of the writer is to be discovered, then that is to be brought out which Divine Truth intended.

43. Finally, O Lord, who art God, and not flesh and blood, if man doth see anything less, can anything lie hid from "Thy good Spirit," who shall "lead me into the land of uprightness," 1 which Thou Thyself, by those words, wert about to reveal to future readers, although he through whom they were spoken, amid the many interpretations that might have been found, fixed on but one ? Which, if it be so, let that which he thought on be more exalted than the rest. But to us, Lord, either point out the same, or any other true one which may be pleasing unto Thee; so that whether Thou makest known to us that which Thou didst to that man of Thine, or some other by occasion of the same words, yet Thou mayest feed us, not error deceive us. 2 Behold, O Lord my God, how many things we have written concerning a few words, how many, I beseech Thee ! What strength of ours, what ages would suffice for all Thy books after this manner? Permit me, therefore, in these more briefly to confess unto Thee, and to select some one true, certain, and good sense, that Thou shalt inspire, although many senses offer themselves, where many, indeed, may; this being the faith of my confession, that if I should say that which Thy minister felt, rightly and profitably, this I should strive for; the which if I shall not attain, yet I may say that which Thy Truth willed through Its words to say unto me, which said also unto him what It willed.

1 Ps. cxliii. 10.

2 Augustine, as we have seen (see notes, pp. 49 and 115), was frequently addicted to allegorical interpretation, but lie, none the less, laid stress on the necessity of avoiding obscure and allegorical passages when it was necessary to convince the opponent of Christianity (De Unit. Eccl. ch. 5). It should also be noted that, however varied the meaning deduced from a doubtful Scripture, he ever maintained that such meaning must be sacræ fidei comjruam. Compare De Gen. ad Lit. end of book i.; and ibid. viii. 4 and 7. See also notes, pp. 291 and 325, above.

BOOK THIRTEENTH.

OF THE GOODNESS OF GOD EXPLAINED IN THE CREATION OF THINGS, AND OF THE TRINITY AS FOUND IN THE FIRST WORDS OF GENESIS. THE STORY CONCERNING THE ORIGIN OF THE WORLD (GEN. I.) IS ALLEGORICALLY EXPLAINED, AND HE APPLIES IT TO THOSE THINGS WHICH GOD WORKS FOR SANCTIFIED AND BLESSED MAN. FINALLY, HE MAKES AN END OF THIS WORK, HAVING IMPLORED ETERNAL REST FROM GOD.

Chap. i. He calls upon God, and proposes to himself to worship Him.

1. T" CALL upon Thee, my God, my mercy, who madest me, I and who didst not forget me, though forgetful of Thee. I call Thee into My soul, which by the desire which Thou inspirist in it Thou preparest for Thy reception. Do not Thou forsake me calling upon Thee, who didst anticipate me before I called, and didst importunately urge with manifold calls that I should hear Thee from afar, and be converted, and call upon Thee who calledst me. For Thou, Lord, hast blotted out all my evil deserts, that Thou mightest not repay into my hands wherewith I have fallen from Thee, and Thou hast anticipated all my good deserts, that Thou mightest repay into Thy hands wherewith Thou madest me; because before I was, Thou wast, nor was I [anything] to which Thou mightest grant being. And yet behold, I am, out of Thy goodness, anticipating all this which Thou hast made me, and of which Thou hast made me. For neither hadst Thou stood in need of me, nor am I such a good as to be helpful unto Thee, 2 my Lord and God; not that I may so serve Thee as though Thou wert fatigued in working, or lest Thy power may be less if lacking my assistance; nor that, like the land, I may so cultivate Thee that Thou wouldest be uncultivated did I cultivate Thee not; but that I may serve and worship Thee, to the end that I may have well-being from Thee, from whom it is that I am one susceptible of well-being.

Chap. ii. All creatures subsist from the plenitude of Divine goodness,

2. For of the plenitude of Thy goodness Thy creature subsists, that a good, which could profit Thee nothing, nor though of Thee was equal to Thee, might yet be, since if could be made of Thee. For what did heaven and earth, which Thou madest in the beginning, deserve of Thee ? Let those spiritual and corporeal natures, which Thou in Thy wisdom madest, declare what they deserve of Thee to depend thereon, even the inchoate and formless, each in its own kind, either spiritual or corporeal, going into excess, and into remote unlikeness unto Thee (the spiritual, though formless, more excellent than if it were a formed body; and the corporeal, though formless, more excellent than if it were altogether nothing), and thus they as formless would depend upon Thy Word, unless by the same Word they were recalled to Thy Unity, and endued with form, and from Thee, the one sovereign Good, were all made very good. How have they deserved of Thee, that they should be even formless, since they would not be even this except from Thee ?

3. How has corporeal matter deserved of Thee, to be even invisible and formless, 1 since it were not even this hadst Thou not made it; and therefore since it was not, it could not deserve of Thee that it should be made ? Or how could the inchoate spiritual creature 2 deserve of Thee, that even it should flow darksomely like the deep, unlike Thee, had it not been by the same Word turned to that by Whom it was created, and by Him so enlightened become light, although not equally, yet conformably to that Form which is equal unto Thee ? For as to a body, to be is not all one with being

s In his De Gen. ad Lit. i. 5, he maintains that the spiritual creature may have a formless life, since it has its form its wisdom and happiness by being turned to the Word of God, the Immutable Light of Wisdom.

CHAP. III. GOD OUR BLESSEDNESS. 353

beautiful, for then it could not be deformed; so also to a created spirit, to live is not all one with living wisely, for then it would be wise unchangeably. But it is good 1 for it always to hold fast unto Thee, 2 lest, in turning from Thee, it lose that light which it hath obtained in turning to Thee, and relapse into a light resembling the darksome deep. For even we ourselves, who in respect of the soul are a spiritual creature, having turned away from Thee, our light, were in that life "sometimes darkness;" 3 and do labour amidst the remains of our darkness, until in Thy Only One we become Thy righteous, like the mountains of God. For we have been Thy judgments, which are like the great deep. 4

Chap. hi. Genesis i. 8, Of "light," he understands as it is seen in the spiritual creature.

4. But what Thou saidst in the beginning of the creation, "Let there be light, and there was light," I do not unfitly understand of the spiritual creature; because there was even then a kind of life, which Thou mightest illuminate. But as it had not deserved of Thee that it should be such a life as could be enlightened, so neither, when it already was, hath it deserved of Thee that it should be enlightened. For neither could its formlessness be pleasing unto Thee, unless it became light, not by merely existing, but by beholding the illuminating light, and cleaving unto it; so also, that it lives, and lives happily, 6 it owes to nothing whatsoever but to Thy grace; being converted by means of a better change unto that which

1 Ps. lxxiii. 28.

2 Similarly, in his De Civ. Dei, xii. 1, he argues that true blessedness is to be attained "by adhering to the Immutable Good, the Supreme God." This, indeed, imparts the only true life (see note, p. 215, above); for, as Origen says (in S. Joh. ii. 7), "the good man is he who truly exists," and "to be evil and to be wicked are the same as not to be." See notes, pp. 75 and 260, above.

3 Eph. v. 8.

4 Ps. xxxvi. 6, as in the Vulgate, which renders the Hebrew more correctly than the Authorized Version. This passage has been variously interpreted.
Augustine makes "the mountains of God" to mean the saints, prophets, and apostles, while "the great deep" he interprets of the wicked and sinful. Compare In Ev. Joh. Tract, i. 2; and in Ps. xxxv. 7, sec. 10.

5 Gen. i. 3.

6 Compare the end of chap. 24 of book xi. of the De Civ. Dei, where he says that the life and light and joy of the holy city which is above is in God.

can be changed neither into better nor into worse; the which Thou only art because Thou only simply art, to whom it is not one thing to live, another to live blessedly, since Thou art Thyself Thine own Blessedness.

Chap, iv. All things have been created by the grace of God, and are not of Him as standing in need of created things.

5. What, therefore, could there be wanting unto Thy good, which Thou Thyself art, although these things had either never been, or had remained formless, the which Thou madest not out of any want, but out of the plenitude of Thy goodness, restraining them and converting them to form not as though Thy joy were perfected by them? For to Thee, being perfect, their imperfection is displeasing, and therefore were they perfected by Thee, and were pleasing unto Thee; but not as if Thou wert imperfect, and wert to be perfected in their perfection. For Thy good Spirit was borne over the waters, not borne up by them as if He rested upon them. For those in whom Thy good Spirit is said to rest, He causes to rest in Himself. But Thy incorruptible and unchangeable will, which in itself is all-sufficient for itself, was borne over that life which Thou hadst made, to which to live is not all one with living happily, since, flowing in its own darkness, it liveth also; for which it remaineth to be converted unto Him by whom it was made, and to live more and more by "the fountain of life," and in His light to "see light," and to be perfected, and enlightened, and made happy.

Chap, v. He recognises the Trinity in the first two verses of Genesis.

6. Behold now, the Trinity appears unto me in an enigma, which Thou, my God, art, since Thou, Father, in the Beginning of our wisdom, Which is Thy Wisdom, born of Thyself, equal and co-eternal unto Thee, that is, in Thy Son, hast created heaven and earth. Many things have we said of the heaven of heavens, and of the earth invisible and formless, and of the darksome deep, in reference to the wandering defects of its spiritual deformity, were it not converted unto Him from whom was its life, such as it was, and by His enlightening became a beauteous life, and the heaven of that heaven which was afterwards set between water and water. And under the name of God, I now held the Father, who made these things; and under the name of the Beginning, 1 the Son, in whom He made these things; and believing, as I did, that my God was the Trinity, I sought further in His holy words, and behold, Thy Spirit was borne over the waters. Behold the Trinity, O my God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the Creator of all creation.

Chap. vi. Why the Holy Ghost should have been mentioned after the mention of heaven and earth.

1. But what was the cause, O Thou true-speaking Light?
Unto Thee do I lift up my heart, let it not teach me vain things; disperse its darkness, and tell me, I beseech Thee, by our mother charity, tell me, I beseech Thee, the reason why, after the mention of heaven, and of the earth invisible and formless, and darkness upon the deep, Thy Scripture should then at length mention Thy Spirit? Was it because it was meet that it should be spoken of Him that He was "borne over," and this could not be said, unless that were first mentioned "over" which Thy Spirit may be understood to have been "borne?" For neither was he "borne over" the Father, nor the Son, nor could it rightly be said that He was "borne over" if He were "borne over" nothing. That, therefore, was first to be spoken of "over" which He might be "borne;" and then He, whom it was not meet to mention otherwise than as having been "borne." Why, then, was it not meet that it should otherwise be mentioned of Him, than as having been "borne over?"

Chap. vii. That the Holy Spirit bringa us to God.

8. Hence let him that is able now follow Thy apostle with his understanding where he thus speaks, because Thy love "is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us;" 2 and where, "concerning spiritual gifts," he teacheth and showeth unto us a more excellent way of charity; 3 and where he bows his knees unto Thee for us, that we may know the super-eminent knowledge of the love of Christ. 1 And, therefore, from the beginning was He supereminently "borne above the waters." To whom shall I tell this? How speak of the weight of lustful desires, pressing downwards to the steep abyss? and how charity raises us up again, through Thy Spirit which was "borne over the waters?"

To whom shall I tell it? How tell it? For neither are there places in which we are merged and emerge. 2 What can be more like, and yet more unlike? They be affections, they be loves; the filthiness of our spirit flowing away downwards with the love of cares, and the sanctity of Thine raising us upwards by the love of freedom from care; that we may lift our hearts 3 unto Thee where Thy Spirit is "borne over the waters;" and that we may come to that pre-eminent rest, when our soul shall have passed through the waters which have no substance. 4

Chap. viii. That nothing whatever, short of God, can yield to the rational creature a happy rent.

2 "Neque enim loca stint quitms mergimur et emergimus."

3 Watts remarks here: "This sentence was generally in the Church service and communion. Nor is there scarce any one old liturgy but hath it, Sursum corda, Jfabemus ad Dominum." Palmer, speaking of the Lord's Supper, says, in his Origines Liturgicce, iv. 14, that "Cyprian, in the third century, attested the use of the form, 'Lift up your hearts,' and its response, in the liturgy of Africa (Cyprian, De Oral. Dom. p. 152, Opera, ed. Fell). Augustine, at the beginning of the fifth century, speaks of these words as being used in all churches" (Aug. De Vera Relig. iii.). We find from the same writer, ibid. v. 5, that in several churches this sentence was used in the office of baptism.

4 "Sine substantia," the Old Ver. rendering of Ps. cxxiv. 5. The Vulgate gives "Aquam intolerabilem." The Authorized Version, however, correctly renders the Hebrew by "proud waters," that is, swollen. Augustine, in Pa. cxxiii. 5, sec. 9, explains the "aqua sine substantia," as the water of sins; "for," he says, "sins have not substance; they have weakness, not substance; want, not substance."

5 We may note here that Augustine maintains the existence of the relationship between these two events. He says in his Enchiridion, c. xxix., that "the restored part of humanity will fill up the gap which the rebellion and fall of the devils had left in the company of the angels. For this is the promise to the saints, that at the resurrection they shall be equal to the angels of God (Luke xx. 36).

spiritual creation, unless Thou hadst said from the beginning,
" Let there be light," and there had been light, and every obedient intelligence of Thy celestial City had cleaved to Thee, and rested in Thy Spirit, which unchangeably is "borne over" everything changeable. Otherwise, even the heaven of heavens itself would have been a darksome deep, whereas now it is light in the Lord. For even in that wretched restlessness of the spirits who fell away, and, when unclothed of the garments of Thy light, discovered their own darkness, dost Thou sufficiently disclose how noble Thou hast made the rational creature; to which nought which is inferior to Thee will suffice to yield a happy rest, 1 and so not even herself. For Thou, our God, shalt enlighten our darkness; 2 from Thee are derived our garments of light, 3 and then shall our darkness be as the noonday. 4 Give Thyself unto me, my God, restore Thyself unto me; behold, I love Thee, and if it be too little, let me love Thee more strongly. I cannot measure my love so that I may come to know how much there is yet wanting in me, ere my life run into Thy embraces, and not be turned away until it be hidden in the secret place of Thy Presence. 6 This only I know, that woe is me except in Thee, not only without, but even also within

And thus the Jerusalem which is above, which is the mother of us all, the City of God, shall not be spoiled of any of the number of her citizens, shall perhaps reign over even a more abundant population." He speaks to the same effect at the close of ch. 1 of his De Civ. Dei, xxii. This doctrine was enlarged upon by some of the writers of the seventeenth century.

1 See his De Civ. Dei, xxii. 1, where he beautifully compares sin to blindness, in that it makes us miserable in depriving us of the sight of God. Also his De Cat. Rud. sec. 24, where he shows that the restlessness and changefulness of the world cannot give rest. Comp. p. 4, note 1, above.

* Ps. xxxi. 20. "In abscondito vultus tui," Old Ver. Augustine in his comment on this passage (Enarr. 4, sec. 8) gives us his interpretation. He points out that the refuge of a particular place (e.g. the bosom of Abraham) is not enough. "We must have God with us here as our refuge, and then we will be hidden in His countenance hereafter; or in other words, if we receive Him into our heart now, He will hereafter receive us into His countenance Me post hoc seculum excipiet te vultu mo. For heaven is a prepared place for a prepared people, and we must be fitted to live with Him there by going to Him now, myself; and all plenty which is not my God is poverty to me. 1

Chap. ix. Why the Holy Spirit was only "borne over" the waters.

10. But was not either the Father or the Son "borne over the waters?" If we understand this to mean in space, as a body, then neither was the Holy Spirit; but if the incommutable super-eminence of Divinity above everything mutable, then both Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost were borne "over the waters." Why, then, is this said of Thy Spirit only? Why is it said of Him alone? As if He had been in place who is not in place, of whom only it is written, that He is Thy gift? 2 In Thy gift we rest; there we enjoy Thee. Our rest is our place. Love lifts us up thither, and Thy good Spirit lifteth our lowliness from the gates of death. 3 In Thy good pleasure lies our peace. 4 The body by its own weight; gravitates towards its own place. Weight goes not downward only, but to its own place. Fire tends upwards, a stone downwards. They are propelled by their own weights, they seek their own places. Oil poured under the water is raised, above the water; water poured upon oil sinks under the oil.

They are propelled by their own weights, they seek their own places. Out of order, they are restless; restored to order, they are at rest. My weight is my love; 5 by it am I borne whithersoever I am borne. By Thy Gift we are inflamed, and are borne upwards; we wax hot inwardly, and go forwards.

We ascend Thy ways that be in our heart, 6 and sing a song of degrees; we glow inwardly with Thy fire, with Thy good fire, and we go, because we go upwards to the peace of Jerusalem; for glad was I when they said unto me, "Let us go into the house of the Lord." 7 There hath Thy good pleasure placed us, that we may desire no other thing than to dwell there for ever.

CHAP. X.] THE MYSTERY OF THE TRINITY. 359

Chap. x. That nothing arose save by the gift of God.

11. Happy creature, which, though in itself it was other than Thou, hath known no other state than that as soon as it was made, it was, without any interval of time, by Thy Gift, which is borne over everything mutable, raised up by that calling whereby Thou saidst, "Let there be light, and there was light." Whereas in us there is a difference of times, in that we were darkness, and are made light; but of that it is only said what it would have been had it not been enlightened.

And this is so spoken as if it had been fleeting and darksome before; that so the cause whereby it was made to be otherwise might appear, that is to say, being turned to the unfailing Light it might become light. Let him who is able understand this; and let him who is not, ask of Thee. Why should he trouble me, as if I could enlighten any "man that cometh into the world?" 8

Chap. xi. That the symbols of the Trinity in man, To Be, To Know, and To Will, are never thoroughly examined.

12. Which of us understandeth the Almighty Trinity? And yet which speaketh not of It, if indeed it be It? Bare is that

4 As Augustine constantly urges of God, "Cujus nulla scientia est in anima, nisi scire quomodo eum nesciat" (De Ord. ii. 18), so we may say of the Trinity. The objectors to the doctrine sometimes speak as if it were irrational (Mansel's Bampton Lectures, lect. vi., notes 9, 10). But while the doctrine is above reason, it is not contrary thereto; and, as Dr. Newman observes in his Grammar of Assent, v. 2 (a book which the student should remember has been written since his union with the Roman Church), though the doctrine be mysterious, and, when taken as a whole, transcends all our experience, there is that on which the spiritual life of the Christian can repose in its "propositions taken one by one, and that not in the case of intellectual and thoughtful minds only, but of all religious minds whatever, in the case of a child or a peasant as well as of a philosopher."

With the above compare the words of Leibnitz in his "Discours de la Conformite de la Foi avec la Raison," sec. 56: "Il en est de meme des autres mysteres, ou les esprits moderres trouveront toujours une explication suffisante pour croire, et jamais autant qu'il en faut pour comprendre. Il nous suffit d'un certain ce que c'est (i e<m); mais le comment soul which, while it speaketh of it, knows what it speaketh of. And they contend and strive, but no one without peace seeth that vision. I could wish that men would consider these three things that are in themselves. These three are far other than the Trinity; but I speak of things in which they may exercise and prove themselves, and feel how far other they be. 1 But the three things I speak of are, To Be, to Know, and to Will: For I Am, and I Know, and I Will; I Am Knowing and Willing; and I Know myself to Be and to Will; and I Will to Be and to Know. In these three, therefore, let him who can see how inseparable a life there is, even one life, one mind, and one essence; finally, how inseparable is the distinction, and yet a distinction. Surely a man hath it before him; let him look into himself, and see, and tell me. But when he discovers and can say anything of these, let him not then think that he has discovered that which is above these Unchangeable, which Is unchangeably, and Knows unchangeably, and Wills unchangeably. And whether on account of these three there is also, where they are, a Trinity; 1

While giving illustrations of the Trinity like the above, he would not have a man think "that he has discovered that which is above these, Unchangeable." (See also De Trin. xv. 5, end.) He is very fond of such illustrations. In his De Civ. Dei, xi. 26, 27, for example, we have a parallel to this in our text, in the union of existence, knowledge, and love in man; in his De. Trin. ix. 4, 17, 18, we have mind, knowledge, and love; ibid. x. 19, memory, understanding, and will; and ibid. xi. 16, memory, thought, and will. In his De Lib. Arb. ii. 7, again, we have the doctrine illustrated by the union of being, life, and knowledge in man. He also finds illustrations of the doctrine in other created things, as in their measure, weight, and number (De Trin. xi. 18), and their existence, figure, and order (De Vera Relig. xiii. ). The nature of these illustrations would at first sight seem to involve him in the Sabellian heresy, which denied the fulness of the Godhead to each of the three Persons of the Trinity; but this is only in appearance. He does not use these illustrations as presenting anything analogous to the union of the three Persons in the Godhead, but as dimly illustrative of it.

He declares his belief in the Athanasian doctrine, which, as Dr. Newman observes (Grammar of Assent, v. 2), "may be said to be summed up in this very formula on which St. Augustine lays so much stress, 'Tres et Unus,' not merely 'Unum.'" Nothing can be clearer than his words in his De Civ. Dei, xi. 24: "When we inquire regarding each singly, it is said that each is God and Almighty; and when we speak of all together, it is said that there are not three Gous, nor three Almighty, but one God Almighty. " Compare with this his De Tr'rn. vii., end of ch. 11, where the language is equally emphatic. See also Mansel, as above, lect. vi. and notes 11 and 12.
or whether these three be in Each, so that the three belong to Each; or whether both ways at once, wondrously, simply, and yet diversely, in Itself a limit unto Itself, yet illimitable; whereby It is, and is known unto Itself, and sufficeth to Itself, unchangeably the Self-same, by the abundant magnitude of its Unity, who can readily conceive? Who in any wise express it? Who in any way rashly pronounce thereon?

Chap. xii. Allegorical explanation of Genesis, chap. i., concerning the origin of the Church and its worship.

13. Proceed in thy confession, say to the Lord thy God, O my faith, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord my God, in Thy name have we been baptized, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in Thy name do we baptize, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. I because among us also in His Christ did God make heaven and earth, namely, the spiritual and carnal people of His Church. 2 Yea, and our earth, before it received the "form of doctrine," 8 was invisible and formless, and we were covered with the darkness of ignorance. For Thou correctest man for iniquity, 4 and "Thy judgments are a great deep." 5 But because Thy Spirit was "borne over the waters," 6 Thy mercy forsook not our misery, 7 and Thou saidst, "Let there be light," "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." 8 Repent ye, let there be light. 9 And because our soul was troubled within us, 10 we remembered Thee, O Lord, from the land of Jordan, and that mountain 11 equal unto Thyself, but little for our sakes; and

1 Matt, xxviii. 19.

2 He similarly interprets "heaven and earth" in his De Gen. ad Lit. ii. 4. With this compare Chrysostom's illustration in his De Poznit. hom. 8. The Church is like the ark of Noah, yet different from it. Into that ark as the animals entered, so they came forth. The fox remained a fox, the hawk a hawk, and the serpent a serpent. But with the spiritual ark it is not so, for in it evil dispositions are changed. This illustration of Chrysostom is used with an effective but rough eloquence by the Italian preacher Segneri, in his Quaresimale, serm. iv. sec. 10.

upon our being displeased with our darkness, we turned unto Thee, "and there was light."
And, behold, we were sometimes darkness, but now light in the Lord. 1

14. But as yet " by faith, not by sight," 2 for " we are saved by hope; but hope that is seen is not hope." 8 As yet deep calleth unto deep 4 but in " the noise of Thy waterspouts." 5 And as yet doth he that saith, I " could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal," 6 even he, as yet, doth not count himself to have apprehended, and forgetteth those things which are behind, and reacheth forth to those things which are before, 7 and groaneth being burdened; 8 and his soul thirsteth after the living God, as the hart after the waterbrooks, and saith, " When shall I come ? " 9 " desiring to be clothed upon with his house which is from heaven;" 10 and calleth upon this lower deep, saying, " Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind." 11 And, " Be not children in understanding, howbeit in malice be ye children," that in "understanding ye may be perfect;" 12 and "0 foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you ?" But now not in his own voice, but in Thine who sentest Thy Spirit from above; 14 through Him who "ascended up on high," 15 and set open the flood-gates of His gifts, 16 that the force of His streams might make glad the city of God. 17 For, for Him doth "the friend of the bridegroom" 18 sigh, having now the first-fruits of the Spirit laid up with Him, yet still groaning within himself, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of his body; 19 to Him he sighs, for he is a member of the Bride; for Him is he jealous, for he is the friend of the Bridegroom j 20

for Him is he jealous, not for himself; because in the voice of Thy " waterspouts," x not in his own voice, doth he call on that other deep, for whom being jealous he feareth, lest that, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so their minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in our Bridegroom, Thine only Son. 2 What a light of beauty will that be when " we shall see Him as He is," 3 and those tears be passed away which " have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God?" 4

Behold where Thou art ! In Thee I breathe a little, when I pour out my soul by myself in the voice of joy and praise, the sound of him that keeps holy-day. 6 And yet it is " cast down," because it relapses and becomes a deep, or rather it feels that it is still a deep. Unto it doth my faith speak which Thou hast kindled to enlighten my feet in the night,
" Why art thou cast down, my soul ? and why art thou disquieted in me ? hope thou in God;" 6 His " word is a lamp unto my feet." 7 Hope and endure until the night, the mother of the wicked, until the anger of the Lord be overpast, 8 whereof we also were once children who were sometimes darkness, 9 the remains whereof we carry about us in our body, dead on account of sin, 10 " until the day break and the shadows flee away." u " Hope thou in the Lord." In the morning I shall stand in Thy presence, and contemplate Thee; 12 I shall for ever confess unto Thee. 13 In the morning I shall stand in Thy presence, and shall see " the health of my countenance," 14 my God, who also shall quicken our mortal bodies by the Spirit that dwelleth in us, 15 because in mercy He was borne over our inner darksome and floating deep. Chap. XV. Allegorical explanation of the firmament and upper works, ver. 6.

16. Or who but Thou, our God, made for us that firmament 8 of authority over us in Thy divine Scripture ? 9 As it is said, For heaven shall be folded up like a scroll; 10 and now it is extended over us like a skin. 11 For Thy divine Scripture is of more sublime authority, since those mortals through whom Thou didst dispense it unto us underwent mortality.

And Thou knowest, Lord, Thou knowest, how Thou with skins didst clothe men 12 when by sin they became mortal.

Whence as a skin hast Thou stretched out the firmament of Thy Book; 18 that is to say, Thy harmonious words, which by the ministry of mortals Thou hast spread over us. For by their very death is that solid firmament of authority in Thy Chap. xvii. Allegorical explanation of the sea and the fruit-bearing earth verses 9 and 11.

20. Who hath gathered the embittered together into one society ? For they have all the same end, that of temporal and earthly happiness, on account of which they do all things, although they may fluctuate with an innumerable variety of cares. Who, O Lord, unless Thou, saidst, Let the waters be gathered together into one place, and let the dry land appear, 3 which "thirsteth after Thee"? * For the sea also is Thine, and Thou hast made it, and Thy hands prepared the dry land. 6 For neither is the bitterness of men's wills, but the gathering together of waters called sea: for Thou even curbest the wicked desires of men's souls, and fixest their bounds, how far they may be permitted to advance, 6 and that their waves may be broken against each other; and thus dost Thou make it a sea, by the order of Thy dominion over all things.

21. But as for the souls that thirst after Thee, and that appear before Thee (being by other bounds divided from the society of the sea), them Thou waterest by a secret and sweet

"for our practical guidance," and not as a matter of speculation. He says:
"The utmost deficiency that can be charged against human faculties amounts only to this, that we cannot say that we know God as God knows Himself, that the truth of which our finite minds are susceptible may, for aught we know, be but the passing shadow of some higher reality, which exists only in the Infinite Intelligence." He shows also that this deficiency pertains to the human faculties as such, and that, whether they set themselves to consider the things of nature or revelation. 8 Gen. i. 9. In his comment on Psalm lxiv. 6 (sec. 9), he interprets "the sea," allegorically, of the wicked world. Hence were the disciples called "fishers of men." If the fishers have taken us in the nets of faith, we are to rejoice, because the net will be dragged to the shore. spring, that the earth may bring forth her fruit, 1 and, Thou, Lord God, so commanding, our soul may bud forth works of mercy according to their kind, 2 loving our neighbour in the relief of his bodily necessities, having seed in itself according to its likeness, when from our infirmity we compassionate even to the relieving of the needy; helping them in a like manner as we would that help should be brought unto us if we were in a like need; not only in the things that are easy, as in "herb yielding seed," but also in the protection of our assistance, in our very strength, like the tree yielding fruit; that is, a good turn in delivering him who suffers an injury from the hand of the powerful, and in furnishing him with the shelter of protection by the mighty strength of just judgment.

Chap. xviii. Of the lights and stars of heaven of day and night, ver. 14.

22. Thus, O Lord, thus, I beseech Thee, let there arise, as Thou makest, as Thou givest joy and ability, let "truth spring out of the earth, and righteousness look down from heaven," 3 and let there be "lights in the firmament." 4 Let us break our bread to the hungry, and let us bring the houseless poor to our house. 6 Let us clothe the naked, and despise not those of our own flesh. 6 The which fruits having sprung forth from the earth, behold, because it is good; 7 and let our temporary light burst forth; 8 and let us, from this inferior fruit of action, possessing the delights of contemplation and of the Word of Life above, let us appear as lights in the world, 9 clinging to the firmament of Thy Scripture. For therein Thou makest it plain unto us, that we may distinguish between things intelligible and things of sense, as if between the day and the night; or between souls, given, some to things

1 Gen. i. 11. As he interprets (see sec. 20, note, above) the sea as the world, so he tells us in Ps. lxvi. 6, sec. 8, that when the earth, full of thorns, thirsted for the waters of heaven, God in His mercy sent His apostles to preach the gospel, whereon the earth brought forth that fruit which fills the world; that is, the earth bringing forth fruit represents the Church.

intellectual, others to things of sense; so that now not Thou only in the secret of Thy judgment, as before the firmament was made, dividest between the light and the darkness, but Thy spiritual children also, placed and ranked in the same firmament (Thy grace being manifest throughout the world), may give light upon the earth, and divide between the day and night, and be for signs of times; because "old things have passed away," and "behold all things are become new;" 1 and "because our salvation is nearer than when we believed;" 2 and because "the night is far spent, the day is at hand;" 3 and because Thou wilt crown Thy year with blessing, 4 sending the labourers of Thy goodness into Thy harvest, 5 in the sowing of which others have laboured, sending also into another field, whose harvest shall be in the end. 6 Thus Thou grantest the prayers of him that asketh, and blessest the years of the just; 7 but Thou art the same, and in Thy years which fail not 8 Thou preparest a garner for our passing years. For by an eternal counsel Thou dost in their proper seasons bestow upon the earth heavenly blessings.

23. For, indeed, to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom, as if the greater light, on account of those who are delighted with the light of manifest truth, as in the beginning of the day; but to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit, as if the lesser light; 9 to another faith; to another the gift of healing; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another the discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues. For all these worketh the one and selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man his own as He willeth; 10 and making stars appear manifestly, to profit withal. 11 But the word of knowledge, wherein are contained all sacra-

1 1 Cor. xiii. 2. The Authorized Version and the Vulgate render more correctly, "mysteries." From Palmer (see p. 178, note 5, above), we learn that "the Fathers gave the name of sacrament or mystery to everything which conveyed one signification or property to unassisted reason, and another to faith;" while, at the same time, they counted Baptism and the Lord's Supper as the two great sacraments.
The sacraments, then, used in this sense are "varied in their periods," and Augustine, in Ps. lxxiii. 2, speaks of distinguishing between the sacraments of the Old Testament and the sacraments of the New. "Sacramenta novi Testamen ti," he says, "dant salutem, sacramenta veteris Testamenti promi sennit salvatorem." So also in Ps. xlvi. he says:
"Our Lord God varying, indeed, the sacraments of the words, but commending unto us one faith, hath diffused through the sacred Scriptures manifoldly and variously the faith in which we live, and by which we live. For one and the same thing is said in many ways, that it may be varied in the manner of speaking in order to prevent aversion, but may be preserved as one with a view to concord."

2 1 Cor. iii. 1. 3 1 Cor. ii. 6.

4 1 Cor. iii. 2, and Heb. v. 12. The allusion in our text is to what is called the Disciplina Arcani of the early Church. Clement of Alexandria, in his Stromata, enters at large into the matter of esoteric teaching, and traces its use amongst the Hebrews, Greeks, and Egyptians. Clement, like Chrysostom and other Fathers, supports this principle of interpretation on the authority of St.
Paul in Heb. v. and vi. , referred to by Augustine above. He says (as quoted by Bishop Kaye, Clement of Alexandria, ch. iv. p. 183): "Babes must be fed with milk, the perfect man with solid food; milk is catechetical instruction, the first nourishment of the soul; solid food, contemplation penetrating into all mysteries (* Wovtim foupia), the blood and flesh of the Word, the comprehension of the Divine power and essence." Augustine, therefore, when he speaks of being "contented with the light of the moon and stars," alludes to the partial knowledge imparted to the catechumen during his probationary period before baptism. It was only as competentes, and ready for baptism, that the catechumens were taught the Lord's Prayer and the Creed. "We have already adverted to this matter in the note on p. 108, and need not now do more than refer the reader to Dr.
Newman's Avians. In ch. i. sec. 3 of that work, there are some most interesting pages on this subject, in its connection with the Catechetical School of Alexandria. See also p. 180, enabled to look upon the Sun, let him not dwell in his own deserted night, but let him be contented with the light of the moon and the stars. Thou reasonest these things with us, our All-wise God, in Thy Book, Thy firmament, that we may discern all things in an admirable contemplation, although as yet in signs, and in times, and in days, and in years.

Chap. xix. All men should become lights in the firmament of heaven.

24. But first, "Wash you, make you clean;" put away iniquity from your souls, and from before mine eyes, that the dry land may appear. "Learn to do well; judge the fatherless; plead for the widow," that the earth may bring forth the green herb for meat, and the tree bearing fruit; and come let us reason together, saith the Lord, that there may be lights in the firmament of heaven, and that they may shine upon the earth. That rich man asked of the good Master what he should do to attain eternal life. Let the good Master, whom he thought a man, and nothing more, tell him (but He is "good" because He is God) let Him tell him, that if he would "enter into life" he must "keep the commandments;" let him banish from himself the bitterness of malice and wickedness; let him not kill, nor

1 Those ready for strong meat were called "illuminated" (see p. 179, note 1, above), as their eyes were "enabled to look upon the Sun." We have frequent traces in Augustine's writings of the Neo-Platonic doctrine that the soul has a capacity to see God, even as the eye the sun. In Serm. lxxxviii. 6 he says: "Daretne tibi unde videres solem queru fecit, et non tibi daret unde videres eum qui te fecit, cum te ad imaginem suam fecerit?" And, referring to 1 John iii. 2, he tells us in Ep. xcii. 3, that not with the bodily eye shall we see God, but with the inner, which is to be renewed day by day: 'We shall, therefore, see Him according to the measure in which we shall be like Him; because now the measure in which we do not see Him is according to the measure of our unlikeness to Him.' Compare also Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho, c. 4: "Plato, indeed, says, that the mind's eye is of such a nature, and has been given for this end, that we may see that very Being who is the cause of all when the mind is pure itself." Some interesting remarks on this subject, and on the three degrees of divine knowledge as held by the Neo-Platonists, will be found in John Smith's Select Discourses, pp. 2 and 165 (Cambridge 1860). commit adultery, nor steal, nor bear false witness; that the dry land may appear, and bud forth the honouring of father and mother, and the love of our neighbour. 1 All these, saith he, have I kept. 2 Whence, then, are there so many thorns, if the earth be fruitful ? Go, root up the woody thicket of avarice; sell that thou hast, and be filled with fruit by giving to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and follow the Lord "if thou wilt be perfect," 3 coupled with those amongst whom He speaketh wisdom, Who knoweth what to distribute to the day and to the night, that thou also mayest know it, that for thee also there may be lights in the firmament of heaven, which will not be unless thy heart be there; 4 which likewise also will not be unless thy treasure be there, as thou hast heard from the good Master. But the barren earth was grieved, 5 and the thorns choked the word. 6

25. But you, "chosen generation, 7 you weak things of the world," who have forsaken all things that you might "follow the Lord," go after Him, and "confound the things which are mighty;" 8 go after Him, ye beautiful feet, 9 and shine in the firmament, 10 that the heavens may declare His glory, dividing between the light of the perfect, though not as of the angels, and the darkness of the little, though not despised ones. Shine over all the earth, and let the day, lightened by the sun, utter unto day the word of wisdom; and let night, shining by the moon, announce unto night the word of knowledge. 11 The moon and the stars shine for the night, but the night obscureth them not, since they illumine it in its degree. For behold God (as it were) saying, "Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven." There came suddenly a sound from heaven, as it had been the rushing of a mighty wind, and there appeared cloven tongues bike as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. 12 And there were made lights in the firmament of heaven, having the word

Chap. xx. Concerning reptiles and flying creatures (ver. 20), the sacrament of Baptism being regarded.

26. Let the sea also conceive and bring forth your works, and let the waters bring forth the moving creatures that have life. 4 For ye, who " take forth the precious from the vile," have been made the mouth of God, through which He saith, " Let the waters bring forth," not the living creature which the earth bringeth forth, but the moving creature having life, and the fowls that fly above the earth. For Thy sacraments, God, by the ministry of Thy holy ones, have made their way amid the billows of the temptations of the world, to instruct the Gentiles in Thy Name, in Thy Baptism. And amongst these things, many great works of wonder have been wrought, like as great whales; and the voices of Thy messengers flying above the earth, near to the firmament of Thy Book; that being set over them as an authority, under which they were to fly whithersoever they were to go. For "there is no speech, nor language, where their voice is not heard; " seeing their sound hath gone through all the earth, and their words to

2 That is, as having their light from Him who is their central Sun (see p. 76, note 2, above). For it is true of all Christians in relation to their Lord, as he says of John the Baptist (Serm. ccclxxxii. 7): " Johannes lumen illuminatum: Christus lumen illuminans." See also p. 371, note, above.

6 Ps. xix. 3, 4. The word " sound" in this verse (as given in the LXX. and Vidg.), is in the Hebrew QM) which is rightly rendered in the Authorized Version a "line " or "rule." It may be noted, in connection with Augustine's interpretation, that the word "firmament" in the first verse of this psalm is the yipi of Gen. i. 7; translated in both places by the LXX. <rTpi>p*. The - i. T

"heavens " and the " firmament" are constantly interpreted by the Fathers as referring to the apostles and their firmness in teaching the word; and this is supported by reference to St. Paul's quotation of the text in Rom. x. 18: " But I say, Have they not heard ? Yes, verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world."
the end of the world," because Thou, Lord, hast multiplied these things by blessing. 1

27. Whether do I lie, or do I mingle and confound, and not distinguish between the clear knowledge of these things that are in the firmament of heaven, and the corporeal works in the undulating sea and under the firmament of heaven? For of those things whereof the knowledge is solid and defined, without increase by generation, as it were lights of wisdom and knowledge, yet of these self-same things the material operations are many and varied; and one thing in growing from another is multiplied by Thy blessing, God, who hast refreshed the fastidiousness of mortal senses; so that in the knowledge of our mind, one thing may, through the motions of the body, be in many ways set out and expressed. These sacraments have the waters brought forth; 3 but in Thy Word. The wants of the people estranged from the eternity of Thy truth have produced them, but in Thy Gospel; because the waters themselves have cast them forth, the bitter weakness of which was the cause of these things being sent forth in Thy Word.

28. Now all things are fair that Thou hast made, but behold, Thou art inexpressibly fairer who hast made all things; from whom had not Adam fallen, the saltness of the sea would never have flowed from him, the human race so profoundly curious, and boisterously swelling, and restlessly moving; and thus there would be no need that Thy dispensers should work in many waters, 4 in a corporeal and sensible manner, mysterious doings and sayings. For so these creeping and flying creatures now present themselves to my mind, whereby men, instructed, initiated, and subjected by corporeal sacraments, should not further profit, unless their soul had a higher spiritual life, and unless, after the word of admission, it looked forwards to perfection. 6

29. And hereby, in Thy Word, not the depth of the sea, but the earth parted from the bitterness of the waters, 1 bringeth forth not the creeping and flying creature that hath life, 2 but the living soul itself. 3 For now hath it no longer need of baptism, as the heathen have, and as itself had when it was covered with the waters, for no other entrance is there into the kingdom of heaven, 4 since Thou hast appointed that this should be the entrance, nor does it seek great works of miracles by which to cause faith; for it is not such that, unless it shall have seen signs and wonders, it will not believe, 6 when now the faithful earth is separated from the waters of the sea, rendered bitter by infidelity; and "tongues are for a sign, not to those that believe, but to those that believe not." 6 Nor then doth the earth, which Thou hast founded above the waters, 7 stand in need of that flying kind which at Thy word the waters brought forth. Send Thy word forth into it by Thy messengers. For we relate their works, but it is Thou who workest in them, that in it they may work out a living soul.

The earth bringeth it forth, because the earth is the cause that they work these things in the soul; as the sea has been the cause that they wrought upon the moving creatures that have life, and the fowls that fly under the firmament of heaven, of which the earth hath now no need; although it feeds on the fish which was taken out of the deep, upon that table which Thou hast prepared in the presence of those that believe. 8 For therefore He was raised from the deep, that He

"Fundasti super aquas," which is the Old Ver. of Ps. cxxxvi. 6. Augustine sometimes uses a version with "firmavit terram," which corresponds to the LXX., but the Authorized Version renders the Hebrew more accurately by "stretched out." In his comment on this place he applies this text to baptism as being the entrance into the Church, and in this he is followed by many mediaeval writers.

8 Ps. xxxiii. 5. Many of the Fathers interpret this text of the Lord's Supper, as Augustine does above. The fish taken out of the deep, which is fed upon, might feed the dry land; and the fowl, though bred in the sea, is yet multiplied upon the earth. For of the first preachings of the Evangelists, the infidelity of men was the prominent cause; but the faithful also are exhorted, and are manifoldly blessed by them day by day. But the living soul takes its origin from the earth, for it is not profitable, unless to those already among the faithful, to restrain themselves from the love of tins' world, that so their soul may live unto Thee, which was dead while living in pleasures, in death-bearing pleasures, Lord, for Thou art the vital delight of the pure heart.

376 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK XIII

30. Now, therefore, let Thy ministers work upon the earth, not as in the waters of infidelity, by announcing and speaking by miracles, and sacraments, and mystic words; in which ignorance, the mother of admiration, may be intent upon them, in fear of those hidden signs. For such is the entrance unto the faith for the sons of Adam forgetful of Thee, while they hide themselves from Thy face, and become a darksome deep. But let Thy ministers work even as on the dry land, separated from the whirlpools of the great deep; and let them be an example unto the faithful, by living before them, and by stimulating them to imitation. For thus do men hear not with an intent to hear merely, but to act also.

Seek the Lord, and your soul shall live, that the earth may bring forth the living soul. "Be not conformed to this world." Eestrain yourselves from it; the soul lives by avoiding those things which it dies by affecting. Eestrain yourselves from the unbridled wildness of pride, from the indolent voluptuousness of luxury, and from the false name of means Christ, in accordance with the well-known acrostic of IX6T2. " If," he says in his De Civ. Dei, xviii. 23, "you join the initial letters of these five Greek words, 'Introvs Xpirros Qtou Ties itrhp, which mean, ' Jesus Christ the Son of God, the Saviour,' they will make the word Sx^Ss that is, 'fish,' in which word Christ is mystically understood, because He was able to live, that is, to exist without sin in the abyss of this mortality as in the depth of waters." So likewise we find Tertullian saying in his De Bapt. ch. i.: " Nos pisciculi, secundum IX6TN nostrum Jesum Christum in aqua nascimur; nee alter quam in aqua permanendo salvi sumus." See Bishop Ivaye's Tertullian, pp. 43, 44, and sec. 34, below.

knowledge j 1 so that wild beasts may be tamed, the cattle subdued, and serpents harmless. For these are the motions of the mind in allegory; that is to say, the haughtiness of pride, the delight of lust, and the poison of curiosity are the motions of the dead soul; for the soul dies not so as to lose all motion, because it dies by forsaking the fountain of life, and so is received by this transitory world, and is conformed unto it.

31. But Thy Word, God, is the fountain of eternal life, and passeth not away; therefore this departure is kept in check by Thy word when it is said unto us, " Be not conformed unto this world," so that the earth may bring forth a living soul in the fountain of life, a soul restrained in Thy Word, by Thy Evangelists, by imitating the followers of Thy Christ. For this is after his kind; because a man is stimulated to emulation by his friend. 5 " Be ye," saith he, " as I am, for I am as you are." 6 Thus in the living soul shall there be good beasts, in gentleness of action. For Thou hast commanded, saying, Go on with thy business in meekness, and thou shalt be beloved by all men; 7 and good cattle, which neither if they eat, shall they over-abound, nor if they do not eat, have they any want; 8 and good serpents, not destructive to do hurt, but " wise " 9 to take heed; and exploring only so much of this temporal nature as is sufficient that eternity may be " clearly seen, being understood by the things that are." 10 For these animals are subservient to reason, 11 when, being kept in check from a deadly advance, they live, and are good.

which we died by living ill. and began to be a " living soul "
by living well;* and Thy word which Thou spakest by Thy apostle is made good in us, "
Be not conformed to this world;"
next also follows that which Thou presently subjoinedst, saying, " But be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind," 2 not now after your kind, as if following your neighbour who went before you, nor as if living after the example of a better man (for Thou hast not said, " Let man be made after his kind," but, " Let us make man in our image, after our likeness "), 3 that we may prove what Thy will is. For to this purpose said that dispenser of Thine, begetting children by the gospel, 4 that he might not always have them " babes," whom he would feed on milk, and cherish as a nurse; 6 " be ye transformed," saith He, "
by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." 6 Therefore Thou sayest not, " Let man be made," but, " Let us make man." Nor sayest Thou, " after his kind," but, after "our image" and "likeness." Because, being renewed in his mind, and beholding and apprehending Thy truth, man needeth not man as his director 7 that he may imitate his kind; but by Thy direction proveth what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of Thine. And Thou teachest him, now made capable, to perceive the Trinity of the Unity, and the Unity of the Trinity. And therefore this being said in the plural, " Let us make man," it is yet subjoined in the singular, "and God made man;" and this being said in the plural, " after our likeness," is subjoined in the singular, " after the image of God." 8 Thus is man renewed in the knowledge of God, after the image of Him that created him; 9 and being made spiritual, he judgeth all things, all things that are to be judged, " yet he himself is judged of no man." 10

Chap xxiii. That to have power over all things (ver. 26) is to judge spiritually of all.

33. But that he judgeth all things answers to his having dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over all cattle and wild beasts, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth: For this he doth by the discernment of his mind, whereby he perceiveth the things " of the Spirit of God;" * whereas, otherwise, man being placed in honour, had no understanding, and is compared unto the brute beasts, and is become like unto them. 2 In Thy Church, therefore, our God, according to Thy grace which Thou hast accorded unto it, since we are Thy workmanship created in good works, 3 there are not only those who are spiritually set over, but those also who are spiritually subjected to those placed over them; for in this manner hast Thou made man, male and female, 4 in Thy grace spiritual, where, according to the sex of body, there is not male and female, because neither Jew nor Greek, nor bond nor free. 6 Spiritual persons, therefore, whether those that are set over, or those who obey, judge spiritually; not of that spiritual knowledge which shines in the firmament, for they ought not to judge as to an authority so sublime, nor doth it behove them to judge of Thy Book.
itself, although there be something that is not clear therein; because we submit our understanding unto it, and esteem as certain that even that which is shut up from our sight is rightly and truly spoken. 6 For

6 In his De Civ. Dei, xi. 3, he defines very distinctly (as he does in other of his writings) the knowledge received "by sight" that is, by experience, as distinguished from that which is received "by faith" that is, by revelation (2 Cor. v. 7). He, in common with all the Fathers who had knowledge of the Pagan philosophy, would feel how utterly that philosophy had failed to "find out" (Job xi. 7) with certitude anything as to God and His character, the Creation of the world, the Atonement wrought by Christ, the doctrine of the Resurrection, as distinguished from the Immortality of the Soul, our Immortal Destiny after death, or "the Restitution of all things." As to the knowledge of God, see Justin Martyr's experience in the schools of philosophy, Dialogue with Trypho, ch. ii.; and on the doctrine of Creation, see p. 295, note. On the "Restitution of all things," etc., reference may be made to Hansel's Gnostics, who points

thus man, although now spiritual and renewed in the knowledge of God after His image that created him, ought yet to be the "doer of the law, not the judge." * Neither doth he judge of that distinction of spiritual and carnal men, who are known to Thine eyes, O our God, and have not as yet made themselves manifest unto us by works, that by their fruits we may know them; 2 but Thou, O Lord, dost already know them, and Thou hast divided and hast called them in secret before the firmament was made. Nor doth that man, though spiritual, judge the restless people of this world; for what hath he to do to judge them that are without, 3 knowing not which of them may afterwards come into the sweetness of Thy grace, and which continue in the perpetual bitterness of impiety?

34. Man, therefore, whom Thou hast made after Thine own image, received not dominion over the lights of heaven, nor over the hidden heaven itself, nor over the day and the night, which Thou didst call before the foundation of the heaven, nor over the gathering together of the waters, which is the sea; but he received dominion over the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the air, and over all cattle, and over all creeping things which creep upon the earth. For He judgeth and approveth what He findeth right, but disapproved what He findeth amiss, whether in the celebration of those sacraments by which are initiated those whom Thy mercy searches out in many waters; or in that in which the Fish 4 Itself is exhibited, which, being raised from the deep, the devout earth feedeth upon; or in the signs and expressions of words, subject to the authority of Thy Book, such signs as

out (Introd. p. 3) that "in the Greek philosophical systems the idea of evil holds a very subordinate and insignificant place, and that the idea of redemption seems not to be recognised at all." He shows further (ibid. p. 4), that "there is no idea of the delivery of the creature from the bondage of corruption. The great year of the Stoics, the commencement of the new cycle which takes its place after the destruction of the old world, is but a repetition of the old evil." See also p. 291, note, above.

blessing, calling upon Thee, so that the people may answer, Amen. The vocal pronunciation of all which words is caused by the deep of this world, and the blindness of the flesh, by which thoughts cannot be seen, so that it is necessary to speak aloud in the ears; thus, although flying fowls be multiplied upon the earth, yet they derive their beginning from the waters. The spiritual man judgeth also by approving what is right and reproving what he finds amiss in the works and morals of the faithful, in their alms, as if in "the earth bringing forth fruit;" and he judgeth of the "living soul," rendered living by softened affections, in chastity, in fastings, in pious thoughts; and of those things which are perceived through the senses of the body. For it is now said, that he should judge concerning those things in which he has also the power of correction.

Chap. xxiv. Why God has blessed men, fishes, flying creatures, and not herbs and the other animals (ver. 28).

35. But what is this, and what kind of mystery is it ? Behold, Thou blessest men, Lord, that they may "be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth;" 1 in this dost Thou not make a sign unto us that we may understand something? Why hast Thou not also blessed the light, which Thou calledest day, nor the firmament of heaven, nor the lights, nor the stars, nor the earth, nor the sea? I might say, O our God, that Thou, who hast created us after Thine Image, I might say, that Thou hast willed to bestow this gift of blessing especially upon man, hadst Thou not in like manner blessed the fishes and the whales, that they should be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the waters of the sea, and that the fowls should be multiplied upon the earth. Likewise might
I say, that this blessing belonged properly unto such creatures as are propagated from their own kind, if I had found it in the shrubs, and the fruit trees, and beasts of the earth. But now is it not said either unto the herbs, or trees, or beasts, or serpents, "Be fruitful and multiply;" since all these also, as well as fishes, and fowls, and men, do by propagation increase and preserve their kind.

382 CONFESSIONS OP ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK XIII.]

36. What, then, shall I say, Thou Truth, my Light, "that it was idly and vainly said?" Not so, O Father of piety; far be it from a minister of Thy word to say this. But if I understand not what Thou meanest by that phrase, let my betters that is, those more intelligent than I use it better, in proportion as Thou, my God, hast given to each to understand. But let my confession be also pleasing before Thine eyes, in which I confess to Thee that I believe, Lord, that Thou hast not thus spoken in vain; nor will I be silent as to what this lesson suggests to me. For it is true, nor do I see what should prevent me from thus understanding the figurative sayings 1 of Thy books. For I know a thing may be manifoldly signified by bodily expression which is understood in one manner by the mind; and that that may be manifoldly understood in the mind which is in one manner signified by bodily expression. Behold, the single love of God and of our neighbour, by what manifold sacraments and innumerable languages, and in each several language in how innumerable modes of speaking, it is bodily expressed. Thus do the young of the waters increase and multiply. Observe again, whosoever thou art who readest; behold what Scripture delivers, and the voice pronounces in one only way, "In the beginning God created heaven and earth;" is it not manifoldly understood, not by any deceit of error, but by divers kinds of true senses? 2 Thus are the offspring of men "fruitful" and do "multiply."

37. If, therefore, we conceive of the natures of things, not allegorically, but properly, then does the phrase, "be fruitful and multiply," correspond to all things which are begotten of seed. But if we treat those words as taken figuratively (the which I rather suppose the Scripture intended, which doth not, verily, superfluously attribute this benediction to the offspring of marine animals and man only), then do we find that "multitude" belongs also to creatures both spiritual and corporeal, as in heaven and in earth; and to souls both righteous and unrighteous, as in light and darkness; and to holy authors, through whom the law has been furnished unto us, as in the firmament which has been firmly placed betwixt waters and waters; and to the society of people yet endued with bitterness, as in the sea; and to the desire of holy souls, as in the dry land; and to works of mercy pertaining to this present life, as in the seed-bearing herbs and fruit-bearing trees; and to spiritual gifts shining forth for edification, as in the lights of heaven; and to affections formed unto temperance, as in the living soul. In all these cases we meet with multitudes, abundance, and increase; but what shall thus "be fruitful and multiply," that one thing may be expressed in many ways, and one expression understood in many ways, we discover not, unless in signs corporeally expressed, and in things mentally conceived. We understand the signs corporeally pronounced as the generations of the waters, necessarily occasioned by carnal depth; but things mentally conceived we understand as human generations, on account of the fruitfulness of reason. And therefore do we believe that to each kind of these it has been said by Thee, O Lord, "Be fruitful and multiply." For in this blessing I acknowledge that a power and faculty has been granted unto us, by Thee, both to express in many ways what we understand but in one, and to understand in many ways what we read as obscurely delivered but in one. Thus are the waters of the sea replenished, which are not moved but by various significations; thus even with the human offspring is the earth also replenished, the dryness whereof appeareth in its desire, and reason ruleth over it.

Chap. xxv. He explains the fruits of the earth (ver. 29) of works of mercy.

38. I would also say, Lord my God, what the following Scripture reminds me of; yea, I will say it without fear. For I will speak the truth, Thou inspiring me as to what Thou wiliest that I should say out of these words. For by none other than Thy inspiration do I believe that I can speak the truth, since Thou art the Truth, but every man a liar. 3 And therefore he that "speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own;" 4 therefore that I may speak the truth, I will speak of Thine.

Behold, Thou hast given unto us for food "every herb bearing seed" which is upon the face of all the earth, "and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed." 1 Nor to us only, but to all the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the earth, and to all creeping things; * but unto the fishes, and great whales, Thou hast not given these things.
Now we were saying, that by these fruits of the earth works of mercy were signified and figured in an allegory, the which are provided for the necessities of this life out of the fruitful earth. Such an earth was the godly Onesiphorus, unto whose house Thou didst give mercy, because he frequently refreshed Thy Paul, and was not ashamed of his chain. 3 This did also the brethren, and such fruit did they bear, who out of Macedonia supplied what was wanting unto him. 4 But how doth he grieve for certain trees, which did not afford him the fruit due unto him, when he saith, " At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men forsook me: I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge." 6 For these fruits are due to those who minister spiritual doctrine, through their understanding of the divine mysteries; and they are due to them as men. They are due to them, too, as to the living soul, supplying itself as an example in all continency; and due unto them likewise as flying creatures, for their blessings which are multiplied upon the earth, since their sound went out into all lands. 7

Chap. xxvi. In the confessing of benefits, computation is made not as to the "gift," but as to the "fruit," that is, the good and right will of the giver.

39. But they who are delighted with them are fed by those fruits; nor are they delighted with them " whose god is their belly." 8 For neither in those that yield them are the things given the fruit, but in what spirit they give them. Therefore he who serves God and not his own belly, 9 I plainly see why he may rejoice; I see it, and I rejoice with him exceedingly. For he hath received from the Philippians those things which they had sent from Epaphroditus, x but yet I see why he rejoiced. For whereat he rejoices, upon that he feeds; for speaking in truth, " I rejoiced," saith he, " in the Lord greatly, that now at the last your care of me hath flourished again, wherein ye were also careful," 2 but it had become wearisome unto you. These Philippians, then, by protracted wearisomeness, had become enfeebled, and as it were dried up, as to bringing forth this fruit of a good work; and he rejoiceth for them, because they flourished again, not for himself, because they ministered to his wants. Therefore, adds he, "not that I speak in respect of want, for I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound; everywhere and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." *

40. Whereat, then, dost thou rejoice in all things, great Paul ? Whereat dost thou rejoice ? Whereon dost thou feed, man, renewed in the knowledge of God, after the image of Him that created thee, thou living soul of so great continency, and thou tongue like flying fowls, speaking mysteries, for to such creatures is this food due, what is that which feeds thee ? Joy. Let us hear what follows. "Notwithstanding," saith he, "ye have well done that ye did communicate with my affliction." 4 Hereat doth he rejoice, hereon doth he feed; because they have well done, 6 not because his strait was relieved, who saith unto thee, "Thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress;" 6 because he knew both "to abound and to suffer need," 7 in Thee Who strengthenest him. For, saith he, "ye Philippians know also that in the beginning of the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no Church communicatecl with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only. For even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my necessity." 1 Unto these good works he now rejoiceth that they have returned; and is made glad that they flourished again, as when a fruitful field recovers its greenness.

41. "Was it on account of his own necessities that he said, " Ye have sent unto my necessity " ? Bejoiceth he for that ? Verily not for that. But whence know we this ? Because he himself continues, "Not because I desire a gift, but I desire fruit." 2 From Thee, O my God, have I learned to distinguish between a "gift" and "fruit." A gift is the thing itself which he gives who bestows these necessaries, as money, food, drink, clothing, shelter, aid; but the fruit is the good and right will of the giver. For the good Master saith not only, " He that receiveth a prophet," but addeth, " in the name of a prophet." Nor saith He only, " He that receiveth a righteous man," but addeth, " in the name of a righteous man."

So, verily, the former shall receive the reward of a prophet, the latter that of a righteous man. Nor saith He only,

" Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water," but addeth, "in the name of a disciple;"

and so conclueth, " Verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward." 8 The gift is to receive a prophet, to receive a righteous man, to hand a cup of cold water to a disciple; but the fruit is to do this in the name of a prophet, in the name of a righteous man, in the name of a disciple. With fruit was Elijah fed by the widow, who knew that she fed a man of God, and on this account fed him; but by the raven was he fed with a gift. Nor was the inner man 4 of Elijah fed, but the outer only, which might also from want of such food have perished.

Chap, xxvii. Many are ignorant as to this, and ask for miracles, which are signified under the names of "fishes " and "whales."

42. Therefore will I speak before Thee, Lord, what is true, when ignorant men and infidels (for the initiating and gaining of whom the sacraments of initiation and great works of miracles are necessary/ which we believe to be signified under the name of " fishes" and " whales") undertake that Thy servants should be bodily refreshed, or should be otherwise succoured for this present life, although they may be ignorant wherefore this is to be done, and to what end; neither do the former feed the latter, nor the latter the former; for neither do the one perform these things through a holy and right intent, nor do the other rejoice in the gifts of those who behold not as yet the fruit. For on that is the mind fed wherein it is gladdened. And, therefore, fishes and whales are not fed on such food as the earth bringeth not forth until it had been separated and divided from the bitterness of the waters of the sea.

Chap, xxviii. He proceeds to the last verse, "All things are very good," that is, the work being altogether good.

43. And Thou, O God, sawest everything that Thou hadst made, and behold it was very good. 2 So we also see the same, and behold all are very good. In each particular kind of Thy works, when Thou hadst said, " Let them be made," and they were made, Thou sawest that it was good. Seven times have I counted it written that Thou sawest that that which Thou madest was "good;" and this is the eighth, that Thou sawest all things that Thou hadst made, and behold they are not only good, but also "very good," as being now taken together. For individually they were only good, but all taken together they were both good and very good. All beautiful bodies also express this; for a body which consists of members, all of which are beautiful, is by far more beautiful than the several members individually are by whose well ordered union the whole is completed, though these members also be severally beautiful. 3

1 We have already referred (p. 59, note, above) to the cessation of miracles. Augustine has a beautiful passage in Serm. ccxliv. 8, on the evidence which we have in the spread of Christianity it doing for us what miracles did for the early Church. Compare also Be Civ. Dei, xxii. 8. And he frequently alludes, as, for example, in Ps. cxxx., to "charity" being more desirable than the power of working miracles.

2 Gen. i. 31.

3 In his De Gen. con. Munich, i. 21, he enlarges to the same effect on Gen. i. 31

388 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK XII

Chap. xxix. Although it is said eight times that "God saw that it was good," yet time has no relation to God and His Word.

44. And I looked attentively to find whether seven 01 eight times Thou sawest that Thy works were good, when they were pleasing nto Thee; but in Thy seeing I found no times, by which I might understand that Thou sawest so often what Thou madest. And I said, "Lord, is not this Thy Scripture true, since Thou art true, and being Truth hast set it forth? Why, then, dost Thou say unto me that in Thy seeing there are no times, while this Thy Scripture telleth me that what Thou madest each day, Thou sawest to be good; and when I counted them I found how often? " Unto these things Thou repliest unto me, for Thou art my God, and with strong voice tellest unto Thy servant in his inner ear, bursting through my deafness, and crying, "man, that which My Scripture saith, I say; and yet doth that speak in time; but time has no reference to My Word, because My Word existeth in equal eternity with Myself. Thus those things which ye see through My Spirit, I see, just as those things which ye speak through My Spirit, I speak. And so when ye see those things in time, I see them not in time; as when ye speak them in time, I speak them not in time."

Chap. xxx. He refutes the opinions of the Manichozans and the Gnostics concerning tlv origin of the world.
45. And I heard, Lord my God, and drank up a drop of sweetness from Thy truth, and understood that there are certain men to whom Thy works are displeasing, who say that many of them Thou madest being compelled by necessity; such as the fabric of the heavens and the courses of the stars, and that Thou madest them not of what was Thine, but, that they were elsewhere and from other sources created; that Thou mightest bring together and compact and interweave, when from Thy conquered enemies Thou raisedst up the walls of the universe, that they, bound down by this structure, might not be able a second time to rebel against Thee. But, as to other things, they say Thou neither madest them nor compactest them, such as all flesh and all very minute creatures, and whatsoever holdeth the earth by its roots; but that a mind hostile unto Thee, and another nature not created by Thee, and in everywise contrary unto Thee, did, in these lower places of the world, beget and frame these things. 1 Infatuated are they who speak thus, since they see not Thy works through Thy Spirit, nor recogniseth Thee in them.

Chap. xxxi. We do not see "that it was good" but through the Spirit of God, which is in us.

46. But as for those who through Thy Spirit see these things, Thou seest in them. When, therefore, they see that these things are good, Thou seest that they are good; and whatsoever things for Thy sake are pleasing, Thou art pleased in them; and those things which through Thy Spirit are pleasing unto us, are pleasing unto Thee in us. "For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we, saith he, " have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God." 2 And I am reminded to say, "Truly, 'the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God;' how, then, do we also know 'what things are given us by God?'" It is answered unto me, "Because the things which we know by His Spirit, even these 'knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God.' For, as it is rightly said unto those who were to speak by the Spirit of God, 'It is not ye that speak,' 3 so is it rightly said to them who know by the Spirit of God, 'It is not ye that know.' None the less, then, is it rightly said to those that see by the Spirit of God, 'It is not ye that see;' so whatever they see by the Spirit of God that it is good, it is not they, but God who 'sees that it is good.' " It is one thing, then, for a man to suppose that to be bad which is good, as the fore-named do; another, that what is good a man should see to be good (as Thy creatures are pleasing unto many, because they are good, whom, however, Thou pleasest not in them when they wish to enjoy them rather than enjoy Thee); and another, that when a man sees a thing to be good, God should in him see that it is good, that in truth He may be loved in that which He made, who cannot be loved unless by the Holy Ghost, which He hath given. " Because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us;" 2 by whom we see that whatsoever in any degree is, is good. Chap, xxxii. Of the particular works of God, more especially of man.

47. Thanks to Thee, O Lord. We behold the heaven and the earth, whether the corporeal part, superior and inferior, or the spiritual and corporeal creature; and in the embellishment of these parts, whereof the universal mass of the world or the universal creation consisteth, we see light made, and divided from the darkness. We see the firmament of heaven, whether the primary body of the world between the spiritual upper waters and the corporeal lower waters, or because this also is called heaven this expanse of air, through which wander the fowls of heaven, between the waters which are in vapours borne above them, and which in clear nights drop down in dew, and those which being heavy flow along the earth. We behold the waters gathered together through the plains of the sea; and the dry land both void and formed, so as to be visible and compact, and the matter of herbs and trees. We behold the lights shining from above, the sun to serve the day, the moon and the stars to cheer the night; and that by all these, times should be marked and noted. We behold on every side a humid element, fruitful with fishes, beasts, and birds; because the density of the air, which bears up the flights of birds, is increased by the exhalation of the waters. 4 We behold the face of the earth furnished with terrestrial creatures, and man, created after Thy image and likeness, in that very image and likeness of Thee (that is, the power of reason and understanding) on account of which he was set over all irrational creatures. And as in his soul there is one power which rules by directing, another made subject that it might obey, so also for the man was corporeally made a woman, 1 who, in the mind of her rational understanding should also have a like nature, in the sex, however, of her body should be in like manner subject to the sex of her husband, as the appetite of action is subjected by reason of the mind, to conceive the skill of acting rightly.

These things we behold, and they are severally good, and all very good.

Chap, xxxiii. The world was created by God out of nothing.

48. Let Thy works praise Thee, that we may love Thee; and let us love Thee, that Thy works may praise Thee, the which have beginning and end from time, rising and setting, growth and decay, form and privation. They have therefore their successions of morning and evening, partly hidden, partly apparent; for they were made from nothing by Thee, not of Thee, nor of any matter not Thine, or which was created before, but of con created matter (that is, matter at the same time created by Thee"), because without any interval of time Thou didst form its formlessness. 2 For since the matter of heaven and earth is one thing, and the form of heaven and earth another, Thou hast made the matter indeed of almost: nothing, but the form of the world Thou hast formed of i formless matter; both, however, at the same time, so that the form should follow the matter with no interval of I delay.

1 " 'Concipiendam,' or the reading may be 'concupiscendam,' according to St. Augustine's interpretation of Gen. iii. 16, in the De Gen. con. Manich. ii. 15. 'As an instance hereof was woman made, who is in the order of things made subject to the man; that what appears more evidently in two human beings, the man and the woman, may be contemplated in the one, man; viz. that the inward man, as it were manly reason, should have in subjection the appetite of the soul, whereby we act through the bodily members.' 392 CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. [BOOK XIII.]

Chap, xxxiv. He briefly repeats the allegorical interpretation of Genesis (ch. i.), and confesses that to see it by the Divine Spirit.

49. We have also examined what Thou willedst to be shadowed forth, whether by the creation, or the description of things in such an order. And we have seen that things severally are good, and all things very good, 1 in Thy Word, in Thine Only- Begotten, both heaven and earth, the Head and the body of the Church, in Thy predestination before all times, without morning and evening. But when Thou didst begin to execute in time the things predestinated, that Thou mightest make manifest things hidden, and adjust our disorders (for our sins were over us, and we had sunk into profound darkness away from Thee, and Thy good Spirit was borne over us to help us in due season), Thou didst both justify the ungodly, 2 and didst divide them from the wicked; and madest firm the authority of Thy Book between those above, who would be docile unto Thee, and those under, who would be subject unto them; and Thou didst collect the society of unbelievers into one conspiracy, in order that the zeal of the faithful might appear, and that they might bring forth works of mercy unto Thee, even distributing unto the poor earthly riches, to obtain heavenly. And after this didst Thou kindle certain lights in the firmament, Thy holy ones, having the word of life, and shining with an eminent authority preferred by spiritual gifts; and then again, for the instruction of the unbelieving Gentiles, didst Thou out of corporeal matter produce the sacraments and visible miracles, and sounds of words according to the firmament of Thy Book, by which the faithful should be blessed. Next didst Thou form the living soul of the faithful, through affections ordered by the vigour of continency; and afterwards, the mind subjected to Thee alone, and needing to imitate no human authority, 3 Thou didst renew after Thine image and likeness; and didst subject its rational action to the excellency of the understanding, as the woman to the man; and to all Thy ministries, necessary for the perfecting of the faithful in this life, Thou didst will that, for their temporal uses, good 1 Gen. i. 8.1. 8 Rom. iv. 5. 3 See p. 294, note, above.

things, fruitful in the future time, should be given by the same faithful. 1 We behold all these things, and they are very good, because Thou dost see them in us, Thou who hast given unto us Thy Spirit, whereby we might see them, and in them love Thee.

Chap. xxxv. He prays God for that peace of rest which hath no evening.

50. Lord God, grant Thy peace unto us, for Thou hast supplied us with all things, the peace of rest, the peace of the Sabbath, which hath no evening. For all this most beautiful order of things, "very good" (all their courses being finished), is to pass away, for in them there was morning and evening.

Chap. xxxv. The seventh day, without evening and setting, the image of eternal life and rest in God.

51. But the seventh day is without any evening, nor hath it any setting, because Thou hast sanctified it to an everlasting continuance; that that which Thou didst after Thy works, which were very good, resting on the seventh day, although in unbroken rest Thou madest them, that the voice of Thy Book may speak beforehand unto us, that we also after our works (therefore very good, because Thou hast given them unto us) may repose in Thee also in the Sabbath of eternal life.

Chap, xxxvii. Of rest in God, who ever worketh, and yet is ever at rest.

52. For even then shalt Thou so rest in us, as now Thou dost work in us; and thus shall that be Thy rest through us, as these are Thy works through us. 2 But Thou, Lord,

"The peace of heaven," says Augustine in his De Civ. Dei, xix. 17, "alone can be truly called and esteemed the peace of the reasonable creatures, consisting as it does in the perfectly ordered and harmonious enjoyment of God, and of one another in God. When we shall have reached that peace, this mortal life shall give place to one that is eternal, and our body shall be no more this animal body which by its corruption weighs down the soul, but a spiritual body feeling no want, and in all its members subjected to the will." See p. 163, note 4 (end), above.

2 Compare his De Gen. ad Lit. iv. 9: " For as God is properly said to do what we do when He works in us, so is God properly said to rest when by His gift we rest."

ever workest, and art ever at rest. Nor seest Thou in time, nor movest Thou in time, nor restest Thou in time; and yet Thou makest the scenes of time, and the times themselves, and the rest which results from time.

Chap, xxxviii. Of the difference between the knowledge of God and of men, and of the repose which is to be sought from God only.

53. We therefore see those things which Thou madest; because they are; but they are because Thou seest them. And we see without that they are, and within that they are good, but Thou didst see them there, when made, where Thou didst see them to be made. And we were at another time moved to do well, after our hearts had conceived of Thy Spirit; but in the former time, forsaking Thee, we were moved to do evil; but Thou, the One, the Good God, hast never ceased to do good. And we also have certain good works, of Thy gift, but not eternal; after these we hope to rest in Thy great hallowing. But Thou, being the Good, needing no good, art ever at rest, because Thou Thyself art Thy rest. And what man will teach man to understand this? Or what angel, an angel? Or what angel, a man? Let it be asked of Thee, sought in Thee, knocked for at Thee; so, even so shall it be received, so shall it be found, so shall it be opened. 1

Amen.

DE GRATIA ET LIBERO ARBITRIO:

A TREATISE ON GRACE AND FREE-WILL.
By AUELLIUS AUGUSTINE, Bishop of Hippo;

ADDRESS TO VALENTINUS AND THE MONKS OF ADRUMETUM,

AND COMPLETED IN "ONE BOOK:

WRITTEN IN A.D. 426 OR A.D. 427.

Extract from "The Retractations" Book II. chap. 66, respecting this Treatise.

There are some persons who suppose that the freedom of the will is denied whenever God's grace is maintained, and who on their side defend their liberty of will so peremptorily as to deny the grace of God. This grace, as they assert, is bestowed according to our own merits. It is in consequence of their opinions that I wrote the book entitled De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio. This work I addressed to the monks of Adrumetum, in whose monastery first arose the controversy.

Adrumetum, a maritime city of Africa, was the metropolis of the Province of Byzacium, as Procopius informs us, De Aedificiis Justiniani vi. It was in a monastery here that the monks resided for whose instruction Augustine composed the two following treatises, the former entitled De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio, and the latter De Correreptione et Gratia, in the year of Christ 426 or 427. In our opinion, no later date can be well assigned to these writings, inasmuch as they are mentioned in The Retractations, which was published about the year 427; nor can they be placed earlier in date, because they are in that work mentioned the very last.

on that subject, and that in such a manner that some of them were obliged to consult me thereon. The work begins with these words: "Propter cos qui librum hominis arbitrium sic frcedicant" ["With reference to those persons who preach up the liberty of the human will "].
TWO LETTERS

WRITTEN BY

AUGUSTINE TO VALENTINUS
AXD THE MONKS OF ADRUMETUM; AND FOEWAEDED ' WITH THE FOLLOWING TEEATISE.

LET TEE L

[The 214th of Augustine's Epistles.]

TO MY VERY DEAR LORD AND BROTHER VALENTINUS, WORTHY OP ALL HONOUR
AMONG THE MEMBERS OF CHRIST, AND TO THE BRETHREN THAT ARE WITH YOU, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

1. r 1 1 wo young men, Cresconius and Felix, have found their _L way to us and introduced themselves as belonging to your brotherhood. They told us that your monastery was disturbed with no small commotion, because certain amongst you preach up Grace in such a manner as to deny that the will of man is free; and maintain â€” a more serious matter â€” that in the day of judgment God will not render to every man according to his works. At the same time, they pointed out to us, that several of you do not entertain this opinion, but allow that the free-will of man is assisted by the grace of God, so as to enable us to think and to do aright; so that, when the Lord shall come to render unto every man according to his works,^ He shall find those works of ours good which God has prepared for us to walk in.^ They who think this think rightly.

' See the Second Letter, chap. ii.

4 A TREATISE ON GRACE AND FREE-WILL. [LET. I.
2. "I therefore beseech you, brethren," even as the apostle besought the Corinthians, "by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you." For, in the first place, the Lord Jesus, as it is written in the Gospel of the Apostle John, "came not to condemn the world, but that the world by Himself might be saved." Then, afterwards, as the Apostle Paul writes, "God shall judge the world when He shall come," as the whole Church confesses in the Creed, "to judge the quick and the dead." Now, I would ask, if there is no grace of God, how does He save the world? and if there is no freewill, how does He judge the world?

That book of mine, therefore, or epistle, which the above-mentioned brethren have brought with them to you, I wish you to understand in accordance with this faith, so that you may neither deny God's grace, nor uphold freewill in such wise as to separate the latter from the grace of God, as if without it we could by any means either think or do anything in God's way, an achievement which is quite beyond our power. On this account, indeed, it is, that the Lord when speaking of the fruits of righteousness said, "Without me ye can do nothing."

3. From this you may understand why I wrote the letter which has been referred to,* to Sixtus, presbyter of the Church at Rome, against the new set of Pelagian heretics, who say that the grace of God is bestowed according to our own merits, so that he who glories has to glory not in the Lord, but in himself, that is to say, in man, not in the Lord.

This, however, the apostle forbids in these words: "Let no man glory in man;" while in another passage he says, "He that glorieth let him glory in the Lord." But these heretics, under the idea that they are justified by their own selves, just as if God did not bestow on them this gift, but they themselves obtained it by themselves, consistently enough glory in themselves, and not in the Lord. Now, the apostle asks the question, "Who maketh thee to differ from another?" and this he does on the ground that out of the mass of perdition which arose from Adam, none but God puts any difference on a human being to make him a vessel to honour, and not to dishonour.^ Lest, however, the carnal: man in his foolish pride should, on hearing the question, "Who maketh thee to differ from another?" either in thought or in word answer and say: My faith, or my prayer, or my righteousness causes me to differ from other men, the apostle at once adds these words to his question, and so meets all such notions of the carnal man, saying, "What hast thou that thou didst not receive? now, if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou didst not receive it?"^ Now, they boast as if they did not receive their gifts by grace, who think that they are justified of their own selves, and who, on this account, glory in themselves, and not in the Lord.

4. There are within us either good or evil deserts. Therefore I have in this letter, which now reaches you, shown by passages of Holy Scripture, which you can examine for yourselves, that our good works and pious prayers and a right faith could not possibly have been developed in us unless we had received them all from Him, concerning whom the Apostle James says, "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights." And no man can say that it is by the merit of his own works, or owing to his own prayers, or by virtue of his own faith, that God's grace has been conferred upon him; nor suppose that the doctrine is true which those heretics hold, that the grace of God is given us in proportion to our own deservings. This is altogether a most erroneous opinion; not, indeed, because there is no good desert in pious persons, or evil in impious ones (for how else shall God judge the world?)* but because a man is converted by that mercy and grace of God, of which the Psalmist says, "As for my God, His mercy shall prevent me;" so that the unrighteous man is justified, that is, becomes just instead of righteous, and begins to possess that good desert which God will crown when the world shall be judged.

5. There was a good deal of information which I wanted to send you, by the perusal whereof you would have been able to gain a more exact and plenary knowledge of what has been done by the bishops in their councils against these Pelagian heretics. But the brethren were in haste who came to us from your company. By them we have sent you this letter; which is, however, not an answer to any commimication, because, in truth, they brought us no epistle from your beloved selves. Yet we had no hesitation in receiving them; for their simple manners proved to us clearly enough that there could have been nothing unreal or deceptive in their visit to us. They were, however, in much haste, as wishing to spend Easter at home with you; and my earnest prayer is, that so sacred a day may, by the Lord's help, bring peace to you, and not dissension.

6. You will, indeed, take the better course (as I earnestly request you), if you will not refuse to send to me the very person by whom they say they have been disturbed. For [one of two things has probably happened] either he does not understand my book, or else, perhaps, he is himself misunderstood, when he endeavours to solve and explain a question which is a very difficult one, and intelligible to few. For it is none other than the question of God's grace which has caused persons of no understanding to think that the Apostle Paul prescribes it to us as a rule, "Let us do evil that good may come." It is in reference to these that the Apostle Peter writes in his second Epistle: "Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless: and account that the longsuffering of our Lord is salvation; even as our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you; as also in all his epistles, speaking in them in these things; in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction."

7. Take good heed, then, to these fearful words of the great apostle; and when you feel it, then put your faith in the inspired word of God, and believe both that man's will is free, and that there is also God's grace, without whose help man's free-will can neither be turned towards God, nor make any progress in God. And what you piously believe, that pray that you may have a wise understanding of. And, indeed, it is for this very purpose, that is, that we may have a wise understanding, that we are endowed with a freedom of will. For if we had not a perfect liberty in understanding and exercising wisdom, it would not be enjoined to us in the words of Scripture, "Understand now, ye simple among the people; and ye fools, at length be wise." The very precept and injunction which calls on us to be intelligent and wise, requires also our obedience; and without could exercise no obedience without liberty of will. If, indeed, it were in our power to obey this precept to be understanding and wise by our free choice merely, without the help of God's grace, it would be unnecessary to say to God, "Give me understanding, that I may learn Thy commandments;" nor should it have been written in the gospel, "Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures;" nor should the Apostle James address us in such words as, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." But the Lord is able to grant, both to you and to us, that we may rejoice over very speedy tidings of your peace and pious unanimity. I send you greeting, not in my own name only, but of the brethren also who are with me; and I ask you to pray for us with one accord and with all earnestness. The Lord be with you.

LETTEE II

[The 215th of Augustine's Epistles.]
TO MY VERT DEAR LORD AND BROTHER VALENTINUS, WORTHY OF ALL HONOUR AMONG THE MEMBERS OF CHRIST, AND TO THE BRETHREN THAT ARE WITH YOU, AUGUSTINE SENDS GREETING IN THE LORD.

detained them somewhat longer in order that they might return to you better instructed against the new set of Pelagian heretics, into whose error every one falls who supposes that it is in proportion to any human merits that the grace of God is given to us, which alone delivers a man through Jesus Christ our Lord. But he, too, is in no less error who thinks that, when the Lord shall come to judgment, a man is not judged according to his works who has been able to use throughout his life perfect freedom of will. For only infants, who have not yet done any works of their own, either good or bad, will be condemned for original sin alone, when they have not been delivered by the Saviour's grace in the laver of regeneration. As for all others who, in the use of their free will, have added to the sin of their birth sins of their own commission, but who have not been delivered by God's grace from the power of darkness, and removed into the kingdom of Christ, will receive judgment according to the deserts not of their original sin only, but also of the acts of their own will and choice.
The good, indeed, shall receive their reward according to the merits of their own good-wiU, but then they received this very good- will through the grace of God; and thus is accomplished that sentence of Scripture, " Indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile: but glory, honour, and peace to every man that worketh good; to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile."^

2. Touching the very difficult question of free-will and grace, I felt no need of treating it further in this letter, having given them another letter also when they were about to return in greater haste. I w rote a book likewise for you,^ and if you, by the Lord's help, read it, and have a lively understanding of it, I think that no further dissension on this subject will arise among you. They take with them other documents besides, which, as we supposed, ought to be directed to you, in order that from these you may ascertain what means the Catholic Church has adopted for repelling, in God's mercy, the poisonous principles of the Pelagian heresy. Now, our letter to Pope Innocent, Bishop of Rome, on the Council of the province of Carthage, and on the Council of Numidia, and one held with exceeding care by the five bishops, and his rescripts to these three; our letter also to Pope Zosimus about the African Council, and his rescript addressed to all bishops throughout the world; and a brief constitution, which we drew up against the error itself for a later plenary Council of all Africa; and the above-mentioned book of mine, which I have just written for you, “all these we have both read over with them, while they were with us, and have now despatched by their hands to you.”

3. Furthermore, we have read to them the work of the most blessed martyr Cyprian on the Lord’s Prayer, and have pointed out to them how He taught that all things pertaining to our morals, which constitute right living, must be sought from our Father which is in heaven, lest, by presuming on our liberty of will, we fall from divine grace. From the same treatise we have also shown them how the same glorious martyr has taught us that it behoves us to pray even for our enemies, who have not yet believed in Christ, that they may believe; which would of course be all in vain unless the Church believed that even the evil and unbelieving wills of men might, by the grace of God, be converted to good. This book of St. Cyprian, however, we have not sent you, because they told us that you possessed it among yourselves already.

My letter, also, which had been sent to Sixtus, presbyter of the Church at Rome, and which they brought with them to us, we read over with them, and pointed out how that it had been written in opposition to those who say that God’s grace is bestowed according to our merits, “all that is to say, in opposition to the same Pelagians.”

4. As far, then, as lay in our power, we have used our influence with them, as both your brethren and our own, with a view to their persevering in the soundness of the Catholic faith, which neither denies our liberty of will whether to choose an evil or a good life, nor attributes to it so much power that it can avail anything without God's grace, or that it can change itself from evil to good, or persevere in the pursuit of good, or attain to eternal good with no further fear of failure. To yourselves, too, my most dearly beloved, I, even in this letter, give the same exhortation which the apostle addresses to us.

all, " not to think of yourselves more higlily than you ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith." ^

5. Mark well the counsel which the Holy Ghost gives us by Solomon: " Make straight paths for thy feet, and order thy ways aright. Turn not aside to the right hand nor to the left, but turn away thy foot from the evil way; for the Lord knoweth the ways on the right hand, but those on the left are perverse. He will make thy ways straight, and will direct thy steps in peace." ^ Now consider, my brethren, that in these words of Holy Scripture, if the will were not free to choose, it would not be said, " Make straight paths for thy feet, and order thy ways; turn not aside to the right hand, nor to the left." Nor yet, were this possible for us to achieve without the grace of God, would it be afterwards added, " He will make thy ways straight, and will direct thy steps in peace."

6. Decline, therefore, neither to the right hand nor to the left, although the paths on the right hand are praised, and those on the left hand are blamed. This is why he added, " Turn away thy foot from the evil way," â€” that is, from the left-hand path. This he makes manifest in the following words, saying, " For the Lord knoweth the ways on the right hand; but those on the left are perverse." In those ways we ought surely to walk which the Lord knows; and it is of these that we read in the Psalm, " The Lord knoweth the way of the righteous, but the way of the ungodly shall perish;" ^ for this way, which is on the left hand, the Lord does not know.
As He will also say at last to such as are placed on His left hand at the day of judgment:
"I know you not." ^ Now what is that which He knows not, who knows all things, both good and evil, in man? But what is the meaning of the words, " I know you not," unless it be that you are now such as I never made you? Precisely as that passage runs, which is spoken of the Lord Jesus Christ, that "He knew no sin." ^

' Kom. xii. 3. 2 prov. iv. 26, 27 {Sept.). 3 pg. j. g.
* Matt. vii. 23. ^ 2 Cor. y. 21.

LET. II. | OUR OWN WILL INSUFFICIENT. 11

How knew it not, except that He had never made it? And, therefore, how is to be understood the passage, " The ways which are on the right hand the Lord knoweth," except in the sense that He made those ways Himself, â€” even " the paths of the righteous," which no doubt are " those good works that God," as the apostle tells us, "hath before ordained that we should walk in them" ^ Whereas the left-hand ways â€” those perverse paths of the unrighteous â€” He truly knows nothing of, because He never made them for man, but man made them for himself. Wherefore He says, " The perverse ways of the wicked I utterly abhor; they are on the left hand."

7. But this is the answer we get: Why did He say, " Turn not aside to the right hand, nor to the left," when he clearly ought rather to have said. Keep to the right hand, and turn not off to the left, if the right-hand paths are good? On what principle do we think so, except this, that the paths on the right hand are so good that it is not good to turn off from them, even to the right? For that man, indeed, is to be understood as declining to the right who chooses to attribute to himself, and not to God, even those good works which appertain to right-hand ways. Hence it was that after saying, "For the Lord knoweth the ways on the right hand, but those on the left hand are perverse" (as if the objection were raised to Him, Wherefore, then, do you not wish us to turn aside to the right?), He immediately added as follows: "He will Himself make thy paths straight, and will direct thy ways in peace." Understand, therefore, the precept, "Make straight paths for thy feet, and order thy ways aright," in such a sense as to know that whenever you do all this, it is the Lord God who enables you to do it.

Then you will not turn off to the right, although you are walking in right-hand paths, not trusting in your own strength; and He will Himself be your strength, who will make straight paths for your feet, and will direct your ways in peace.

8. Wherefore, most dearly beloved, whosoever says. My own will suffices for me to perform good works, declines to the right. But, on the other hand, they who think that a good way of life should be forsaken, when they hear God's grace preached up so intensely as to lead to the supposition and belief that it of itself turns men's wills from being evil to becoming good, and it even of itself guards and keeps them after it has turned them, and who, as the result of this opinion, go on to say, "Let us do evil that good may come."® these persons decline to the left. This is the reason why he said to you, "Turn not aside to the right hand, nor to the left;" in other words, do not uphold free-will in such wise as to attribute good works to it without the grace of God, nor so defend and maintain grace as if, by reason of it, you may love evil works in security and safety, ® which may God's grace itself avert from you!

Now it was the words of such thinkers as these which the apostle had in view when he said, "What shall we say, then? Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?"® And to this cavil of erring men, who know nothing about the grace of God, he returned such an answer as he ought in these words: "God forbid. How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" Nothing could have been said more succinctly, and yet to the point.

For what more useful gift does the grace of God confer upon us, in this present evil world, than our dying unto sin?

Hence he shows himself ungrateful to grace itself who chooses to live in sin by reason of that whereby we die unto sin.

May God, however, who is rich in mercy, grant you both to think soundly and wisely, and to continue perseveringly and progressively to the end in every good determination and purpose. For yourselves, for us, for all who love you, and for those who hate you, pray that this gift may be attained, â€” pray earnestly and vigilantly in brotherly peace. Live unto God. If I deserve any favour at your hands, let brother riorus come to me.

ON GEACE AND FREE-WILL. H ^^ A-T).

IN THIS TREATISE THE AUTHOR TEACHES US NOT TO MAINTAIN GRACE BY DENYING FREE-WILL, NOR FREE-WILL BY DENYING GRACE; FOR THAT IT IS EVIDENT FROM THE TESTIMONY OF SCRIPTURE THAT THERE IS IN MAN'S WILL AN INHERENT LIBERTY OF CHOICE; THAT THERE ARE ALSO IN THE SAME SCRIPTURES INSPIRED PROOFS GIVEN OF THAT VERST GRACE OF GOD WITHOUT WHICH WE CAN DO NOTHING GOOD. AFTERWARDS, IN OPPOSITION TO THE PELAGIANS, HE PROVES THAT GRACE IS NOT BESTOWED IN PROPORTION TO OUR MERITS. HE EXPLAINS HOW ETERNAL LIFE, WITH WHICH GOOD WORKS ARE RECOMPENSED, IS REALLY OF GRACE. HE THEN GOES ON TO SHOW THAT THE GRACE WHICH IS GIVEN TO US THROUGH OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST IS NEITHER THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE LAW, NOR NATURE, NOR SIMPLY REMISSION OF SINS; BUT THAT GRACE ITSELF MAKES US FULFIL THE LAW, AND CAUSES NATURE TO BE LIBERATED FROM THE DOMINION OF SIN. HE DEMOLISHES THAT VAIN SUBTERFUGE OF THE PELAGIANS, TO THE EFFECT THAT " GRACE, ALTHOUGH IT IS NOT BESTOWED ACCORDING TO THE MERITS OF GOOD WORKS, IS YET GIVEN IN PROPORTION TO THE DESERTS OF THE ANTECEDENT GOOD-WILL OF THE MAN WHO BELIEVES AND PRAYS." HE INCIDENTALLY TOUCHES THE QUESTION, WHY GOD COMMANDS WHAT HE MEANS HIMSELF TO GIVE, AND WHETHER HE IMPOSES ON US ANY COMMANDS WHICH WE ARE UNABLE TO PERFORM. HE CLEARLY SHOWS THAT THE LOVE WHICH IS INDISPENSABLE FOR FULFILLING THE COMMANDMENTS IS ONLY WITHIN US FROM GOD HIMSELF. HE POINTS OUT THAT GOD WORKS IN men's HEARTS TO INCLINE THEIR WILLS WHITHERSOEVER HE WILLETH, EITHER TO GOOD WORKS ACCORDING TO HIS MERCY, OR TO EVIL ONES IN RETURN FOR THEIR DESERTS â€” HIS JUDGMENT, INDEED, BEING SOMETIMES MANIFEST, SOMETIMES HIDDEN, BUT ALWAYS RIGHTEOUS. LASTLY, HE TEACHES US THAT A CLEAR EXAMPLE OF THE GRATUITOUSNESS OF GRACE, NOT GIVEN IN RETURN FOR OUR DESERTS, IS SUPPLIED TO US IN THE CASE OF THOSE INFANTS WHICH ARE SAVED, WHILE OTHERS PERISH THOUGH THEIR CASE IS IDENTICAL WITH THAT OF THE REST.

meritorious qualities which lead to everlasting life, we have already said a good deal in discussion, and committed it to writing, so far as the Lord has vouchsafed to enable us.
But since there are some persons who [take the opposite course, and] so defend God's grace as to deny man's free-will, or else suppose that free-will is denied when grace is defended, I have determined to write some thoughts on this point to your love, my brother Valentinus, and the rest of you, who are serving God together under the impulse of a mutual charity. -^^
Now it has been told me concerning you, brethren, by some members of your brotherhood who have visited us, and are the bearers of this communication of ours to you, that there are dissensions among you on this subject. This, then, being the case, dearly beloved, I counsel you not to be disturbed by the obscurity of this question, and to thank God for such things as you understand; but as for all which is beyond the reach of your mind, pray for understanding from the Lord, observing, at the same time, peace and charity among yourselves; and until He Himself lead you to perceive what at present is beyond your comprehension, walk firmly on the ground of which you are sure. This is the advice of the Apostle Paul, who, after saying that he was not yet perfect,^ a little later adds, " Let us, therefore, as many as are perfect, be thus minded,"^ â€” meaning perfect to a certain extent, but not having attained to a perfection sufficient for us; and then immediately adds, " And if, in any thing, ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you. Nevertheless, whereunto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule."^ For by walking according to our present attainments we shall advance to further stages of knowledge, â€” God revealing to us [degrees of truth] if we have other views about it [in our immature minds at present], provided we do not give up what portions thereof He has already revealed to us.

Chap. 2. [ii.] â€” Reproves the existence of free-will in man from the precepts addressed to him by God; these precepts are given that there may be no excuse from ignorance.

Now He has revealed to us, through His Holy Scriptures, that there is in man's will a liberty of choice. But how He 1 Phil. iii. 12. ^ pj^ij, ju, 15, 3 ^hW. iii. 16.

CHAP. 3.] THE WILL HA.TH LIBERTY TO CHOOSE. 1 5

has revealed this I do not attempt to explain by human testimony, but by divine. There is, to begin with, the fact that trod's precepts themselves would be of no use to a man unless his will were at full liberty to choose, so that by its assent he might-obtain the promised reward as he obeys the precepts.' For these are given that no one might be able to plead the excuse of ignorance, as the Lord says concerning the Jews in the gospel: " K I had not come and spoken unto them, they would not have sin; but now they have no cloak [or excuse] for their sin."^ Of what sin does He speak but of that great one which He foreknew, while speaking thus, that they would make their own â€” that is, the death they were going to inflict upon Him? For they had no sin before Christ came to them in the flesh. The apostle also says:
" The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness; because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath showed it unto them. For the invisible things of Him are from the creation of the world clearly seen â€” being understood by the things that are made â€” even His eternal power and Godhead, so that they are without excuse."^ In what sense does he pronounce them to be " without excuse," except of such excuse as human pride is apt to allege in such words as, " If I had only known, I would have done it; I did not do it because I was ignorant of it;" or, " I would do it if I knew how; but I do not know, therefore I don't do it "? All such excuse is removed from them when the precept is given them, or the knowledge is made manifest to them how to avoid sin.

Chap. 3. â€” Sinners are convicted when attempting to excuse themselves by blaming God, because they have free-will.
There are, however, persons who attempt to find excuse for themselves even from God. The Apostle James says to such:

"Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man. But every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. Then, when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, 'John XV. 22. - Eom. i. 18-20.

IG A TREATISE ON GRACE AND FREE-WILL. [CHAP. 4.

bringeth forth death." ^ Solomon, too, in his book of Proverbs, has this answer for such as wish to find an excuse for themselves from God Himself: " The folly of a man spoils his ways; but he blames God in his heart." ^ And in the book of Ecclesiasticus we read: " Say not thou, It is through the Lord that I fell away; for thou oughtest not to do the things that He hateth: nor do thou say, He hath caused me to err; for He hath no need of the sinful man. The Lord hateth all abomination, and they that fear God love it not. He Himself made man from the beginning, and left him in the hand of His counsel. If thou be willing, thou shalt keep His commandments, and perform true fidelity. He hath set fire and water before thee: stretch forth thine hand unto whether thou wilt. Before man is life and death, and whichever pleaseth him shall be given to him." ^ Observe how very plainly is set before our view the liberty of the human will.

Chap. 4. â€“ The divine commands which are most suited to the will itself illustrate its freedom.

What is the import of the fact that in so many passages God requests His commandments to be kept and fulfilled, and of the way in which He makes this request, if the will is not free? What means "the happy man," of whom the Psalmist says that " his pleasure [or will] * has been in the law of the Lord 1"® Does he not clearly enough show that a man, by his own will and choice, takes his stand in the law of God? Then, again, there are so many commandments which in a certain way expressly adapt themselves to the human will; for instance, there is, " Be not overcome of evil," ^ and others of similar import, such as, " Be not like a horse or a mule, which have no understanding; " ^ and, " Eject not the counsels of thy mother; " ^ and, " Be not wise in thine own conceit; " ^ ^ and,

" Despise not the chastening of the Lord; " ^ ^ and, " Forget not my law; " ^ ^ and, " Forbear not to do good to the poor; " ^ ^ and, " Devise not evil against thy friend; " ^ ^ and, " Give no heed to a worthless woman; " and, " He is not inclined to understand how to do good; "^ and, " They refused to attend to my counsel; "^ with numberless other passages of the inspired Scriptures. And what do they all show us but the liberty of man's will in its preferences and choice? So, again, in the evangelical and apostolic portions alike of the New Testament what other lesson is taught us? As when it is said, " Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth; "^ " and, " Fear not them which kill the body; "^ and, " If any man will come after me, let him deny himself; "^ and again, " Peace on earth to men of good will."^ So also what the Apostle Paul says: " Let him do what he willeth; he sinneth not if he marry. Nevertheless, he that standeth stedfast in his heart, having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart that he will keep his ^ virgin, doeth well."^^ And so again, " If I do this willingly, I have a reward; "^ while in another passage he says, " Be ye sober and righteous, and sin not; "^^ and again, " As ye have a readiness to will, so also let there be a prompt performance;"^^ then he remarks to Timothy about the younger widows, " When they have begun to wax wanton against Christ, they choose to marry." So in another passage, " All that will [or choose] to live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution; "^^ while to Timothy himself he says, " Neglect not the gift that is in thee."^^ Then to Philemon he addresses this explanation: " That thy benefit should not be as it were of necessity, but of thine own will."^ Servants also he advises to obey their masters " with a good will."^^ In strict accordance with this, James: " Do not err, my beloved brethren . . . and have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ with respect of persons; "^^ and, " Do not speak evil one of another."^^ So also John in his Epistle writes, " Do not love the world,"^^ and other things of the same import. Now wherever it is said, " Do not do this," and " Do not do that," and wherever there is any requirement in the divine admonitions for the work of the will to do anything, or to refrain from doing anything, there is at once a sufficient proof of the liberty of the will. No man, therefore, when he sins, can in his heart blame God for it, but every man must impute the fault to himself. Nor does it detract at all from a man's own freedom of will when he performs any act in accordance with the will of God. Indeed, a work is then to be pronounced a good one when a person does it willingly; then, too, may the reward of a good work be hoped for from Him concerning whom it is written, "He shall reward every man according to his works." ^

Chap. 5. â€” He shows that ignorance affords no such excuse as shall free the other from punishment; that to sin with knowledge is a graver thing than to sin in ignorance. Ignorance is twofold, â€” of those who are unwilling to know, and simply of those who lack knowledge.

All excuse such as men are in the habit of alleging from ignorance is really removed from those persons who are acquainted with God's commandments. Nor will every one be exempt from punishment who know not the law of God.
"For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law; and as many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law." ^ Now the apostle does not appear to me to have said this as if he meant that they would have to suffer something worse who in their sins are ignorant of the law than they who know it. [iii.] It is seemingly worse, no doubt, "to perish" than "to be judged," but inasmuch as he was speaking of the Gentiles and of the Jews when he used these words, the former being without the law, which the latter formally received, who can venture to say that the Jews who sin in the law will not perish, since they refused to believe in Christ, when it was of them that the apostle said, "They shall be judged by the law," ? For without believing in Christ no man can be delivered; and therefore the judgment which they shall undergo will be that they perish. If, indeed, the condition of those who are ignorant of the law of God is worse than the condition of those who know it, how can that be true which 'the Lord says in the gospel: "The servant who knows not his lord's will, and commits things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes; whereas the servant who knows his lord's will, and commits things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with many stripes "? ^ Observe how clearly He here shows that it is a graver matter for a man to sin with knowledge than in ignorance. And yet we must not on this account betake ourselves for refuge to the shades of ignorance, with the view of finding our excuse therein. It is one thing to be ignorant, and another thing to be unwilling to have knowledge. "For the will is at fault in the case of the man of whom it is said, "He is not inclined to understand how to do good." ^ But even the ignorance, which is not theirs who refuse to learn knowledge, but is theirs who are, as it were, simply ignorant, does not so far excuse a man as to exempt him from the punishment of eternal fire, even if his failure to believe in Christ has been the result of his not having at all heard what it is he should believe, though probably his punishment may be a milder one. For there is good reason why it is said in God's word, "Pour out Thy wrath upon the heathen that have not known Thee; "^ and again for the declaration of the apostle, "When He shall come from heaven in flaming fire to take vengeance on them that know not God." * But in truth the human will is expressly adapted to the purpose of our procuring knowledge as such, so that none of us can fairly say, "I was ignorant," "I did not hear," "I understood not;"

and in reference to this endowment of the will it is said to us, "Be ye not as the horse or as the mule, which have no understanding," ^ although that is evidently a still worse case of which it is written, "A stubborn servant will not be reproved by words; for even if he understand, yet he will not obey." ^ ^ But when a man says, "I cannot do what I am taught and commanded to do, because I am mastered by my evil concupiscence," he has no longer any excuse to plead from ignorance, nor reason to blame God in his heart; he acknowledges the evil to be in himself, and laments it; still to such an one the apostle's words are suitable: "Be not overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good;"^ and of course the very fact that the injunction, "Be not overcome," "Consent not to be overcome," is addressed to him, undoubtedly shows 1 that his will possesses the power of choice and determination.

Chap. 6. [iv. ] â€” GoTs grace to he maintained against the Pelagians; the Pelagian heresy not an old one.
There is, however, a fear of all these and similar testimonies of Holy Scripture (and undoubtedly there are a great many of them) being understood, in the maintenance of free-will, in such a way as to leave no room for God's assistance and grace' in leading a godly life and a good conversation, to which the eternal reward is due; and a fear, moreover, of a poor wretched man so misunderstanding his own case, when he leads a good life and performs good works (or rather thinks that he leads a good life and performs good works), as to dare to glory in himself, and not in the Lord, and to put his entire hope of righteous living in himself alone; so that the prophet Jeremiah's malediction follows him when he says, "Cursed is the man who trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord." ^ Understand, my brethren, I pray you, this passage of the prophet. For the prophet did not say, "Cursed is the man who puts his hope in his own self." It might seem to some that the passage, "Cursed is the man who trusteth in man," was spoken in the sense that no man should have any confidence in any other person, but in himself In order, therefore, to show that his advice to a man was not to have any confidence in himself, even after saying, "Cursed is the man who trusteth in man," he immediately added, "And maketh flesh his arm" [or "strengtheneth the flesh of his arm "].^ He used the word "arm" to designate 'power in operation. By the term "flesh" however, must be understood human frailty. And therefore he strengthens the flesh of his arm who supposes that a power which is frail and weak (in a word, human) is sufficient for him to perform good works, and therefore puts not his trust in God for help. This is the reason why he subjoined the further clause, "And whose heart departeth from the Lord."

^[Augustine's reading of this clause is: Etfirmat carnem brachii sui.]

CHAP. 7.] THE NECESSITY OF GRACE. 21

Of this character is the Pelagian heresy, which is not an ancient one, but has only lately come into existence. Against this system of error there was first a good deal of discussion; then, as the ultimate resource, it was referred to sundry episcopal councils, the proceedings of which, not, indeed, in every instance, but in some, I have despatched to you for your perusal. In order, then, to our performance of good works, let us not put our trust in man, strengthening the flesh of our own arm; nor let our heart ever depart from the Lord, but let it say to him, "Be Thou my helper; forsake me not, nor despise me, God of my salvation." ^

Chap. 7. â€” Grace is necessary along with free-will to lead a good life. Continence the result of God's gift and free-will. They to whom it is given order their will so as to accomplish its desire.
Therefore, my dearly beloved, as we have now proved by our former quotations of Holy Scripture that there is in man's will a freedom of choice and determination in order to lead a good life and perform right actions, so now let us see what inspired passages there also are concerning the grace of God, without which we are not able to do any good thing. And "first of all, I will say something about the very profession which you make in your brotherhood. Now your society, in which you are leading lives of continence, could not hold together unless you forbore the pleasure of matrimony. Well, the Lord was one day conversing on this very topic, when His disciples remarked to Him, "If such be the case of a man with his wife, it is not good to marry." He then answered them, "All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given." And was it not to Timothy's free-will that the apostle appealed, when he exhorted him in these words: "Keep thyself pure" [Contine te ipsum, "Exercise continence"]? He also explained the power of the will in this matter when He said, "He standeth stedfast in heart, â€” having no necessity, but possessing power over his own will, â€” to keep his virgin." And yet all men do not receive this saying, except those to whom the power is given. Now they to whom this is not given either are unwilling or do not fulfil their will; whereas they to whom it is given so order their will as to accomplish what they wish. In order, therefore, that this saying, which is not received by all men, may yet be received by some, God's grace and free-will combine in securing to them the gift.

Chap. 8. â€” Conjugal chastity is itself the gift of God. Without the grace of God His commandments cannot be kept. The law without grace.

It is, indeed, concerning the very chastity of the married state that the apostle treats, when he says, "Let him do what he will, he sinneth not if he marry; "^ and yet even this is God's gift, for the Scripture says, "It is by the Lord that the woman is joined to her husband." Accordingly the apostle, who is the especial teacher of the Gentiles, in one of his discourses commends both conjugal chastity, the great preventative of adultery, and the still more perfect chastity which foregoes all fleshly embraces, and shows how both one and the other are severally the gift of God. Writing to the Corinthians, he admonished married persons never to defraud each other in the joys of their conjugal estate; then, after his admonition to these, he added: " But I could wish that all men were even as I am myself," meaning, of course, that he abstained from all connubial embraces; and then proceeded to say: " But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that." NoWj do the many precepts which are written in the law of God, purporting to forbid all fornication and adultery, indicate anything short of the freedom of the will ? Surely such precepts would not be given unless a man had a will of his own, wherewith to obey the divine commandments; and yet it is God's gift which is indispensable for the observance of the precepts of chastity. Accordingly, it is said in the Book of Wisdom: " When I knew that no one could be chaste and continent, except God gave the grace, then this became a point of wisdom to know whose gift it was."* "Every man," however, "is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed " ^ not to observe and keep these holy precepts of chastity. If he should say in respect of these commandments, I wish to keep them, but am mastered by my concupiscence, then the Scripture has this answer for him, â€” addressed to his free-will, as I have already had occasion to say: " Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." ^ In order, however, that this victory may be gained, grace renders its help; and were not this help given, then the law would only show itsK [to be the measure of j the strength and power of sin. For concupiscence is increased and receives greater energies from the prohibition of the law, if the spirit of grace be not at hand to help. This explains the statement of the great Apostle of the Gentiles, when he says, " The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law." ^ See, then, I pray you, whence originates this confession of weakness, when a man says, I desire to keep what the law commands, but am overcome by the strength of my concupiscence. But when his will even consents to the prohibition, and it is said to him, "Be not overcome of evil," of what avail is anything but the succour of God's grace to the accomplishment of the precept ? This the apostle himself afterwards stated; for after saying, " The strength of sin is the law," he immediately subjoined, " But thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ." ^ It follows, then, that the victory in which sin is vanquished is nothing else than the gift of God, who in ( this contest helps the free-will of the combatant.

CnAP. 9. â€” Entering into temptation. Prayer is a proof of grace.

Wherefore, our Heavenly Master also says: " Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." * Let every man, therefore, when fighting against his own concupiscence and evil desire, pray that he enter not into temptation; in other words, that he be not drawn aside and enticed by his lust.
He does not enter into temptation who conquers his evil concupiscence by the bent of his will to good. And yet the human will is insufficient to refuse to enter into temptation, unless the Lord grant it victory in answer to prayer. What, indeed, affords clearer evidence of the grace of God than the acceptance of prayer in any petition ? ' If our Saviour had only said, "Watch that ye enter not into temptation." He would evidently have done nothing else than admonish man's

' Rom. xii. 21. 2 i Cor. xv. 56, Â» 1 Cor. xy. 57. * Matt. xxvi. 41.
will; but since He added the words, "and pray," He showed that God helps us not to enter into temptation. It is to the free-will of a man that the words are addressed: "My son, despise not the chastening of the Lord." [" Fail not under it," noli deficerc] And the Lord said: "I have prayed for thee, Peter, that thy faith fail not." ^ So that a man is assisted by grace, in order that his will may not be ineffectually appealed to with a command.

Chap. 10. [v.] Free-will and God's grace are simultaneously commended. The error of the Pelagians that grace is given according to men's merits. A passage in Zechariah abused. Coming to Christ.

When God says, "Turn ye unto me, and I will turn unto you," ^ one of these clauses â€” that which invites our return to God â€” is evidently addressed to our free-will; while the other, which promises His return to us, appertains to His grace. Here, possibly, the Pelagians think they have a justification for their opinion which they so prominently advance, that God's grace is given in proportion to our merits. In the East, indeed, that is to say in the province of Palestine, in which is the city of Jerusalem, Pelagius, when examined in person by the bishop,* did not venture to affirm this. For it happened that among the objections which were brought up against him, this in particular was alleged, that he maintained that the grace of God was bestowed according to our merits, â€” an opinion which was so diverse from Catholic doctrine, and so hostile to the grace of Christ, that unless he had anathematized it, as laid to his charge, he himself must have left the Council under anathema. He pronounced, indeed, the required condemnation of the dogma, but how insincerely his later books plainly show; for in them he maintains absolutely no other opinion than that the grace of God is bestowed in proportion to our own deserts. Such deductions do they make out of the Scriptures, â€” like the one Which I just now quoted, "Turn ye unto me, and I will turn unto you," â€” as if it were owing to the merit of our conversion to God that His grace were given us, wherein He Himself even turns unto us. Now the persons who hold this opinion fail to observe that.

1 Prov. iii. 11. ^ Luke xxii. 32. Â» Zech. i. 3.

* [See De Gestis Pelagii, translated in voL i. chap. xiv. (30).]
unless our conversion to God were itself God's gift, it would not be said to Him in prayer, "Turn us again, God of hosts;" and, "Thou, God, wilt turn and quicken us;" and again, "Convert us, God of our salvation;" with other passages of similar import, too numerous to mention here.

Tor, with respect to our coming unto Christ, what else does it mean than our being turned and converted to Him upon our believing? And yet He says: "No man can come unto me, except it were given unto him of my Father." *

Chap. 11. ã€” Other passages of Scripture which, the Pelagians abuse.

Then, again, there is the Scripture contained in the second book of the Chronicles: "The Lord is with you when ye are with Him: and if ye shall seek Him ye shall find Him; but if ye forsake Him, He also will forsake you." ^ This passage, no doubt, clearly shows that the will is free. But they who maintain that God's grace is given according to our merits, receive these testimonies of Scripture in such a manner as to believe our merit lies in the circumstance of our "being with God," while His grace, in pursuance of this merit, results in the reciprocity of "His being Himself with us." In like manner, our merit lies in the fact of "our seeking God," and then His grace is bestowed upon us in proportion to this merit, to the effect of "our finding Him." Again, there is a passage in the first book of the same Chronicles which declares the liberty of the will: "And thou, Solomon, my son, know thou the God of thy father, and serve Him with a perfect heart and with a willing mind, for the Lord searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts; if thou seek Him, He will be found of thee; but if thou forsake Him, He will cast thee off for ever." ^ But these people find some room for human merit in the clause, "If thou seek Him," and then the grace is conferred on the scale of this merit in the result described by the ensuing words, "He will be found of thee;" and so they labour with all their might to show that God's grace is bestowed in return for merits of our own, ã€” in other words, that grace is not grace. For, as the apostle most plainly and expressly says, to them who receive reward according to their desert the recompense is "not reckoned of grace but of debt." ^

Chap. 12. ã€” He proves out of St. Paul that grace is not given according to men's merits.

Now there was, no doubt, a decided merit in the Apostle Paul, but it was an evil one, while he persecuted the Church, and he says of it: "I am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God." ^ And it was while he was in possession of this evil merit that a good one was rendered to him instead of the evil; and, therefore, he went on at once to say, "But by the grace of God I am what I am." Then, in order to exhibit the action of his free-will besides, he added in the next clause, "And His grace within me was not in vain [or idle], but I laboured more abundantly than they all." This freedom of will in man he consistently appeals to in the case of others also, as when he says to them,
"We beseech you that ye receive not the grace of God in vain" [so as to be idle]. Now, how could he enjoin any effort on them, if they received God's grace in such a manner as to merge in it, and lose their own will? However [there was the other extreme to guard against], the will itself must not be deemed capable of doing any good thing without the grace of God; therefore, after saying, "His grace within me was not in vain," or idle, "but I laboured more abundantly than they all," he immediately added the qualifying clause,
"Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me." In other words. Not I alone, but only the grace of God. Nor was he himself solitary in action, but God's grace operated along with him. For the accomplishment, however, of the radical change within him, "his call from heaven, and his conversion by that great and most effectual call, "God's grace operated alone, because his merits, though great, were yet evil.
Then, to quote one passage more, he says to Timothy: "But be thou a partaker with me in the work" of the gospel, according to the power of God, who saveth us and calleth us with His holy calling, "not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus." Then, elsewhere, he enumerates his merits, and gives us this description of their evil character:

"For we ourselves also were formerly foolish, unbelieving, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another." Nothing, to be sure, but punishment was due to such a course of evil desert! God, however, who returns good for evil by His grace, which is never bestowed according to our deserts, enabled the apostle to conclude his statement with this happy turn: "When, however, the kindness and love of our divine Saviour shone upon us, "not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the laver of regeneration and renewal of the Holy Ghost, whom He shed upon us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour; that, being justified by His grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life."
From these and similar passages of Scripture, we gather the proof that God's grace is not given according to our merits. The truth is, we see that it is bestowed not only when there are no good deserts, but when even evil ones precede; and we still observe the same unmerited gifts conferred day after day. But it is plain that when grace has been given, even our merits begin to be good, only it is by grace; for, were that only to withdraw itself, man falls, not raised up, but only precipitated by his free-will. Wherefore no man ought, even when he begins to possess good merits, to attribute them to himself, not to God, who is thus addressed by the Psalmist:

"Be Thou my helper, forsake me not."^ By saying, "Forsake me not," he shows that if he were to be forsaken, he is unable of himself to do any good thing. He had gone so far once as to declare: " I said in my prosperity, I shall never be moved," ^ for he thought that he had such an abundance of wealth to call his own as to ensure him perfect stability. But in order that he might be taught whose that was, of which he had begun to boast as if it were his own, he was admonished by the gradual desertion of God's grace; and the result he thus describes: " Lord, in Thy good pleasure Thou didst add strength to my beauty. Thou didst, however, turn away Thy face, and then I was troubled and distressed." ^

So necessary is it for a man that he should be not only justified when unrighteous by the grace of God, â€” that is, to be changed from unholiness to righteousness, â€” when he is requited with good for his evil; but that, even after he has become justified by faith, grace should accompany him on his way afterwards, and he should lean upon it, lest he stumble and fall. On this account it is written concerning the Church herself in the book of Canticles: "AVho is this that cometh up in white raiment, leaning upon the arm of her beloved kinsman?" ^ ^ ghe, who could by no possibility have been so pure in vesture by herselt alone, has become clad in white. And by whom has she been thus whitened, except by Him who says by the prophet, "Though your sins be as purple, I will make them white as snow"? ^ At the time she was made white, she deserved nothing good; but now that she is white, she walketh rightly; â€” but it is only by her continuing ever to lean upon Him by whom she was whitened. Wherefore, Jesus Himself, on whom the Church leans in her raiment of white, said to His disciples, "Without me ye can do nothing." *

Chap. 14.

Let us return now to the Apostle Paul, who, as we have observed, obtained God's grace, who recompenses good for evil, when, so far from having any good deserts of his own, he was really involved in many evil ones. Let us see what he says when his sufferings at the end of his life were approaching. These are his words, writing to Timothy: "I am now ready to be offered, and the tim^ of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." ^ He enumerates these as being now his good merits; that, as after his ill deserts he obtained grace, so now, after his good merits, he might receive the crown. Observe,

1 Ps. XXX. 7. 2 Cant. viii. 5. ^ Isa. i. 18.

â€”1 John XV. 5. * 2 Tim. iv. 6, 7.
therefore, what follows: "There is henceforth laid up for me," he says, "a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day." Now, to whom could the righteous Judge award the crown, except to him on whom the merciful Father had bestowed grace? And how could the crown be one "of righteousness," unless the grace had preceded which "justifieth the ungodly?" How, moreover, could the one now be awarded as a debt, unless the other had been before bestowed as a free gift?

Chap. 15. â€” The Pelagians profess that the only grace which is given according to our merits is that of the forgiveness of sins; God crowns in us His own gifts, not our merits.

When, however, the Pelagians say that the only grace which is not awarded according to our merits is that whereby a man has his sins forgiven him, but that the final grace which is bestowed upon us, even eternal life, is given in return for preceding merits, they must not be allowed to go without an answer. If, indeed, they understand our merits in such a sense as to acknowledge even them to be the gifts of God, then their opinion would not deserve reprobation. But inasmuch as they preach up human merits to such an extent as to declare that a man has them of his own very self, then the apostle's reply becomes an absolutely correct one: "Who maketh thee to differ from another? And what hast thou, that thou didst not receive? Now, if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received it?" To a man who holds such dews, it is perfect truth to say: It is His own gifts that God crowns, not your merits, although you hold these as done by your own self, not by Him. If, indeed, they are of such a character, they are evil, and God does not crown them; but if they are good, they are God's gifts, because, as the Apostle James says, "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights." In accordance with which John also, the Lord's forerunner, declares: "A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven" from heaven, of course, for from thence came also the Holy Ghost, when Jesus ascended up on high, led captivity captive, and gave gifts to men.â€”Inasmuch, then, as your merits are God's gifts, God does not crown your merits as such, but only as His own gifts. "

Chap. 16. [vil.] â€” The apostle's saying, "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy," is incapable of conversion or transposition.
Let us, therefore, consider those very merits of the Apostle Paul which he said the Eighteous Judge would recompense with the crown of righteousness; and let us see whether these merits of his were really his own â€” I mean, whether they were obtained by him of himself, or were the gifts of God. "I have fought," says he, "a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith." ^ Now, in the first place, these good works were nothing, unless they had been preceded by good thoughts. Observe, therefore, what he says concerning these very thoughts. His words, when writing to the Corinthians, are to this effect: "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God."^ Then let us look at each several merit. "I have fought a good fight." Well, now, I want to know by what power he fought. Was it by a power which he possessed of himself, or by strength given to him from above? It is impossible to suppose that so great a teacher as the apostle was ignorant of the law of God, which proclaims the following in Deuteronomy: "Say not in thine heart. My own strength and energy of hand hath wrought for me this great power; but thou shalt remember the Lord thy God, how it is He that giveth thee strength to acquire such power." ^ And what avails "a good fight," unless followed by a victory? And who gives the victory but He of whom the apostle says himself, "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" ?^ Then, in another passage, having quoted from the Psalm these words: "Because for Thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for slaughter," ^ he went on to declare: "Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through Him that loved us." ^ Not through ourselves, therefore, is the victory accomplished, but through Him who hath loved us. In the second clause he says, "I have finished my course." Now who is it that says this, but he who declares in another passage, "So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy." ^ And this sentence admits of no transposition, so that it could be said: It is not of God, who showeth mercy, but of the man who willeth and runneth his course. If any person be bold enough to express the matter thus, he shows himself most plainly to be at issue with the apostle.

Chap. 17. â€” Faith the free gift of God.
His last clause runs thus: "I have kept the faith." But he who says this is the same who declares in another passage, "I have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful". He does not say, I obtained mercy because I was faithful, but "in order that I might be faithful," thus showing that even faith itself cannot be had without God's exercise of mercy, and that consequently it is the gift of God. This he very expressly teaches us when he says, 'For by grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." They might say, We received grace because we believed; as if they would attribute the faith to themselves, and the grace to God.

Therefore, to prevent such an error, the apostle having said, "Ye are saved through faith," added the correcting clause, "And that not of yourselves, but it is the gift of God." And then, lest they should claim to have deserved so great a gift by any works of their own, he immediately added, "Not of works, lest any man should boast." Not that he meant to deny good works, or to empty them of their value, because he says that God renders to every man according to his works; but he would have works proceed from faith, and not faith from works. Therefore it is from Him that we have works of righteousness, from whom comes also faith itself, concerning which it is written, "The just shall live by faith." ^

32 A TREATISE ON GRACE AND FREE-WILL. [CHAP. 19.

Chap. 18. â€” Faith without good works is not sufficient for salvation.

Unintelligent persons, indeed, with regard to the apostle's statement: "We conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law," have thought him to mean that faith is sufficient for a man, even if he lead a bad life, and has no good deeds to allege. Impossible is it that such a character should be deemed "a vessel of election" by the apostle, who, after declaring that "in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision," adds the important statement, "but faith which worketh by love." It is such faith which severs the faithful children of God from unclean devils, â€” for even these "believe and tremble," as the Apostle James says, but they do no good works. Therefore they possess not the faith by which the just man lives, â€” the faith which operates through love in such wise, that God recompenses it according to its works with eternal life. But inasmuch as we have even our good works from God, from whom likewise comes our faith and our love, therefore the selfsame great teacher of the Gentiles has designated "eternal life" itself as His gracious "gift."
Chap. 19. [viii.] â€” How is eternal life both a reward for service and a free gift of grace?

And hence there arises no small question, which must be solved with the Lord's permission. If eternal life is bestowed as a recompense for good works (as the Scripture most openly declares: "Then He shall reward every man according to his works"), how can eternal life be a matter of grace, seeing that grace is not given in return for works, but is a gratuitous 'award,' as the apostle himself tells us: "To him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt;" and again: "There is a remnant saved according to the election of grace;" with these words immediately subjoined: "And if of grace, then is it no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace." How, I ask again, is eternal life a matter of grace, when it is received after works? Does the apostle happen not to have "given the designation of grace to eternal life? Nay, he has so "Rom. iii. 28." Gal. v. 6. =* Jas. ii. 19. * Rom. vi. 23.

Chap. 20. â€” The question answered. In what sense the apostle says that %ce are â€œ not saved by works. Justification is grace simply and entirely. Eternal life ' is reward and grace.

Now this question seems to me to be by no means capable of solution, unless we understand that even those good works of ours, which are recompensed with eternal life, are occasioned by the grace of God, because of what is said by the Lord Jesus: "Without me ye can do nothing." The apostle himself undoubtedly [felt the difficulty of the subject] after saying, "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast;" he evidently saw the possibility of men's concluding from such a statement that good works are not necessary to those who believe., but that faith alone is sufficient for them. Then, again, there was the possibility, as he perceived, of men's boasting of their good works, as if they were of themselves capable of performing them. To meet, therefore, these erroneous opinions on both sides, he immediately added, "We are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." â— *

[And here question after question arises.] What is the purport of his saying, "iSTot of works, lest any man should boast," while commending the grace of God? And then why does he afterwards, when giving a reason for using such words, say,
" For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works " ? Why, therefore, does it run, " Not of works, lest any man should boast " ? Now, hear and understand the point. The excluding phrase, " Not of works," is spoken of the works which you suppose have their origin in yourseK alone; but you have to think of works to which God has moulded (that is, has formed and created) you. For of these he says,
" We are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works." Now he does not here speak of that creation which made us human beings, but of that in reference to which one said who was already in full manhood, "Create in me a clean heart, God; " ^ concerning which also the apostle says, "Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new. And all things are of God." ^ We are moulded, therefore, that is, formed and created, " unto the good works, which " we have not ourselves prepared, but " God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." ' It follows, then, dearly beloved, beyond all doubt, that as your good life is nothing else than God's gift and grace, so also the eternal life which is the recompense of a good life is the gift and grace of God; moreover it is a free and gratuitous gift, even as that was a free and gratuitous gift of which it is the recompense. But the good life, thus rewarded, is solely and simply grace; therefore the eternal life, which is its reward â€” and because it is its reward â€” is grace for grace, as if it were the remuneration of righteousness; 'in order that that may be realized, because it is true, that God " shall reward every man according to his works." ^

XV. c

Chap. 21. [is..]â€” Eternal Life is " Grace for Grace."'

Perhaps you ask whether we ever read in the Sacred Scriptures of "grace for grace!" Well, you possess the Gospel according to John, which is perfectly clear in its very great light. Here John the Baptist says of Christ: ' "Of His ful-ness have we all received â€” even grace for grace." * ' So that out of His fulness we have received, according to our humble measure, our particles of ability as it were for leading good lives — " according as God hath dealt to every man his measure of faith; " ^ because " every man hath his proper gift of God; one after this manner, and another after that."* And even this is real grace, but, over and above this, we shall receive even grace for grace, when we shall have awarded to us that eternal life, of which the apostle spake in the words: " The gift [or grace] of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our having just said that " the wages of sin is death." Deservedly did he call it " wagesl' because everlasting death is awarded as its proper due to the service of the devil. Now, when it was in his power to say, and rightly to say: The wages or recompense of righteousness is eternal life, he yet preferred to express it thus: " The gift [or grace] of God is eternal life; " in order that we may hence understand that God does not, for any merits of our own, prolong our existence to everlasting life, but from His own divine compassion towards us. Even as the Psalmist says to his soul [concerning the Lord], "Who crowneth thee with mercy and compassion." ^ Well, now, is not a crown given as the reward of good and excellent deeds ?

It is, however, only because He performs by His operation in good men these very deeds of excellence, of whom it is said,

" It is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of His good pleasure." ^ Hence the Psalm has it, as just now quoted; " He crowneth thee with mercy and compassion," because it is through His mercy that we perform the good deeds to which the crown is awarded. It is not, however, to be for a moment supposed, because he said, " It is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of His own good pleasure;" that he meant to do away with the liberty of the will. If this, indeed, had been his meaning, he would not have said just before, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling."^ [The balance is well kept], for when they are requested " to work," their free-will comes into account; and when it is added, "with fear and trembling," they are warned against boasting of their good deeds as if they were their own, by attributing to themselves the performance of anything good. It is pretty much as if the apostle were put on his trial, and had this question put to him: " Why did you use the phrase, ' with fear and trembling'"? And as if he answered the inquiry of his examiners by telling them, "Por it is God which worketh in you." Because if you fear and tremble, you do not boast of your good works â€“ as if they were your own, since it is God who works within you.
Chap. 22. [x.] â€” Who is the transgressor of the law? " The oldness of its letter. The newness of its spirit."

Therefore, brethren, you ought by means of your free-will to avoid evil and to do good; this, indeed, is the lesson taught us in the law of God, in the Holy Scriptures â€” both Old and New. Let us, however, read, and by the Lord's help ' understand, what the apostle tells us: " Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in His sight; for by the law is the knowledge of sin." ^ Observe, he says " the knowledge" not the commission of sin. Now, whenever a man acquires the knowledge of sin, and grace does not help him to guard against its commission, notwithstanding his knowledge, then undoubtedly the law has the effect of producing [God's] anger. ^ And no less than this the apostle explicitly informs us in another passage. His words are: " The law worketh wrath." ^ ^ The reason of this statement lies obviously in the fact that God's anger is greater in the case of the wilful transgressor, who, through the law, understands what sin is, and yet commits it. It is this wilfulness that makes the man a transgressor of the law; even as the apostle says in another sentence, " For where no law is, there is no transgression." * It is in accordance with this principle that he elsewhere says, " That we may serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter." ^ Now as he "wishes the law to be here understood by " the oldness of the letter," what else is meant by "newness of spirit " than grace? Then, that it might not be thought that he had brought any accusation, or suggested any blame, against the law, he immediately takes himself to task, with this inquiry: " What shall we say, then? Is the law sin? God forbid." He then adds the statement: " Kay, I had not known sin but by the law; " ^ which is of the same import as the passage above quoted: " By the law is the knowledge of sin." ^ Then [he enlarges thus on the deep subject]: " For I had not known lust, except the law had said, 'Thou shalt not covet.' Â® But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. For without the law sin was dead. For I was alive without the law once; but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died. And the commandment, which was ordained to life, I found to be unto death. For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by its means slew me.

Wherefore the law is holy; and the commandment holy, just, and good. Was, then, that which is good made death unto me? God forbid. But sin, that it might appear sin, worked death in me by that which is good, â€” in order that the sinner,^ or his sin, might by the commandment become exceeding sinful."

And to the Galatians he writes: "Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, except through faith in Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law; for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified."^

Chap. 23. [xi.] â€” The Pelagians maintain that the law is the grace of God which helps us not to sin.

What, therefore, do those very vain and perverse persons who follow Pelagius mean by saying that the law is that grace of God which helps us to avoid sin? Do they not, by making such an allegation, unhappily and beyond all doubt contradict the great apostle? He, indeed, says, that through the law sin received its strength and power against man; and that man, through the commandment, although it be holy, and just, and good, dies, death working in him through that which is good, from which death there could be no deliverance unless the Spirit quickened him, whom the letter had killed, â€” as he says in another passage, " The letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life." *" And yet those obstinate persons, blind against God's light, and deaf to His voice, maintain that the letter which killeth gives life, and thus gainsay the quickening Spirit. " Therefore, brethren " (that I may warn you with better effect in the words of the apostle himself), " we are debtors not to the flesh, to live after the flesh; for if ye live after the flesh ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live."^ I have quoted this language of the apostle to deter your free-will from evil, and to exhort it to good; but yet you must not therefore glory in man, â€” that is to say, in your own selves, â€” but in the Lord, when you live not after the flesh, but through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the flesh. For in order that they to whom the apostle addressed this language might not exalt themselves, thinking that they were themselves able of their own spirit to do such good works as these, and not by the Spirit of God, after saying to them, " If ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the flesh, ye shall live," he at once added, " For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."^ When, therefore, you by the Spirit mortify the deeds of the flesh, that you may have life, glorify Him, praise Him, give thanks to Him by whose Spirit you are so led as to be Chap. 24. Who may be said to wish to establish their own righteousness.

'God's righteousness,' so-called, which man has from God. The righteousness of the law.

As many, therefore, as are led by their own spirit, trusting in their own virtue, with the addition merely of the law's assistance, without the help of grace, are not the sons of God. Such are they of whom the same apostle speaks as "being ignorant of God's righteousness, and wishing to establish their own righteousness, who have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God." He said this of the Jews, who in their self-assumption rejected grace, and therefore did not believe in Christ. Their own righteousness, indeed, he says, they wish to establish; and this righteousness is of the law, not that the law was established by themselves, but they had set up their righteousness in the law which is of God, when they supposed themselves able to fulfill that law by their own strength, ignorant of God's righteousness, not indeed that by which God is Himself righteous, but that which man has from God. And that you may know he designated as thes the righteousness which is of the law, and as God's that which man receives from God. He designated as thes the righteousness of the law; but that which is through the faith of Christ, which is of God.

CHAP. 25.] WITHOUT GRACE THE LAW KILLS. 39

righteousness, which is of the law; but that which is through the faith of Christ, which is of God." Now what does he mean by "not having my own righteousness, which is of the law," when the law is really not his at all, but God's except this, that he called it his own righteousness, although it was of the law, because he thought he could fulfill the law by his own will, without the aid of grace which is through faith in Christ? Wherefore, after saying, "Not having, my own righteousness, which is of the law," he immediately subjoined, "But that which is through the faith of Christ, which is of God." This is what they were ignorant of, of whom he says, "Being ignorant of God's righteousness," that is, the righteousness which is of God (for it is given not by the letter, which kills, but by the life-giving Spirit), "and wishing to establish their own righteousness," which he expressly described as the righteousness of the law, when he said, "Not having my own righteousness, which is of the law." To God's righteousness they were not subject; in other words, they submitted not themselves to the grace of God. They were under the law, not under grace, and therefore sin had dominion over them, from which a man is not freed by the law, but by grace. On which account he elsewhere says, "For sin shall not have dominion over you; because ye are not under the law, but under grace." Not that the law is evil; but because they are under its power, whom it makes guilty by imposing commandments and giving no assistance to keep them. It is grace which helps any man to be a doer of the law; and without this grace, he who places himself under the law will be a hearer of the law and nothing else. To such persons he addresses these words:
"Ye who are justified by the law are fallen from grace." ^

Chap. 25. [xiii.] â€” As the law is not, so neither is our nature itself that grace by which we are Christians. If justification were either by the law or by nature, Christ would have died in vain.

Now who can be so insensible to the words of the apostle, who so foolishly, nay, so insanely ignorant of the purport of his statement, as to venture to affirm that the law is grace, when he who knew very well what he was saying emphatically

40 A TREATISE ON GRACE AND FREE-WILL. [CHAP. 26.

declares, "Ye who are justified by the law are fallen from grace " ? " Well, but if the law is not grace, seeing that it is not the law, but only grace which can give any help to the law itself being kept, will not nature at any rate be grace?
For this the Pelagians have been bold enough to aver, Gratiam esse naturam; that nature is the grace in which we were created in such wise as to possess a rational mind, by which we are enabled to understand, â€” formed as we are in the image of God, that we have dominion over the fish of the sea, â€” and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that creepeth upon the earth. ^.
This, however, is not the grace which the apostle commends^ to us through the faith of Jesus Christ.
For it is certain that we possess this nature in common with ungodly men and unbelievers; whereas the grace which comes through the faith of Jesus Christ belongs only to them to whom the faith itself appertains. ^ " For all men have not faith." ^ Now, as the apostle, with perfect truth, says to those who by wishing to be justified by the law have fallen from grace,
" If righteousness [or justification ^ ] come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain; " * so likewise, to those who think that the grace which he commends, and the faith of Christ receives, is nature, the same language is with the same degree of truth applicable: ^if righteousness come from nature, then Christ is dead in vain. ' But the law was in existence up to that time, and it did not justify; and nature existed too, but it did not justify. It was not, then, in vain that Christ died, in order that the law might be fulfilled through Him who said,
"I am come not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it; " * and that our nature, which was lost through Adam, might through Him be recovered, who said that " He was come to seek and to save that which was lost; " ^ towards whose coming the old fathers likewise who loved God had directed their faith.

Chap. 26. â€” The Pelagians contend that the grace, which is neither the law nor nature, avails only to the remission of past sins, but not to the avoidance of future ones.

They also maintain that God's grace, which is given through the faith of Jesus Christ, and which is neither the law nor nature, avails only to the remission of sins that have been committed, and not to the avoidance of future ones, or the subjugation of those which are now assailing us. Now if all this were true, surely after offering the petition of the Lord's Prayer, " Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors," we could hardly go on and say, "And lead us not into temptation." ^ â– - The former petition we present that our sins may be forgiven; the latter, that they may be avoided or subdued, â€” a favour which we should by no means beg of our Father who is in heaven if we were able to accomplish the end by virtue of our human will.

Kow I strongly advise and earnestly require your beloved fraternity^ to read attentively the book of the blessed Cyprian which he wrote On the Lord's Prayer. As far as the Lord shall assist you, make out its meaning, and commit it to memory. In this work you will see how he appeals to the free-will of those whose edification he affects in his treatise; yet in such a way as to show them, that whatever commandments they have to fulfil in the law, they must ask for [grace to enable them] in the prayer. But this, of course, would be utterly in vain if the human will were sufficient for the performance without the help of God.

Chap. 27. [xiv.] â€” Grace effects the fulfilment of the law, the deliverance of nature, and the suppression of sin's dominion. Suhterfurje of the Pelagians,

It has, however, been shown to demonstration, that instead of really maintaining the freedom of the will, they have only inflated a theory of it, which, having no stability, has fallen to the ground. Neither the knowledge of God's law, nor nature, nor the mere remission of sins represents [as they pretend] that grace which is given to us through our Lord Jesus Christ; but it is this very grace which accomplishes the fulfilment of the law, and the liberation of nature, and the removal of the dominion of sin. Being, therefore, frustrated on these points, they resort to another expedient, and endeavour to show in the best way they can that the grace of God is given us according to our merits. For they say: "Granted that it [grace] is not given to us in proportion to the merits of our good works, inasmuch as it is through it that we do any good thmg, still it is bestowed upon us in proportion to our merits of a good will; for," say they, "the good will of him who prays precedes his prayer, even as the good will of the believer preceded his ^ ^"; faith, so that in proportion to these deserts the grace of God i^ follows, as He hears [and answers the prayer]."

P^

Chap. 28. â€” Faith is the gift of God.

I have already discussed ^ the point concerning the faith, that is, the disposition and will of the man who believes; and I went so far as to show that it appertains to grace, â€” so that the apostle did not tell us that he obtained mercy because he was faithful; but he said,*^"! have obtained mercy of the â– Lord in order to be faithful." ^ ^ And there are many other passages of similar import, â€” among them that in which he bids us " think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the proportion of faith; " ^ and that which I have already quoted: " By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God; " * and again another in the same Epistle to the Ephesians: " Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ; " ^ and to the same effect that passage in which he says,

" Eor unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake; " ^ [from which we learn] that both endowments alike are due to the grace of God, â€” the faith of those who believe, and the patience of those who suffer, because the apostle spoke of both as given.
Then, again, there is the passage, especially noticeable, in which he says, " We, having the same spirit of faith," ^ for his phrase is not the knowledge of faith, but " the spirit of faith; " and he expressed himseK thus in order that we might understand how that faith is given to us, even when it is not sought, so that other blessings may be granted to it at its request. ' Eor "how," says he, "shall they call upon Him in whom they have not believed?"^ The spirit of grace, therefore, causes
CHAP. 29.] GRACE IS NOT MERITED. 43

US to have faith, in order that through faith we may, on praying for it, obtain the ability to do what we are commanded. On this account the apostle himself constantly puts faith before the law; since we are not able to do what the law commands unless we obtain the strength to do it by the prayer of faith.

Chap. 29. â€” God is able to coivert opposing wills, and to take away from the heart its hardness.

Xow if faith is simply the property of man's free-will, and is not the gift of God, why do we pray for those who will ' not believe that they may have faith ? This it would be absolutely useless to do, unless we believe, with perfect propriety, that Almighty God can turn to the practice of belief men's wills, however perverse and opposed to faith they may be. Man's free-will is addressed when it is said, " To-day, if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts."^ But if God were not able to remove from the human heart even its obstinacy and hardness. He would not commission the prophet to say," " I will take from them their heart of stone, and will , give them a heart of flesh."^ That all this was foretold in reference to the New Testament is shown clearly enough by the apostle when he says, " Ye are our epistle, . . .

written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in carnally " [or carnal, " carnalibus " ]
"tables of the heart."^ We must not, of course, suppose that such a phrase as this is used as if those might live "carnally" who ought to lead spiritual lives; but inasmuch as a stone has no feeling, with which man's hard heart is compared, what was there left Him to compare man's intelligent heart with the flesh, which possesses feeling ? God, speaking by the mouth of the prophet Ezekiel, says, " I will give them another heart, and I will put a new spirit within you; and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them a heart of flesh; that they may walk in my statutes, and keep mine ordinances, and do them: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God, saith the Lord." * ^-Kow can we possibly, without extreme absurdity, maintain that there has previously existed in any man the meritorious recommendation of a good will, to entitle him to the removal of his stony heart, when

1 Ps. xcT. 7, 8. ^=Ezek. xi. 19. ^ 2 Cor. iii. 2, 3. ^ Ezgk. si. 19, 20.
all the while this very heart of stone signifies nothing else than the harshest will, such as is absolutely inflexible against God? For wherever a good will precedes, there is, of course, no longer existing a heart of stone.

Chap. 30. â€” The grace by which the stony heart is removed is preceded not by any good deserts, but by evil ones. In what manner God's name is sanctified in the elect.

In another passage, also, by the same prophet, God, in the clearest language, shows us that it is not owing to any good deserts on the part of men, but for His own name's sake, that He effects these conversions. This is His language: "This I do, house of Israel, not for your sakes, but for mine holy name's sake, which ye have profaned among the heathen, whither ye went. And I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned among the heathen, which ye have profaned in the midst of them; and the heathen shall know that I am the Lord, saith the Lord God, when I shall be sanctified in you before their eyes. For I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land. Then will I sprinkle you with clean water, and ye shall be clean: from all your own filthiness, and from all your idols will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and the stony heart shall be taken away out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and will cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments, and do them."^' Now who is so blind as not to see, and who so stone-like as not to feel, that this grace is not given for any merits of a good will, when the Lord declares and testifies, " It is I, house of Israel, who do this," [not for your sakes], " but for my holy name's sake " ? Now why did He use such emphatic words as these, were it not that the nation should refrain from thinking that it was owing to their own good deserts that all these things were happening, as the Pelagians hesitate not unblushingly to say ? But there were not only no good deserts in the case, but the Lord shows that evil ones actually preceded His grace; for He says, " But for my holy name's sake, ivhich ye 1 Ezek. xxxvi. 22-27.

CHAP. 31.] FREE-WILL CO-OPERATES WITH GRACE. 45

have ^profaned among the heathen." Who can fail to observe how dreadful is the evil of profaning the Lord's ' own holy name ? And yet, because of this very name of mine, says He, which ye have profaned, I, even I, will make you good, but not for your own sakes; and, as He adds, " I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned among the heathen, which ye have profaned in the midst of them." He says that He sanctifies His name, which He had already declared to be holy \sanctum\ Well, this is just what we pray for in the Lord's Prayer â€” " Hallowed [sanctified] be Thy name." ^ We ask for the hallowing among men of that which is in itself undoubtedly always hallowed and sacred. Then it follows, " And the heathen shall know that I am the Lord, saith the Lord God, when I shall be sanctified in you." Although, then. He is Himself always sanctified and holy. He is, nevertheless, sanctified in those on whom He bestows His grace, by taking from them that stony heart of theirs by which they profaned the name of the Lord.

Chap. 31. [xv.] â€“ Free-will does something in the heart's conversion; God gives what He commands. In what sense it is said, "If thou wilt, thou shalt keep the commandments."

Lest, however, it should be thought that men themselves in this matter do nothing by their free-will, it is said in the Psalm, "Harden not your hearts;" and in Ezekiel himself, "Cast away from you all your transgressions, which ye have impiously committed against me; and make you a new heart and a new spirit; and keep all my commandments. Por why wilt ye die, house of Israel, saith the Lord? for I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God: wherefore turn yourselves, and live ye." We should remember that it is He who says, "Turn yourselves and live," to whom it is said in prayer, "Turn us again, God." * We should not forget that He says, "Cast away from you all your transgressions," when it is even He who justifies the ungodly. We should bear in mind that He says, "Make you a new heart and a new spirit," who also promises, "I will give you a new heart, and a new spirit will I put within you."* How is it, then, that He who says, "Make you," also says, "I will give you"? Why does He command, if He means Himself to give? Why does He give if man is to make, except it be that He gives what He commands when He helps him to obey upon whom He lays His command? ^ There is, however, always within us a free-will, â€“ but it is not always good; for it is either free from righteousness when it serves sin, â€“ and then it is evil, â€“ or else it is free from sin when it is the servant of righteousness, â€“ and then it is good. ^ But the grace of God is evermore good; and by its means it comes to pass that a man is under the influence of a good will, though he was previously possessed by an evil one. By the same grace it also comes to pass that the very will, which has now begun to be good, is enlarged, and grows so great as to be able to fulfil whatever divine commandments it may wish, when it has once firmly and completely formed its desire. This is the purport of what the Scripture says: "If thou wilt, thou shalt keep the commandments;" ^ so that' the man who has the will but not the power discovers that he does not yet possess a perfect will, and prays that he may have it so perfected that it may be sufficient for keeping the commandments; and then, indeed, he receives assistance enough to perform what he is commanded. The will is then of use when we have the power; just as the power is also then of use when we have the will.

For what does it profit us if we possess will without power, or else lack the will when we possess the power?

Chap. 32. [xvi.] â€” God commimds some things beyond our power, that w?

may know what we ought to ask of Him. In what sense it is rightly said that, if we like, i've keej) God's commandments.

The Pelagians think that they know something great and important when they assert that "God would not command what He knew could not be done by man." Who can be ignorant of this? But still God commands some things which we cannot do, in order that we may know what we ought to ask of Him. For this is faith itself, which obtains by prayer what the law commands. He, indeed, who said, " If thou wilt, thou shalt keep the commandments," did in the same book of Ecclesiasticus afterwards say, " Who shall

CHAP. S2.] WE WILL WHENEVER WE LIKE. 47

set a watch before my mouth, and a seal of wisdom upon my lips, that I fall not suddenly thereby, and that my tongue destroy me not." ^ Now he had certainly heard and received these commandments: " Keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile," ^ Forasmuch, then, as what he said is true: " If thou wilt, â€¢ thou shalt keep the commandments," why does he want a watch to be set before his mouth, like him who says in the Psalm, " Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth " ? ^ Why is he not satisfied with God's commandment and his own will, since, if he has the will, he shall keep the commandments? How many of God's commandments are directed against pride! He is quite aware of them; if he will, he may keep them. Why, therefore, does he shortly afterwards say, " God, Father and God of my life, give me not a proud look " ? * The law had long ago said to him, " Thou shalt not covet;" ^ let him then only will, and do what he is bidden, because, if he has the will, he shall keep the commandments. Why, therefore, does he afterwards say, " Turn away from me concupiscence " ? ^ Against luxury, too, how many commandments has God enjoined! Let a man observe them; because, if he will, he may keep the commandments. But what means that cry to God, " Let not the greediness of the belly nor lust of the flesh take hold on me! " ? ^ Now, if we were to put this question to him personally, he would very rightly answer us and say. From that prayer of mine, in which I offer this particular petition to God, you may understand in what sense I said, " If thou wilt, thou mayest keep the commandments." ^For it is certain that we keep the commandments when we will; but Jjceaus e the will is prepared by th e Lord, we must ask of Him for such aTforceof will as suffices to make us act in willing. It is certain that we iwill whenever we like, but it is He who makes us will what is good, of whom it is said (as he has just now expressed it),
"The will is prepared by the Lord." Of the same Lord it is said, " The steps of a [good] man are ordered by the Lord, and his way doth He will." Of the same Lord again it is said, " It is God who worketh in you, even to will; " It is certain that we act whenever we set to work; it is He, however, who causes us to act, by applying thoroughly efficacious powers to our will, who has said, " I will cause you to walk in my statutes, and to observe my judgments, and to do them." Wlien He says, " I will cause you ... to do them " [Faciam ut faciatis, " cause you to act "], what else does He say in fact than, " I will take away from you your heart of stone," from which used to arise your inability to act, " and I will give you a heart of flesh," in order that you may act? And what does this promise amount to but this: I will remove your hard heart, the spring of your former neglect of my commandments, and I will give you an obedient heart, which shall prompt you to keep them? It is He who causes us to keep them, to whom the human suppliant says, " Set a watch, Lord, before my mouth." That is to say: Make or enable me, Lord, to set a watch before my mouth, â€” a benefit which he had already obtained from God who thus described its influence: " I set a guard upon my mouth."

Chap. 33. [xvii.] â€” A good will, when small and weah; an ample will, great love. Operating and co-operating grace. The burden of human sufferings a heavy weight for an infirm will; a light one for charity.

He who wishes to keep God's commandment, but is unable to do so, already possesses a good will, but as yet a small and weak one; he will, however, become able when he shall have acquired a great and robust will. When the martyrs kept the great commandments which they obeyed, they acted under a mighty will, â€” that is, with a great love. Of this intense charity the Lord Himself thus speaks: " Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for liis friends." In accordance with this, the apostle also says, " He that loveth his neighbour hath fulfilled the law. For this: Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill,

1 Ps. xxxvii. 23. 2 phn. ii. 13. 3 Ezek. xxxvi. 27.

Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law. This perfection of love the Apostle Peter did not yet possess, when he for fear thrice denied the Lord. "There is no fear in love," says the Evangelist John in his first Epistle, "but perfect love casteth out fear." But yet, however small and imperfect his love was, it was not wholly wanting when he said to the Lord, "I will lay down my life for Thy sake;" for he supposed himself able to effect what he felt himself willing to do. And who was it that had begun to give him his love, however small, but He who prepares the human will, and perfects by His co-operation what He initiates by His operation? Forasmuch as He begins His influence by working in us that we may have the will, and completes it by working with us when We have the will. On which account the apostle says, "I am confident of this very thing, that He which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ." He operates, therefore, without us, in order that we may become willing; but when we once possess the will, and use it as to act, He co-operates with us. We can, however, ourselves do nothing to effect good works of piety without Him either working that we may will, or co-operating when we will.

Now, concerning the former point—His operation to produce will in us—it is said: "It is God which worketh in you, even to will." While of His co-operation with us, when we possess the will and proceed to put it into action, the apostle says, "We know that all things work together for good [or, He co-operates in all things for good] to them that love God." What does this phrase, "all things," mean, but the terrible and cruel sufferings which affect our condition?

That burden, indeed, of Christ, which is heavy for our infirmity, but becomes light to love, for to such dispositions did the Lord say that His burden was light/â€”such as Peter's was when he suffered for Christ, but not as it was when he denied Him.

Chap. 34. â€” The apostle's eulogy of love. Correction to he administered with love.

This charity, in other words, this will, glowing with intensest love, the apostle eulogizes with these words: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or the sword? (As it is written. For Thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter.) Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through Him that loved us. For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." ^ And in another passage he says, "And yet I show unto you a more excellent way. Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing. Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Charity never faileth."^ And a little afterwards he says, "And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity. Follow after charity." ^ He also says to the Galatians, "For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." ^ This is the same in effect as what he writes to the Eomans: "He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law." ^ In like manner he says to the Colossians, "And above all these things, put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness." ^ And to Timothy he writes, "Now the end of the commandment is charity; " and he goes on to describe the quality of this grace, saying, "Out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned." ^ Moreover, when he says to the Corinthians, "Let all your things be done with charity,"^ he shows plainly enough that even those chastisements which are deemed sharp and bitter by those who are corrected thereby, are to be administered with love. Accordingly, in another passage, after saying, "Warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak, be patient toward all men," he immediately added, "See that none render evil for evil unto any man." Therefore, even when the unruly are corrected, it is not rendering evil for evil, but contrariwise, good. However, what but charity worketh all these things?

Chap. 35. aë” Covimendations of love.

The Apostle Peter, likewise, says, "And, above all things, have fervent charity among yourselves; for charity shall cover the multitude of sins." The Apostle James also says, "If ye fulfill the royal law, according to the Scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well." So also the Apostle John says, "He that loveth his brother abideth in the right;" again, in another passage, "Whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother; for this is the message which we have heard from the beginning, that we should love one another." Then he says again, "This is His commandment, that we should believe on the name of His Son Jesus Christ, and love one another." Once more: "And this commandment have we from Him, that he who loveth God love his brother also." Then shortly afterwards he adds, "By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep His commandments; for this is the love of God, that we keep His commandments: and His commandments are not grievous." While, in his second Epistle, it is written, "Not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another." ^

Chap. 36. aë” Love commended by our Lord Himself.

Moreover, the Lord Jesus Himself teaches us that the whole law and the prophets depend upon the two precepts which enjoin love to God and love to our neighbour. Concerning these two commandments the following is written in the Gospel according to St. Mark: "And one of the scribes came, and having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that He had answered them well, asked Him:
Which is the first commandment of all? And Jesus answered him: The first of all the commandments is, Hear, Israel! The Lord our God is one Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.* This is the first commandment. And the second is like unto it: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.\^ There is none other commandment greater than these.\^ Also, in the Gospel according to St. John, He says, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love to one another."\^ Chap. 37. \[xviii.\] â€” The love which fulfils the commandments is not of ourselves, but of God. The law without grace is the letter that killeth.

All these commandments, however, respecting love or charity (which are so great, and such that whatever action a man may think he does well is by no means well done if done without charity) would be given to men in vain if they possess not a will to choose freely. But forasmuch as these precepts are given in the law, both old and new (although in the new came the grace which was promised in the old, the law, moreover, being without grace the letter which killeth, but under grace the Spirit which giveth life), from what source is there in men the love of God and of one's neighbour but from God Himself? For indeed, if it be not of God but of men, the Pelagians have gained the victory; but if it come from God, then we have vanquished the Pelagians. Let, then, the Apostle John sit in judgment between us; and let him say to us," Beloved, let us love one another."\^ Now, when they begin to extol themselves on these words of John, and to ask why this precept is addressed to us at all, if we have not ability of our own selves to love one another, the same apostle proceeds at once, to their confusion, to add, "For love is of God."\^ It comes not of ourselves, therefore, but it is of God."\^ Wherefore, then, is it said, "Let us love one another, for love is of God," unless it be as a precept to our free-will, admonishing it to seek the gift of God? Now, this would be indeed a thoroughly fruitless admonition if the will did not previously receive some donation of love, which might seek to be enlarged with such completeness as might fulfil whatever injunction was laid upon it. When it is said,
"Let us love one another," it is law; when it is said, "For love is of God," it is grace. For God's "wisdom carries law and mercy upon her tongue." Accordingly, it is written in the Psalm, "For He who gave the law will give blessings." *

Chap. 38. â€” We should not love God unless He first loved us. The apostles chose Christ because they were chosen; they were not chosen because they chose Christ.

Let no one, then, deceive you, my brethren, because we should not love God unless He first loved us. John again gives us the plainest proof of this when he says,* "We love Him because He first loved us." Grace makes us lovers of the law; but the law itself, without grace, makes us 'breakers of the law.' And nothing else than this is shown us by the words of our Lord when He says to His disciples,

54 A TREATISE ON GRACE AND FREE-WILL. [CHAP. 39

"Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you." ^ Tor if we first loved Him, in order that by this merit He might love us, then we first chose Him that we might deserve to be chosen by Him. He, however, who is the Truth says another thing, and flatly contradicts this vain conceit of men. "You have not chosen me," He says. If, therefore, you have not chosen me, undoubtedly you have not loved me (for how could they choose one whom they did not love ?). "But I," says He, "have chosen you." And then could they possibly help choosing Him themselves afterwards, and preferring Him to all the blessings of this world? But having been themselves chosen, they chose Him; yet it was not because they chose Him that they were themselves chosen. There could be no merit in men's choice of Christ, if it were not that God's grace was prevenient in His choosing them. Whence the Apostle Paul pronounces in the Thessalonians this benediction: "The Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men." ^ This benediction to love one another He gave us, who had also given us a law that we should love each other. Then, in another passage addressed to the same church, seeing that there now existed in some of its members the disposition which he had wished them to cultivate, he says, "We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith growth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth." ^ This he said lest they should make a boast of the great good which they were enjoying from God, as if they had it of their own mere selves. Because, then, your faith has so great a growth (this is the purport of his words), and the love of every one of you all toward each other so greatly abounds, we ought to thank God concerning you, but not to praise you, as if you possessed these gifts of yourselves.

Chap. 39. â€” The spirit of fear a great gift of God,
The apostle also says to Timothy, "For God hath not given to us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind." * Now in respect of this passage, indeed,

1 John XV. 16. 2 1 Thess. iii. 12. ^ 2 Tliess. i. 3. ^2 Tim. i. 7.

CHAP. 40. THE SPIRIT OF FEAR A GIFT. 55

of the apostle, we must be on our guard against supposing that we have not received the spirit of the fear of God, which is undoubtedly a great gift of God, and concerning which the prophet Isaiah says, "The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon thee, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and piety, the spirit of the fear of the Lord." ^ Now it is not the fear with which Peter denied Christ that we have received the spirit of, but of that fear concerning which Christ Himself says, "Fear Him who hath power to destroy both soul and body in hell; yea, I say unto you. Fear Him." ^ This, indeed. He said, lest we should deny Him from the same fear which shook Peter; for such cowardice He plainly wished to be removed from us when He, in the preceding passage, said, "Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do." ^ It is not of this fear that we have received the spirit, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. And of this spirit the same Apostle Paul discourses to the Romans:^""We glory in tribulations, knowing that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us." * Not by ourselves, therefore, but by the Holy Ghost' which is given to us, does it come to pass that, through the very action of that very love, which he shows us to be the gift of God, tribulation does not do away with patience, but rather produces it. 'Again, he says to the Ephesians, "Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith." ^ Great blessings these ! Let him tell us, however, whence they come. "From God the Father," says he immediately afterwards, "and the Lord Jesus Christ." These great blessings, therefore, are nothing else than God's gifts to us.

Chap. 40. [xix. ] â€” The dark ignorance of the Pelagians in maintaining that the knowledge of the laio comes from God, but that love comes from ourselves.

It is no wonder that light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not.Â® In John's Epistle the Light declares, "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God." ^ And in the Pelagian writings the darkness says, "Love comes to us of our own selves." Now, if they only possessed the true love, that is, Christian charity, they would also know whence they obtained possession of it; even as the apostle knew when he said, "But we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God."

John says, "God is love." ^ And thus the Pelagians affirm that they actually have, not God Himself from God, but from their own selves; and although they allow that we have the knowledge of the law from God, they will yet have it that love springs out of our very selves. Nor do they listen to the apostle when he says, "Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth." * Now what can be more absurd, nay, what more insane and more alien from the very sacredness of love itself, than to maintain that from God proceeds the knowledge which, apart from love, puffs us up, while the love which prevents the possibility of this inflation of knowledge springs from ourselves? And again, when the apostle speaks of "the love of Christ as surpassing knowledge," ^ what can be more insane than to suppose that the knowledge which must be subordinated to love comes from God, while the love which surpasses knowledge comes from man? The true faith, however, and sound doctrine declare that both graces are from God; the Scripture says,
"From the presence [of the Lord] cometh knowledge and understanding;" ^ and another Scripture says,
"Love is of God."^ We read of "the Spirit of wisdom and understanding." ^ Also of "the Spirit of power, and of love, and of a sound mind." ^ But love is a greater gift than, knowledge; for whenever a man has knowledge, love is necessary by the side of it, that he be not puffed up.
For "charity envieth not, vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up."

CHAP. 41.] SIN AS A PUNISHMENT. 57

Chap. 41. [xx.] â€” The loills of men are so much in the power of God, that He can turn them whithersoever it pleases Him. Some sins are the punishment of other sins.

I think I have now discussed the point fully enough in opposition to those who vehemently oppose the grace of God, which, however, does not take away the human will, but changes it from bad to good, and assists it when it is good. I think, too, that I have so discussed the subject that it is not so much I myself as the inspired Scripture which has spoken to you in the clearest testimonies of truth; and if this divine record be looked into carefully, it shows us that not only men's good wills, which God Himself converts from bad ones, and (when converted) directs to good actions and to eternal life, but also those which follow the world are so entirely at the disposal of God, that He turns them whithersoever He wills, and whencsoever He wills, â€” to bestow kindness on some, and to heap punishment on others, as He Himself judges right by a counsel most secret to Himself, indeed, but beyond all doubt most righteous.

For we find that some sins are even the chastisement of other sins, "as are those " vessels of wrath " which the apostle describes as " fitted to destruction;" as is also that obstinacy of Pharaoh, the purpose of which is said to be to set forth in him the power of God; as, again, is the flight of the Israelites from the face of the enemy before the city of Ai. Fear arose in their heart, so that they fled; and this took place that their sin might be punished in the way it was right that it should be; by reason of which the Lord said to Joshua the son of Nun,

" The children of Israel shall not be able to stand before the face of their enemies." ^

What is the meaning of, " They shall not be able to stand ? " ISTow, why of their own accord did they not stand firm, but, with a will perplexed by fear, took to flight, Avere it not that God has the lordship over men's wills, and when He is angry turns to fear and trembling whomsoever He pleases ? Was it not of their own accord that the enemies of the children of Israel abstained not from fighting against the people of God, as led by Joshua, the son of Nun ?

And yet the Scripture says, " It was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle,

' Rom. ix. 22. 2 ggg Ex. vii. 3, and x. 1. ^ ggg Josh. vii. 4, 12,
It was not by a positive command that He bade him, in which case his obedience would be praiseworthy, but He inclined the man's will, which had become debased by his own per-, verseness, to commit this heartless sin; [inclined it, I say.,] by His own just and secret judgment. Therefore it is said, " The Lord said unto him." Now if this person had obeyed an express command of God, he would have deserved to be praised rather than punished, as we know he was afterwards punished for this sin. Nor is the reason an obscure one why the Lord told him to curse David after this manner. " It may be," said the humbled king, " that the Lord will look on my humiliation, and will requite me good for his cursing this day." See, then, what proof we have here that God uses the hearts and minds of even wicked men for the praise and assistance of the good. ' Thus did he make use of Judas when betraying Christ; thus did He make use of the Jews when they crucified Christ. And how vast the blessings which from these instances He has bestowed upon the nations that should believe in Him! ^He also uses our worst enemy, the devil himself, but in the best way, to exercise and try the faith â– and piety of good men, â€” not for Himself indeed, who knows all things before they come to pass, but for our sakes, for whom it was necessary that such a discipline should be gone through with us. Could Absalom help choosing of his own will the counsel which was detrimental to him? And yet the real reason of his doing so was that the Lord had heard his father's prayer that it might be so; ' because the Scripture tells us that " the Lord appointed to defeat the good counsel of Ahithophel, to the intent that the Lord might bring all the evil upon Absalom." ^ It called Ahithophel's counsel " good^" because it was for the moment of advantage to his purpose. It was in favour of the son against his father, against whom he had rebelled; and might have crushed him, had not^" the Lord defeated the counsel which Ahithophel had given, by acting on the heart of Absalom in such a manner that he rejected this counsel, and chose another which was not expedient for him.

Chap. 42. [xxi.] â€” God does ivhatsoever He wills in the hearts of even wicked men.

Who can help trembling at those judgments of God by which He does in the hearts of even wicked men whatsoever He wills, at the same time rendering to every man according to their deeds? Eehoboam, the son of Solomon, rejected the wise and salutary counsel of the old men, to the effect that he should not deal harshly with the people, and preferred listening to the words of the young men of his own age, by returning a rough answer instead of the gentle one which he ought to have given. JSTow whence arose such conduct, except from his own wilfulness? Upon this, however, the ten tribes of Israel revolted from him, and chose for themselves another king, even Jeroboam, that the will of God in His anger might be accomplished which He had predicted would come to pass.^

For what says the Scripture? "The king hearkened not unto the people; for the cause was from the Lord, that He might perform His saying, which the Lord spake to Alijah the Shilonite concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat." ^ All this, indeed, was brought about by the will of man, although the cause was from the Lord. Read the books of the Chronicles,

' 2 Sam. xvii. 14. - 1 Kings xii. 8-14. ~ 1 Kings xii. 1.5.

60 A TREATISE ON GRACE AND FREE-WILL. [CHAP. 42.

and you will find the following passage in the second book:
"Moreover, the Lord stirred up against Jehoram the spirit of the Philistines, and of the Arabians, that were neighbours to the Ethiopians; and they came up to the land of Judah, and ravaged it, and carried away all the substance which was found in the king's house." ^

Here it is shown that God stirs up enemies to devastate the countries which He adjudges deserving of such chastisement. Still, did these Philistines and Arabians invade the land of Judah to waste it with no will of their own? Or were their movements so directed by their own will that the Scripture lies which tells us that "the Lord stirred up their spirit" to do all this?

Both statements to be sure are true, because they both came of their own accord, and yet the Lord stirred up their spirit; and this may also with equal truth be stated the other way: The Lord both stirred up their spirit, and yet they came of their own accord. For the Almighty sets in motion even in the innermost hearts of men their wills and inclinations, so that He does through their agency whatsoever He wills them to do.-À»â€”

even He who knows not how to will anything in unrighteousness. What, again, is the purport of that which the man of God said to King Amaziah: "Let not the army of Israel go with thee; for the Lord is not with Israel, even with all the children of Ephraim: for if thou shalt think to obtain with these, the Lord shall put thee to flight before thine enemies:

for God hath power either to strengthen or to put to flight"? ^

Now, how does the power of God help some in war by giving them confidence, and put others to flight by injecting fear into them, except it be that He who has made all things according to His own will, in heaven and on earth,^ also works continually in the hearts of men? We read also what Joash, king of Israel, said when he sent a message to Amaziah, king of Judah, who wanted to fight with him. After certain other words, he added, "Now tarry at home; why dost thou challenge me to thine hurt, that thou shouldst fall, even thou, and Judah with thee?" * Then the Scripture has added this sequel: "But Amaziah would not hear; for it came

1 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17. "^ 2 Cliron. xxv. 7, 8.

3 Ps. cxxxv. 6. * 2 Kings xiv. 10.
of God, that he might be delivered into the hands [of the enemy], because they sought after the gods of Edom."

Behold, now, how God, wishing to punish the sin of idolatry, operated in this man's heart (with whom He was indeed justly angry) not to listen to sound advice, but, despising it, to go to the battle, in which he with his army was routed. God says by the prophet Ezekiel, "If the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that prophet:

I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel."

Then there is the book of Esther, who was a woman of the people of Israel, and in the land of their captivity became the wife of the foreign King Ahasuerus. In this book it is written, that, being driven by necessity to interpose in behalf of her people, whom the king had ordered to be slain in every part of his dominions, she prayed to the Lord. So strongly was she urged by the necessity of the case, that she even ventured into the royal presence without the king's command, and contrary to her own custom. Now observe what the Scripture says: "He looked at her with fierce and intense indignation; and the queen was afraid, and her colour changed as she fainted; and she bowed herself upon the head of her delicate maiden which went before her. But God changed the king, and turned his indignation to gentleness." * The Scripture says in the Proverbs of Solomon, "Even as the rush of water, so is the heart of a king in God's hand; He will turn it in whatever way He shall choose." Again, in the 104th Psalm, in reference to the Egyptians, one reads what God did to them:

"And He turned their heart to hate His people, to deal subtilly with His servants."

Observe, likewise, what is written in the letters of the apostles. In the Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Romans occur these words: "Wherefore God gave them up to uncleanness, through the lusts of their own hearts;" and a little afterwards: "For this cause God gave them up unto vile affections;" again, in the next passage: "And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient." ^ So also in his second Epistle to the Thessalonians, the apostle says of sundry persons, " Inasmuch as they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved; therefore also God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness."

Chap. 43. â€” God operates on men's hearts to incline their wills whithersoever He leases.

From these statements of the inspired word, and from "similar passages which it would take too long to quote in full, it is, I think, sufficiently clear that God works in the hearts of men to incline them after the pleasure of His own will, whether to good deeds â€” according to His mercy, or to evil â€” after their own deserts; His own judgments indeed controlling them, which are sometimes manifest, sometimes secret, but always righteous. This ought to be the fixed and immoveable conviction of your heart, that there is no unrighteousness with God. Therefore, whenever you read in the Scriptures of Truth, that men are led aside, or that their hearts are blunted and hardened by God, never doubt that some ill deserts of their own have first occurred, so that they are justly requited with the delinquency and obduracy. Thus you will not run counter to that proverb of Solomon: " The foolishness of a man perverteth his ways, yet he blameth God in his heart." Grace, however, is not bestowed according to men's deserts; otherwise grace would be no longer grace.* For grace [gratia] is so designated because it is given freely [gratis]. Now if God is able, either through the agency of angels (whether good ones or evil), or in any other way whatever, to operate in the hearts even of the wicked, in return for their deserts, â€” whose wickedness He did not Himself create, but it was either derived originally from Adam, or grew through their own wilfulness, â€” what is there to wonder at if, through the Holy Spirit, He works good in the hearts of the elect, through whose' sole operation it was . that their hearts became good instead of evil ? "

CHAP. 44.] GRATUITOUS GEACE. 63

Chap. 44. [xxu.]â€”Gratuitous grace exempHJied in infants.

Men, however, may suppose that there are certain good deserts which they think previously exist, that they may he entitled to he justified through God's grace; all the while failing to see, when they express such an opinion, that they do nothing else than deny grace. But, as I have already remarked, let them think what they like respecting the case of adults, in the case of infants, at any rate, the Pelagians find no means of answering the difficulty, "^ Infants in receiving grace possess no will, from the influence of which they can pretend to any precedence of merit. We see, moreover, how they cry and struggle when they are baptized, and feel the sacred elements. Such conduct would, of course, be charged against them as a great impiety, if they were already ^endued with freedom of will; and notwithstanding this,
' grace cleaves to them even in their resisting struggles. ^
But most certainly there is no prevenient merit, otherwise the grace would be no longer grace. Sometimes, too, this grace is bestowed upon the children of unbelievers, when they happen by some means or other to fall, by reason of God's secret providence, into the hands of pious persons; but, on the other hand, the children of believers fail to obtain grace, some hindrance occurring to prevent the approach of help to rescue them in their danger. These things, no doubt, happen through the secret providence of God, whose judgments are unsearchable, and His ways past finding out. These are the words of the apostle; and you should observe what he had previously said, to lead him to add such a remark. He was discourseing about the Jews and Gentiles, when he wrote to the Eomans â€”themselves Gentiles â€” to this effect: "Tor as ye, in times past, have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief; even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy; for God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that He might have mercy upon all." ^ Now, after he had thought upon what he said, full of wonder at the certain truth of his own assertion, indeed, but astonished at its great depth, how God concluded all in unbelief, that He might have mercy upon all, â€” as if doing evil that good might come, â€” he at once exclaimed, and said, " the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God ! how unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out ! " ^ These unsearchable judgments and untraceable ways, indeed, perverse men, who never reflect but are ever prone to censure, being unable to understand, supposed the apostle to say, and censoriously gloriied over him for saying, " Let us do evil, that good may come ! " God forbid that the apostle should say so ! But men, without understanding, thought that so much was in fact said, whenever they heard these words of the apostle: " Moreover, the law entered, that the offence might abound; but^where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." ^ ' But grace, indeed, effects this purpose â€” that good works should now be wrought by those who previously did evil; not that they should persevere in evil courses, and suppose that they are recompensed with good. Their language, therefore, ought not to be: " Let us do evil, that good may come; " but: We have done evil, and good has come; let us henceforth do good, that in the future world we may receive good for good, who in the present life are receiving good for evil. " Wherefore it is written in the Psalm, " I will sing of mercy and judgment unto Thee, Lord." ^ When the Son of man, therefore, first came into the world, it was not to judge the world, but that the world through Him might be saved.* And this dispensation was for mercy; by and by, however, He will come for judgment â€” to judge the quick and the dead. And yet even in this present time salvation itself is not occurring without judgment â€” although it be a hidden one; therefore He says,

" For judgment I am come into this world, that they which see not may see, and that they which see may be made blind." ^

Chap. 45. [xxiii.] â€” The reason why one person is assisted by grace, and another is not helped, must he referred to the secret judgments of God.

'â€¢ You must refer the matter, then, to the hidden determinations of God, when you see, in one and the same condition, such as all infants imquestionably have, who derive their hereditary evil from Adam, that one is assisted so as to be baptized, and another is not helped, so that he dies in his very bondage of sin; and again, that one baptized person is left and forsaken in his present life, whom God foreknew that he would be ungodly, while another baptized person is taken away from this life, lest that wickedness should alter his understanding; and be sure that you do not in such cases ascribe unrighteousness or want of wisdom to God, in whom is the very fountain of righteousness and wisdom, but, as I have exhorted you from the commencement of this treatise, wherefore you have already attained, walk therein; and even this shall God reveal unto you, if not in this life, yet certainly in the next, for there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed. When, therefore, you hear the Lord say, I the Lord have deceived that prophet, and likewise what the apostle says: He hath mercy on whom He will have mercy, and whom He will He hardeneth, believe that, in the case of him whom He permits to be deceived and hardened, his evil deeds have deserved the judgment; whilst in the case of him to whom He shows mercy, you should loyally and unhesitatingly recognise the grace of the God who rendereth not evil for evil; but contrariwise blessing. Nor should you withdraw from Pharaoh his free-will, because in several passages God says, I have hardened Pharaoh; or, I have hardened or I will harden Pharaoh's heart; for it does not by any means follow that Pharaoh did not, on this account, harden his own heart. The truth is, that this is actually said of him, after the removal of the fly-plague from the Egyptians, in these words of the Scripture: And Pharaoh hardened his Heart at this time also; neither would he let the people go. Thus it was that both God, by His just judgment, and Pharaoh, by his own freewill, were both engaged in the work of induration. Be ye then well assured that your labour will never be in vain, if, setting before you a good purpose, you persevere in it to the last. Tor God, who does not render simply to those whom He liberates according to their deeds, will then " recompense every man according to his works." ^ God will, therefore, certainly recompense both evil for evil, because He is just; and good for evil, because He is good; and good for good, because He is good and just; only, evil for good He will never recompense, because He is not unjust. He will, therefore, recompense evil for evil â€” punishment for unrighteousness; and good for evil â€” grace for grace.

Chap. 46. [xxiv.] â€” Understanding and wisdom must be sought from God.

Peruse attentively this treatise, and if you understand it, give God the praise; but where you fail to understand it, pray for understanding, for God will give you this faculty. Remember what the Scriptures say: " If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given to him." ^ Wisdom itself cometh down from above, as the Apostle James himself tells us.^ There is, however, another wisdom, which you must repel from you, and pray against its remaining in you; this the same apostle expressed his detestation of when he said, " But if ye have bitter envying and strife in your hearts, . . . this is not the wisdom which descendeth from above, but is earthly, sensual, devilish. For wherever there is envying and strife, there is also confusion, and every evil work. But the wisdom which is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good works, without partiality, and without hypocrisy." * What blessing, then, will that man not have who has prayed for this wisdom and obtained it of the Lord ?
And from this you may understand what grace is; because if this wisdom were of ourselves, it would not be from above; nor would it be an object to be asked for of the God who

I WROTE again to the same persons another treatise, which I entitled De Coeptione et Gratia ["On Behuke and Grace"], because I had been told that some one there had said â€” that no man ought to be rebuked for not doing God's commandments, but that prayer only should be made on his behalf, that he may do them. This book begins on this wise, "I have read your letters, dearly beloved brother Valentine."

A TREATISE ON EEBUEE AND GRACE.

By AUEELIUS AUGUSTINE, Bishop of Hippo,

IN" ONE BOOK.
IN THE BEGINNING THE WRITER SETS FORTH WHAT IS THE CATHOLIC FAITH CONCERNING LAW, CONCERNING FREE-WILL, AND CONCERNING GRACE.
HE TEACHES THAT THE GRACE OF GOD BY JESUS CHRIST IS THAT BY WHICH ALONE MEN ARE DELIVERED FROM EVIL, AND WITHOUT WHICH THEY DO
ABSOLUTELY NO GOOD; AND THIS NOT ONLY BY THE FACT THAT IT MANI-FESTS WHAT IS TO BE DONE, BUT THAT IT ALSO SUPPLIES THE MEANS OF DOING IT WITH LOVE, SINCE GOD BESTOWS ON MEN THE INSPIRATION OF A GOOD WILL AND DEED. HE TEACHES THAT THE REBUKE OF EVIL MEN WHO HAVE NOT RECEIVED THIS GRACE IS NEITHER UNRIGHTEOUS â€” SINCE THEY ARE EVIL BY THEIR OWN WILL â€” NOR USELESS, ALTHOUGH IT MUST BE CONFESSED THAT IT IS ONLY BY GOD'S AGENCY THAT IT CAN AVAIL.
THAT PERSEVERANCE IN GOOD IS TRULY A GREAT GIFT OF GOD, BUT THAT STILL
THE REBUKE OF ONE WHO HAS NOT PERSEVERED MUST NOT ON THAT AC-COUNT BE NEGLECTED; AND THAT IF A MAN WHO HAS NOT RECEIVED THIS GIFT SHOULD RELAPSE OF HIS OWN WILL INTO SIN, HE IS NOT ONLY DESERV-ING OF REBUKE, BUT IF HE SHOULD CONTINUE IN EVIL UNTIL HIS DEATH, HE IS MOREOVER WORTHY OF ETERNAL DAMNATION. THAT IT IS INSCRUT-ABLE WHY ONE SHOULD RECEIVE THIS GIFT AND ANOTHER SHOULD NOT RECEIVE IT. THAT OF THOSE WHO ARE PREDESTINATED NONE CAN PERISH.
AND THAT THE PERSEVERANCE, WHICH ALL DO NOT RECEIVE WHO ARE HERE CALLED CHILDREN OF GOD, IS CONSTANTLY GIVEN TO ALL THOSE WHO ARE TRULY CHILDREN BY GOD'S FOREKNOWLEDGE AND PREDESTINATION.
HE ANSWERS THE QUESTION WHICH SUGGESTS ITSELF CONCERNING ADAM â€”
IN WHAT WAY HE SINNED BY NOT PERSEVERING, Since he did not receive perseverance. He shows that such assistance was at the first given to him, as that without it he could not continue if he would, not that with it it must result that he would. But that now through Christ is given us not only such help as that without it we cannot continue even if we will, but moreover such and so

69

VO A TREATISE ON EEBUKE AND GRACE. [CIIAP. 1

GREAT AS THAT BY IT WE WILL. He proves that the number of the predestinated, to whom a gift of this kind is appropriated, is certain, and can neither be increased nor diminished. And since it is unknown who belongs to that number, and who does not, that medicinal rebuke must be applied to all who sin, lest they should either themselves perish, or be the ruin of others. Finally, he concludes that neither is rebuke to be checked by grace, nor is grace to be denied by rebuke.

CiiAP. 1. [i.] â€” Introductory, addressed to Valentine, etc.

I HAVE read your letters â€” Valentine, my dearly beloved brother, and you who are associated with him in the service of God â€” which your love sent [to me] by brother riorius and those who came to us with him; and I gave God thanks that I have known your peace in the Lord, and the agreement in the truth and order in love [evidenced] in your discourse delivered to us. But that an enemy has striven among you to the subversion of some, has, by the mercy of God and His marvellous goodness in turning those arts to the advantage of His servants, rather availed to this result, that while none of your friends were cast down for the worse, some were built up for the better. There is therefore no need to reconsider again and again all that I have already transmitted to you, sufficiently argued out in a lengthy treatise;^ for your replies indicate how you have received this. Nevertheless, do not in any wise suppose that, when once read, it can have become sufficiently well known to you. Therefore if you desire to have it exceedingly productive, do not count it a grievance by re-perusal to make it thoroughly familiar; so that you may most accurately^ know what and what kind of questions they are, for the solution and satisfaction of which there arises an authority not human but divine, from which we ought not to depart if we desire to attain to the point whither we are tending.
Chap. 2. â€“ The Catholic faith concerning law, grace, and free-will.

Now the Lord Himself not only shows us from what evil we should decline, and what good we should do, which is all

1 Or according to some Mss., " progress."
^ Treatise on Grace and Free-Will, see supra, ' Or, "most clearly."

CHAP. 3] LAW, GRACE, AND FREE-WILL. 71

that the letter of the law is able to effect; but He moreover helps us that we may decline from evil and do good,^ which none can do without the Spirit of grace; and if this be wanting, the law comes in merely to make us guilty and to slay us. It is on this account that the apostle says, " The letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life."^ He, then, who lawfully uses the law learns therein evil and good, and if he do not confide in his own strength, flees to grace, by the help of which he may decline from evil and do good. But who is there who flees to grace except when "the steps of a man are ordered by the Lord, and He shall determine his way" ? ^
And by this means also the desire of the help of grace is the beginning of grace; of which, says he [the Psalmist], " And I said, Now I have begun; this is the change of the right hand of the Most High."* It is to be confessed, therefore, that we have free choice to do both evil and good; but in doing evil every one is free from righteousness and a servant of sin, while in doing good no one can be free, unless he have been made free by Him who said, " If the Son shaU make you free, then you shall be free indeed."^ ISTeither is it thus, that when any one has been made free from the dominion of sin, he no longer needs the help of his Deliverer; but rather thus, that hearing from Him, "Without me ye can do nothing,"^ he himself also says to Him, " Be thou my helper! Forsake me not."^ I rejoice that I have found in our brother Florus also this faith, which without doubt is the true and prophetic AND APOSTOLICAL AND CATHOLIC FAITH; whence thoSC are the rather to be corrected â€” whom indeed I now think to have been corrected by the favour of God â€” who did not understand him.

Chap. 3. [ii.] â€“ What the grace of God through Jesus Christ is.

For the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord must be apprehended, â€“ as that by yii ch alone men are .deliveredd from evil, and without wMch_thex<^o absolutely no good thing, whether in thoughtâ€“ or will and affection, or in action;

^ Ps. xxxra. 27. - 2 Cor. iii. 6. ^ Ps. xxxvii. 23.

in order not only that they may know, by the manifestation of that grace, what should be done, but moreover that, by its enabling, they may do with love what they know.
Certainly the apostle asked for this inspiration of good will and deed on behalf of those to whom he said, "Now we pray to God that ye do no evil, not that we should appear a]proved, but that ye should do that which is good."^ Who can hear this and not awake and confess that we have it from the Lord God that we turn aside from evil and do good ?
ã€”since the apostle indeed says .not, We admonish, we teach, we exhort, we rebuke; but he says, *" We pray to God that ye do no evil, but that ye should do that which is good."^ And yet he was also in the habit of speaking to them, and doing all those things which I have mentioned, â€” he admonished, he taught, he exhorted, he rebuked. But he knew that all these things which he was doing in the way of planting and watering on the surface^ were of no avail unless He who giveth the increase in secret should give heed to his prayer on their behalf.
Because, as .the same teacher of the Gentiles says, " Neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase."^'

Chap. 4. â€” The children of God are led by the Spirit of God.

Let those, therefore, not deceive themselves who say, Wherefore is it preached and prescribed to us that we should turn away from evil and do good, if it is not we that do this, but " God who worketh in us to will and to do it" ?^ But let them rather understand that if they are the children of God, they are led by the Spirit of God^ to do that which should be done; and when they have done it, let them give thanks to Him by whom they act. For they are influenced that they may act, not that they may themselves do nothing; and in addition to this, it is shown them what they ought to do, so that when they have done it as it ought to be done â€” that is, with the love and the delight of righteousness â€” they may rejoice in having received " the sweetness which the Lord has given, that their ^ land should yield her increase."' But when they do not act, ^Yhether by not doing at all or by not doing from love, let them pray that what as yet they have not, they may receive. For what shall they have which they shall not receive? or what have they which they have not received?

Chap. 5. [iir.] â€” Rebuke must not be neglected.

"Then," say they, "let those who are over us only prescribe to us what we ought to do, and pray for us that we may do it; but let them not rebuke and censure us if we should not do it." Certainly let all such things be done, since the teachers of the churches, the apostles, were in the habit of doing all such things, â€” as well of prescribing what things should be done, as of rebuking if they were not done, and of praying that they might be done. The apostle enjoins, saying, "Let all your things be done with charity."^ He rebukes, saying, "NOW therefore there is utterly a fault among you, because ye have judgments among yourselves. For why do ye not rather suffer wrong? Why are ye not rather defrauded? Nay, ye do wrong and defraud; and that, your brethren. Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not possess the kingdom of God?"^ Let us hear him also praying: "And the Lord," says he, "multiply you, and make you to abound in love one towards another and towards all men."^ He prescribes that love should be maintained; he rebukes, because love is not indulged; he prays that love may abound. man! learn in his precept what you ought to possess; learn in his rebuke that it is by your own fault that you possess it not; learn in his prayer whence you may receive what you desire to have.

Chap. 6. [iv.] â€” Objections to the use of rebuke.

"In what way," says he [the semi-Pelagian], "is it regarded as my fault that I have not what I have not received from Him, by whom unless it is given, there is no other at all whence such and so great a gift can be had?" Suffer me a little, my brethren, not as against you whose heart is right with God,^ Some Mss. have "his land." - Ps. Ixxxv. 12. ' 1 Cor. iv. 7.

but as against those who mind earthly things, or as against those human modes of thinking themselves, to contend for the truth of the heavenly and divine grace. For they who say this are such as in their wicked works are unwilling to be rebuked by those who proclaim this grace. "Prescribe to me what I shall do, and if I should do it, give thanks to God for me who has given me to do it; but if I do it not, I must not be rebuked, but He must be besought to give what He has not given; that is, that very believing love of God and of my neighbour by which His precepts are^ observed. Pray, then, for me that I may receive this, and may by its means do freely and with good will that which He commands. But I should be justly rebuked if by my own fault I had it not; that is, if I myself could give it to myself, or could receive it, and did not do so, or if He should give it and I should be unwilling to receive it. " But since even the will itself is prepared^ by the Lord, why dost thou rebuke me because thou seest me unwilling to do His precepts, and dost not rather ask Him Himself to work in me the will also? " ^

Chap. 7. [v.] â€” The necessity and advantage of rebuke.

To this we answer: whoever you are that do not the commandments of God that are already known to you, and do not wish to be rebuked/ you must be rebuked even for that very reason that you do not wish to be rebuked. For you do not wish that your faults should be shown to you; you do not wish that they should be touched, and that such a salutary pain should be caused you that you may seek the Physician; you do not desire to be shown to yourself, that, seeing yourself to be deformed, you may wish for the Eeformer, and may supplicate Him that you may not continue in that repulsiveness. For it is your fault that you are evil; and it is a greater fault to be unwilling to be rebuked because you are evil, as if faults should either be praised or regarded with indifference, so as neither to be praised nor blamed, or as if, indeed, the dread, or the shame, or the suffering of the rebuked man were of no avail, or were of any other avail in health-

* Prov. xvi. 1.

CHAP. a] THE BENEFIT OF EEBUK. 75

fully stimulatiig, except to cause that He who is good may be besought, and so out of evil men who are rebuked may make good men who may be praised. ^ For what he who will not be rebuked desires to be done for him, when he says. Pray for me rather â€” he must be rebuked for that very reason that he may himself also do for himself; because Hhat suffering with which he is dissatisfied with himself when .i.e feels the sting of rebuke, stirs him up to a desire for more earnest prayer, that, by God's mercy, he may be aided by the increase of love/and cease to do things which are shameful and grievous, and do things praiseworthy and gladly to be acknowledged. This is the benefit of rebuke that is wholesomely apphed, sometimes with greater, sometimes with less severity, in accordance with the diversity of sins, and it is then wholesome when the supreme Physician looks down [on the application]. For it avails nothing unless when it makes a man repent of his sin. And who gives this but He who looked upon the Apostle Peter when he denied,^ and made him weep ? Whence also the Apostle Paul, after he said that they were to be rebuked Math moderation who thought otherwise, immediately added, " Lest perchance God give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth, and they recover themselves out of the snares of the devil." ^

Chap. 8. â€” Further replies to those who object to rebuke.
But wherefore do they, who are unwilling to be rebuked, say, "Only prescribe to me, and pray for me that I may do what you prescribe"? Why do they not rather, in accordance with their own evil inclination, reject these things also, and say, I neither wish you to prescribe to me, nor to pray for me? For what man is shown to have prayed for Peter, that God should give him the repentance wherewith he bewailed the denial of his Lord? What man instructed Paul in the divine precepts which pertain to the Christian faith? When, therefore, he was heard preaching the gospel, and saying, "For I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man. For I neither received it from man, nor did I learn it, but by the revelation of Jesus ^ Luke xxii. 61. = 2 Tim. ii. 25.

76 A TREATISE ON REBUKE AND GRACE. [CHAP. 9.

Christ," ^ ā¢” would it be replied to him: Why are you troubling us to receive and to learn from you that which you have not received nor learnt from man? He who gave to you is able also to give to us in like manner as to you. Moreover, if they dare not say this, but suffer the gospel to be preached to them by man, although it cannot be given to man by man, let them concede also that they ought to be rebuked by those who are set over them, by whom Christian grace is preached; although* it is not denied that God is able, even when no man rebukes, to correct whom He will, and to lead him on to the wholesome suffering of repentance by the most hidden and mighty power of His medicine. And as we are not to cease from prayer on behalf of those whom we desire to be corrected, ā¢” even although without any man's prayer on behalf of Peter, the Lord looked upon him and caused him to bewail his sin, ā¢” so we must not neglect rebuke, although God can make those whom He will to be corrected, even when not rebuked.

But a man then profits by rebuke when He pities and aids, ā¢” who makes those whom He will to profit even without rebuke. But wherefore these are called to be reformed in one way, those in another way, and others in still another way, after different and innumerable manners, be it far from us to assert I that it is the business of the clay to judge, but of the potter."

Chap. 9. [vr.] ā¢” WJnj they may justly be rebuked who do not obey God, although they have not yet received the grace of obedience.

The apostle says, say they, "For who maketh thee to differ? And what hast thou that thou hast not received?

Now also if thou hast received it, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received it? " ^ " Why, then, are we rebuked, censured, reproved, accused? What do we do if we have not received?" They who say this wish to appear beyond blame in respect of their not obeying God, because assuredly obedience itself is His gift; and that gift must of necessity be in him in whom dwells love, which without doubt is of God, and the Father gives it to His children. " This," say they, " we have not received. ^ Why, then, are we rebuked, as if we were able to give it to ourselves, and of our own choice would not give it ? "
1 Gal. i. 11. * 2 Cor. iv. 7.

CHAP. 10.] THE RESULT OF REBUKE. 77

And they do not observe that, if they are not yet regenerated, the chief reason why, when they are reproached for their disobedience to God, they ought to be dissatisfied with themselves is, that God made man upright from the beginning of the human creation, and there is no unrighteousness with God.

And thus the first depravity, whereby God is not obeyed, is of man, because, falling by his own evil will from the rectitude in which God at first made him, he became depraved. But is not such depravity as that to be rebuked in a man because it is not peculiar to him who is rebuked, but is common to all? Yes, indeed, let it also be rebuked in individuals, if it is common to all. For the circumstance that none is altogether free from it is no reason why it should not attach to each man. Those original sins, indeed, are said to be the sins of others, because individuals derived them from their parents; but they are not unreasonably said to be our own also, because in that one [parent], as the apostle says, all have sinned. ^ Let, then, the damnable source be rebuked, that from the pain of rebuke may spring the will of regeneration, â€”

if, indeed, he who is rebuked is a child of promise, â€” in order that, by the noise of the rebuke sounding and lashing from without, God may by His hidden inspiration work in liim from within to will also. If, however, being already regenerate and justified, he relapses of his own will into an evil life, assuredly he cannot say, " I have not received," because of his own free choice to evil he has lost the grace of God, that he had received. And if, stung with compunction by rebuke, he wholesomely bewails [his sin], and returns to good works similar [to his first], or even better, certainly here most manifestly appears the advantage of rebuke. " But _yet for rebuke by the agency of man to avail., whether it be of love or not, depends only upon God, ^

Chap. 10. â€” All perseverance is God's gift.

Is such an one as is unwilling to be rebuked still able to say, " What have I done since I have not received ? " when it appears plainly that he has received, and by his own fault has lost that which he has received. " I am able," says he, " I am altogether able, “when you reprove me for having of my own will relapsed from a good life into a bad one, “still to say, â– “What have I done, seeing that I have not received? For’ I received faith, which worketh by love, but therein I have not

I received perseverance to the end. Will any one dare to , say that such a perseverance as that is not the gift of God, and that so great a possession as this is ours in such wise that if any one have it the apostle could not say to him, ’ For what hast thou, which thou hast not received ?” since he has this in such a manner as that he has not received it ? “To this, indeed, we are not able to give a denial, that perseverance in good, progressing even to the end, is also a great gift of God; and that it is not [given] save by Him of whom it is written,

" Every best gift and every perfect gift is from above, coming

â€” down from the Father of lights." ^But the rebuke of him who has not persevered must not on that account be neglected, ”lest God perchance give unto him repentance, and he recover himself from the snares of the devil; " ^since to the usefulness of rebuke the apostle has subjoined this decision, saying, as I have above mentioned, " Eebuking with moderation those that think differently, lest at any time God 1 give them repentance."* For if we should say that such a perseverance, so laudable and so blessed, is man's in such wise as that he has it not from God, we first of all make void that which the Lord says to Peter: " I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not." ^For what did He ask for him, but perseverance to the end ? And assuredly, if a man could have this from man, it should not have been asked from God.
Then when the apostle says, " Now we pray to God that ye do no evil,” ” beyond a doubt he prays to God on their behalf for â– perseverance. For neither does he do no evil who forsakes good, nor is he persevering in good who is inclined to evil, from which he ought to turn aside. ^In that place, moreover, where he says, ” I thank my God in every remembrance of you, always in every prayer of mine for you all making

^ 1 Cor. iv. 7. 2 j.^3 iij s 2 Tim. ii. 25.

request with joy for your fellowship in the gospel from the first day until now, being confident of this very thing, that He who has begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ," what else does he promise to them from the mercy of God than perseverance in good to the end?

And again where he says, "Epaphras saluteth you, who is one of you, a servant of Christ Jesus, always striving for you in prayer, that you may stand perfect and fulfilled in all the will of God," what is "that you may stand," but "that you may persevere"? "Whence it was said of the devil, "He continued not in the truth;" * because he was there, but he did not continue. For assuredly those [above spoken of] were already standing in the faith. And when we pray that he who stands may stand, we do not pray for anything else than that he may persevere. Jude the apostle, again, when he says, "Now unto Him that is able to keep you without offence, and to establish you before the presence of His glory, immaculate in joy," does he not most manifestly show that perseverance in good unto the end is God's gift? For what but a good perseverance does He give who preserves without offence that He may place before the presence of His glory immaculate in joy? What is it, moreover, that we read in the Acts of the Apostles: "And when the Gentiles heard, they rejoiced and received the word of the Lord; and as many as were ordained to eternal life believed"? Who could be ordained to eternal life save by the gift of perseverance?

And when [we read], "He that shall persevere unto the end shall be saved;" "with what salvation but that which is eternal? And when, in the Lord's Prayer, we say to God the Father, "Hallowed be thy name," what do we ask but that His name may be hallowed in us? And as this is already accomplished by means of the laver of regeneration, why is it daily asked by believers, except that in that which is already done in us [they seek] that we may persevere?

For the blessed Cyprian also understands this in this manner,

'Many MSS. read "communication." * Phil. i. 3, et seq.

^ According to Albin: *' Except that what is done in us may continue in us."

80 A TREATISE ON EEBUKE AND GRACE. [CHAP. 11.

inasmuch as, in his exposition of the same prayer, he says: "We say, 'Hallowed be thy name,' not that we wish for God that He may be hallowed by our prayers, but that we ask of God that His name may be hallowed in us. But by whom is God sanctified, since He Himself sanctifies? Well, because He said, 'Be ye holy, since I also am holy; 'â– ^ we ask and entreat that we who have been sanctified in baptism may persevere in that which we have begun to be." ^ Behold the most glorious martyr is of this opinion, that what in these words Christ's faithful people are daily asking is, that they may persevere in that which they have begun to be. And no one need doubt, but that whosoever prays from the Lord that he may persevere in good, confesses thereby that such perseverance is His gift.

Chap. 11. [vii.] â€” They who have not received the gift of perseverance, and have relapsed into mortal sin and have died therein, must righteously be condemned.

If, then, these things be so, we still rebuke those, and reasonably rebuke them, who, although they were living well, have not persevered therein; because they have of their own will been changed from a good to an evil course of life, and on that account [are worthy] of rebuke; and if rebuke should be of no avail to them, and they should persevere in their ruined life until death, they are also deserving of divine condemnation for ever. Neither shall they excuse themselves, saying, â€” as now they say. Wherefore are we rebuked? â€” so then. Wherefore are we condemned, since indeed (-[as a reason] that we should return from good to evil) we have not received that perseverance by which we should abide in good?

They shall by no means deliver themselves by this excuse from righteous condemnation. For if, according to the word of truth, no one is delivered from the condemnation which was incurred through Adam except through the faith of Jesus Christ, and yet from this condemnation they shall not deliver themselves who shall be able to say that they have not heard the gospel of Christ, since " faith cometh by hearing/ ^- how much less shall they deliver themselves who shall say. We have not received perseverance! For the excuse of those who say. We have not received hearing, seems more equitable than that of those who say, We have not received perseverance; since 4t may be said, man, in that which thou hast heard and kept, in that thou mightest persevere if thou wouldest;\^but in no wise can it be said, That which thou hast not heard thou mightest believe if thou wouldest.

Chap. 12. â€“ They who have not received perseverance are not distinguished from the mass of those that are lost.

And, consequently,' both those who have not heard the gospel; and those who, having heard it and been changed by it for the better, have not received perseverance; and those who, having heard the gospel, have refused to come to Christ, that is, to believe on Rim, since He Himself says, " No man cometh unto me, except it were given him of my Father;"\^ and jthoe .who by their tender age were unable to believe, but might be absolved from original sin by the alone washing of regeneration, and yet have not received this washing, and have perished in death, are not distinguished from that mass which it is plain is condemned, as all go from One into condemnation. Some are distinguished, however, not by their own merits but by the grace of the Mediator; that is to say, they are justified freely in the blood of the second Adam. 'Therefore, when we hear, "For who maketh thee to differ? and what hast thou that thou hast not received? Now, if thou hast received it, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received it?"' we ought to understand that from that mass of perdition which originated through the first Adam, no one can be made to differ except he who has this gift, [which] whosoever has, has received by the grace of the Saviour. â– ^And this apostolical testimony is so considerable, that the blessed Cyprian writing to Quirinus put it in the place of a title, when he says, "That we must boast in nothing, since nothing is our own." *

demnation by such Lounty of divine grace, there is no doubt but that for such it is provided that they should hear the gospel, and when they hear they believe, and in the faith which worketh by love they persevere unto the end; and if, perchance, they deviate from the way, when they are rebuked they are amended; and some of them, although they may not be rebuked by men, return into the path which they had left; and some who have received grace in any age whatever are withdrawn from the perils of this life by swiftness of death.

For He worketh all things in them who made them vessels of mercy, who also elected them in His Son before the foundation of the world by the election of grace: "And if by grace, I then is it no more of works, otherwise grace is no more grace." ^

For they were not called in such a manner as that they shoiild not be elected, in respect of which {scil. such a calling} it is said,

" For many are called but few are chosen; "^ but because they were called according to the purpose, they are of a certainty also elected by the election, as it is said, of grace, not of any precedent merits of theirs, because to them grace is all their merit.

A Chap. 1 4. â€” None of the elect and -predestinated can jnerisJi.
Of such says the apostle, ""We know that to those that love God He worketh together all things for good, to them who are called according to His purpose; because those whom He before foreknew, He also did predestinate, conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the firstborn among many brethren. Moreover, whom He did predestinate, them He also called; and whom He called, them He also justified; and whom He justified, them He also glorified." ^ Of these no one perishes, because all are elected. And they are elected because they were called according to the purpose, however, not their own, but God's; of which He elsewhere says, " That the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of Him that calleth, it was said unto her that the elder shall serve the younger."^ And in another place he says, "Not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace."^ ^

CHAP. 15.] EELATION OF ELECTION TO CALLING. 83

When, therefore, we hear, " Moreover, whom He did predestinate, them He also called,"^ we ought. to acknowledge that they were called according to His purpose; since He thence began, saying, " He worketh together all things for good to those who are called according to His purpose," and then added, " Because those whom He before foreknew, He also did predestinate, conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the first-born among many brethren." And to these promises He added, " Moreover, whom He did predestinate, them He also called." He wishes these, therefore, to be understood whom He called according to His purpose, lest any among them should be thought to be called and not chosen, on account of that sentence of the Lord's: " Many are called but few are chosen." ^ For whoever are elected are without doubt also called; but not whosoever are called are as a consequence elected. Those, then, are elected, as has often been said, who are called according to the purpose, who are also predestinated and foreknown. If any one of these perishes, God is mistaken; but none of them perishes, because God is not mistaken. If any one of these perish, God is overcome by human sin; but none of them perishes, because God is overcome by nothing. Moreover, they are elected to reign with Christ, not as Judas was elected, to a work for which he was fitted. Because he was chosen by Him who well knew how to make use even of wicked men, so that even by his damnable deed that venerable work, for the sake of which He Himself had come, might be accomplished. When, therefore, we hear, " Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil ? " ^ we ought to understand that the rest were elected through mercy, but He through judgment; those to obtain His kingdom. He to shed His blood !

Chap. 15. â€” Perseverance is given to the end.
Eightly follows the word to the kingdom of the elect: " If God be for us, who can be against us ? He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how has He not also with Him given us all things ? Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect ? God who justifieth ? Who condemneth ? Christ who died ? yea, rather who rose again also, who is at the right hand of God, who also soliciteth on our behalf ? " ^ And of how stedfast a perseverance even to the end they have received the gift, let them follow on to say:

" Who shall separate ns from the love of Christ ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword ? As it is written, Because for thy sake we are kUed all the day long, we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter. Bat in all these things we are more than conquerors, through Him that hath loved us. For I am certain, that neither death, nor life, nor angel, nor principality, nor things present, nor things to come, nor power, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." ^

Chap. 16. â€” Whosoever do not persevere are not distinguished fi-om the mass of perdition hy predestination.

Such as these were they who were signified [in the Epistle] to Timothy, where, when it had been said that Hymenseus and Philetus had subverted the faith of some, it is presently added, "Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord has known them that are His." ^
The faith of these, which worketh by love, either actually does not fail at all, or, if there are any whose faith fails, it is restored before their life is ended, and the iniquity which had intervened is done away, and perseverance even to the end is allotted to them. But they who are not about to persevere, and who shall so fall away from Christian faith and conversation that the end of this life shall find them in that case, beyond all doubt are not to be reckoned in the number of those above mentioned, even in that season wherein they are living well and piously. For they are not made to differ from that mass of perdition by the foreknowledge and predestination of God, and therefore are not called according to God's purpose, and thus are not elected; but are called among those of whom it was said, " Many are called," not among those of whom it was said, " But few are chosen." And yet who can deny that they are elected, since they believe and are baptized, and live according to God ? Manifestly, they are called elect by those who are ignorant what they shall be, but not by Him who knew that they would not have the perseverance which leads the elect forward into the blessed life, and knows that they will so stand, as He would have foreknown that they would fall.

Chap. 17. [viii.] â€” Why perseverance should be given to one and not another is inscrutable.

Here, if I am asked why God should not have given them perseverance to whom He gave that love by which they might live as Christians, I answer that I do not know. For I do not speak arrogantly, but with acknowledgment of my small measure, when I hear the apostle saying, " man, who art thou that repliest against God?" and, " the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways untraceable!" So far, therefore, as He condescends to manifest His judgments to us, let us give thanks; but so far as He thinks fit to conceal them, let us not murmur against His counsel, but believe that this also is the most wholesome for us. But whoever you are that are hostile to His grace, and thus ask what do you yourself say? it is well that you do not deny yourself to be a Christian and boast of being a Catholic. If, therefore, you confess that to persevere to the end in good is God's gift, I think that equally with me you are ignorant why one man should receive this gift and another should not receive it; and in this case we are both unable to penetrate the unsearchable judgments of God. Or if you say that it pertains to man's free choice â€” which you defend, not in accordance with God's grace, but in opposition to it â€” that any one should persevere in good, or should not persevere, not by the gift of God if he persevere, but by the action of human will, why will you strive against the words of Him who says, " I have prayed for thee, Peter, that thy faith fail not" ? Will you dare to say that even when Christ prayed that Peter's faith might not fail, it would still have failed if Peter had willed it to fail; that is, if he had been unwilling that it should continue even to the end? As if Peter could in any measure will otherwise than Christ had asked for him that he might will, For who does not know that Peter's faith would then have perished if that will itself by which he was faithful should fail, and that it would have continued if that same will should abide? But because the will is prepared by the Lord/ therefore Christ's petition on his behalf could not be a vain petition. When, then, He prayed that his faith should not fail, what was it that he asked for, but that in his faith he should have a most free, strong, invincible, persevering will? Behold, to what an extent the freedom of the will is defended in accordance with the grace of God, not in opposition to it; because the human will does not attain grace by freedom, but rather attains freedom by grace, and a delightful constancy, and an insuperable fortitude that it may persevere.

It is, indeed, to be wondered at, and greatly to be wondered at, that to some of His children whom He has regenerated in Christ, to whom He has given faith, hope, and love, God does not give perseverance also, when to strange children He forgives such wickedness, and, by the bestowal of His grace, makes them His own children. Who would not be moved at this? Who would not be exceedingly astonished at this? But, moreover, it is not less marvellous, and still true, and so manifest that not even the enemies of God's grace can find any means of denying it, that some children of His friends, that is, of regenerated and good believers, departing this life as infants without baptism, although He certainly might provide the grace of this laver if He willed, since in His power are all things, He alienates from His kingdom into which He introduces their parents; and some children of His enemies He causes to come into the hands of Christians, and by means of this laver [sicl. of regeneration] introduces them into the kingdom, from which their parents are aliens; although, as well to the former infants there is no evil deserving, as to the latter there is no good, of their own proper will. Certainly in this case the judgments of God, because they are righteous and deep, may neither be blamed nor penetrated. Among these also is that concerning perseverance, of which we are now discoursing. Of both, therefore we may exclaim, "the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are His judgments!"

1 Prov. viii. 35 [LXX.].

CHAP. 19] God's ways PAST FINDING OUT, 87

Chap, 19. “God's ways past finding out,-

Nor let us wonder that we cannot trace His unsearchable ways. For, to say nothing of innumerable other things which are given by the Lord God to some men, and to others are not given, since with Him is no respect of persons; and those things that are not conferred on the deservings of dispositions, such as are bodily swiftness, strength, good health, and beauty, marvellous intellects and mental natures capable of many arts, or such as fall to man's lot from without, such as are wealth, nobility, honours, and other things of this kind, which it is only in the power of God that a man should have; not to dwell even on the baptism of infants (which none of those objectors can say does not pertain, as might be said of those other matters, to the kingdom of God), why it is given to this infant and not given to that, since both of them are equally in God's power, and without that sacrament none can enter into the kingdom of God; to be silent, then, on these matters, or to leave them on one side, let men consider those very special cases of which we are treatincf. For we are discoursins of such as have not perseverance in goodness, but die in the decline of their good disposition from good to evil. Let the objectors answer, if they can, why, when these were living faithfully and piously, God did not then snatch them from the perils of this life, "lest wickedness should change their understanding, and lest deceit should beguile their souls"? Had He not this in His power, or was He ignorant of their future sinfulness? Assuredly, nothing of this kind is said, except most perversely and insanely. Why, then, did He not do this? Let them reply who mock at us when in such matters we exclaim, "How inscrutable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out!"* For either God giveth this to whom He will, or certainly that Scripture is wrong which says concerning the death of the righteous man, as if it were immature, "He was taken away lest wickedness should change his understanding, or lest deceit should beguile iiiis soul."^ Why, then, does God give this so great benefit to some, and not give it to others, seeing that in Him is no unrighteousness^ nor acceptance of persons,^ and that it is in His power [to determine] how long every one may remain in this life, which is called a state of trial upon Â«arth ?^ As, then, they are constrained to confess that it is God's gift for a man to end this life of his before it can be changed from good to evil, but they do not know why it is given to some and not given to others, so let them confess with us that perseverance in good is God's gift, according to the Scriptures, from which I have already set down many testimonies; and let them condescend with us to be ignorant, without a murmur against God, why it is given to some and not given to others. '

Chap. 20. [ix.] â€” Soam are children of God according to grace temporally received, some according to God's eternal foreknowledge.

Nor let it disturb us that to some of His children God does not give this perseverance. Be this far from being the case, however, if these were of those who are predestinated and called according to this purpose, â€” who are truly the children of the promise. For the former, while they live piously, are called children of God; but because they will live wickedly, and die in the same impiety, the foreknowledge of God does not call them God's children. For they are children of God whom as yet we have not, and God has already, of whom the Evangelist John says, "that Jesus should die for that nation, and not for that nation only, but that also He should gather together in one the children of God which were scattered abroad;" ^ and this certainly they were to become by believing, through the preaching of the gospel.
And yet before this had happened they had already been enrolled as sons of God with unchangeable stedfastness in the memorial of their Father. And, again, there are some who are called by us children of God on account of grace received even in temporal things, yet are not so called by God; of whom the same John says, " They went out from us, but they were not of us, because if they had been of us they would, no doubt, have continued with us." ^ He does not say, They went out from us, but because they did not abide with us they are no longer now of us; but he says, " They went out from us, but they were not of us," â€” that is to say, even when they appeared [to be] among us, they were not of us. And as if it were said to him, "WEnience do you prove this?" he says,

CHAP. 21.] god's true CHILDREN. 89

" Because if they had been of us, they would assuredly have continued with us." ^ It is the word of God's children; John is the speaker, who was ordained to a chief place among the children of God. When, therefore, God's children say of those who had not perseverance, " They went out from us, but they were not of us," and add, " Because if they had been of us, they would assuredly have continued with us," what else do they say than that they were not children, even when they were in the profession and name of children? Not because they simulated righteousness, but because they did not continue in it. For he does not say, For if they had been of us, they would assuredly have maintained a real and not a feigned righteousness with us; but he says, " If they had been of us, they would assuredly have continued with us." Beyond a doubt, he washed them to continue in goodness. Therefore, they were in goodness; but because they did not abide in it, â€” that is, they did not persevere unto the end, â€” he says. They were not of us, even when they were with us, â€” that is, they were not of the number of children, even when they were in the faith of children; because they who are truly children are foreknown and predestinated, conformed to the image of His Son, and are called according to His purpose, that they should be elected. For the son of promise does not perish, but the son of perdition.^

Chap. 21. â€” Who may be understand as given to Christ.

^ Those, then, were of the multitude of the called, but they were not of the small number of the elected. It is not, therefore, to His predestinated children that God has not given perseverance, for they would have it if they were in that number of children; and what would they have which they had not received, according to the apostolical and true 1 1 John ii. 19. ^ gom. viii. 29. 3 Jq^jq xvii. 12.

90 A TREATISE ON EEBUKE AND GRACE. [CHAP. 22.
judgment? And thus such children would be given to Christ the Son in such a way as that He Himself says to the Father,
"That all that Thou hast given me may not perish, but have eternal life." These, therefore, are understood to be given to Christ who are ordained to eternal life. These are they who are predestinated and called according to the purpose, of whom not one perishes. And by this means none of them ends this life in a state of change from good to evil, because he is so ordained, and for that purpose given to Christ, that he may not perish, but may have eternal life. And again, those whom we call His enemies, or the infant children of His enemies, whomever of them He will so regenerate that they may end this life in that faith which worketh by love, are already, and before this is done, in that predestination His children, and are given to Christ His Son, that they may not perish, but have everlasting life.

Chap. 22. â€” True children of God are true disciples of Christ.

Finally, the Saviour Himself says, "If ye continue in my word, ye are my disciples indeed." Is Judas, then, to be reckoned among them, since he did not continue in His word?

Are they to be reckoned among them of whom the gospel speaks in such wise, where, when the Lord had commanded His flesh to be eaten and His blood to be drunk, the Evangelist says, "These things said He in the synagogue as He taught in Capernaum. Many, therefore, of His disciples, when they had heard this, said, This is a hard saying; who can hear it?

But Jesus, knowing in Himself that His disciples were murmuring at it, said to them.

Doth this offend you? What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascending where He was before?

It is the Spirit that quickeneth, but the flesh profiteth nothing. The words that I have spoken unto you are spirit and life. But there are some of you who believe not. For Jesus knew from the beginning who were the believing ones, and who should betray Him; and He said. Therefore said I unto you, that no man cometh unto me except it were given of my Father. From this time many of His disciples went away back from Him, and no longer walked with Him."

1 Matt. xx. 16. 2 joim viii. 31. 3 joj^n yi ^gff^
We, therefore, call men elected, and Christ's disciples, and God's children, because they must be so called whom, being regenerated, we see to live piously; but they are then truly what they are called if they shall abide in that account of which they are so called. But if they have not perseverance, that is, if they continue not in that which they have begun to be, they are not truly called what they are called and are not; for they are not this in the sight of Him to whom it is known what they are going to be, that is to say, [that they will become] from good men, bad men.

Chap. 23'. Those are called according to the purpose alone are predestinated.

For this reason the apostle, when he had said, "We know that to those who love God He worketh all things together for good," immediately added, "to them who are the called according to His purpose." For these in their love for God continue even to the end; and they who for a season wander from the way return, that they may continue [their course] unto the end which they had begun to be in good. Showing, however, what it is to be called according to His purpose, he presently added what I have already quoted above, "Because whom He did before foreknow. He also predestinated, conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the first-born among many brethren. Moreover, whom He did predestinate, them He also called," to wit, according to His purpose; "and whom He called, them He also justified; and whom He justified, them He also glorified." All those things are already done. He foreknew. He predestinated. He called, He justified; because both all are already foreknown and predestinated, and many are already called and justified; but that which he placed at the end, "them He also glorified" (if, indeed, that glory is here to be understood of which the same apostle says, "When Christ your life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory"), this is not yet accomplished. Although, also, those two things have not been effected in all of whom they are said, for still, even until the end of the world, there remain many to be called and justified, nevertheless. He used verbs of the past tense, even concerning things future, as if God already arranged from eternity that they should come to pass. For this reason, also, the prophet Isaiah says concerning Him, "Who has made the things that shall be." Whosoever, therefore, in God's most providential ordering, are foreknown, predestinated, called, justified, glorified, I say not, even although not yet born again, but even although not yet born at all, are already children of God, and absolutely cannot perish. These truly come to Christ, because they come in such wise as He Himself says, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me, and him that cometh to me I will not cast out;" and a little after He says, "This is the will of the Father which hath sent me, that of all that He hath given me I shall lose nothing." * From Him, therefore, is given also perseverance in good even to the end; for it is not given save to those who shall not perish, since they who do not persevere shall perish.

Chap. 24. â€” Even the sins of the elect are turned by God to their advantage.

To such as love Him, God worketh all things together for good; so absolutely all things, that even if any of them go astray, and break out of the way, even this itself He makes to avail them for good, so that they return more lowly and more instructed. For they learn that in that very way of righteousness they ought to rejoice with trembling; not with arrogating to themselves any confidence of abiding as if by their own strength; not with saying, in their abundance, " We shall not be moved for ever." ^ ^ For which reason it is said to them, " Serve the Lord in fear, and rejoice unto Him with trembling, lest at any time the Lord should be angry, and ye perish from the right way." ^ For He does not say, And lest ye come into the right way; but He says. Lest ye perish from the right way. And what does this show, but that those who are already walking in the way of righteousness are reminded to serve God in fear; that is, " not to be high-minded, but to fear " ? ^ which signifies, that they should not be haughty, but humble. Whence also He says in another place, " Not minding high things, but consenting to the lowly; " ^ let them rejoice in God, but with trembling; glorying in none, since nothing is ours, so that he who glorieth may glory in the Lord, lest they perish from the way of righteousness in which they have already begun to walk, while they are ascribing to themselves the very assurance that they are in it. These words also the apostle made use of when he says, " Work out your own salvation w'ith fear and trembling." * And setting forth why with fear and trembling, he says, " For it is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do for His good pleasure." ^ For he had not this fear and trembling who said in his abundance, " I shall not be moved for ever." " But because he was a child of the promise, not of perdition, he experienced in God's desertion for a little while what he himself was: " Lord," said he, " in Thy favour Thou gavest strength to my honour; Thou turnedst away Thy face from me, and I became troubled." ^ ^ Behold how better instructed, and for this reason also more humble, he held on his way, at length seeing and confessing that in His favour God had endowed his honour with strength which he had attributed to himself and presumed of himself, in such abundance as God had afforded it, and not of Him who had given it, and said. " I shall not be moved for ever ! " Therefore he became troubled so that he found himself, and being lowly minded learnt not only [the truth] of eternal life, but, moreover, of a pious conversation and perseverance in this life, as that in which hope should be maintained. This might moreover be the word of the Apostle Peter, because he also had said in his abundance, "I will lay down my life for Thy sake; "^ attributing to himself, in his eagerness, what was afterwards to be bestowed on him by his Lord. But the Lord turned away His face from him, and he became troubled, so that in his fear of dying for Him he thrice denied Him. But the Lord again turned His face to him, and washed away his sin with his tears. For what else is, " He turned and looked upon him," ^ but, He restored to him the countenance which, for a little while, He had turned away from him ? Therefore he had become troubled; but because he learned not to be confident concerning himself, even this was of excellent profit to him, by His agency who works together for good all things to those who love Him; because he had been called according to the purpose, so that no one could pluck him out of the hand of Christ, to whom he had been given.

' Col. iii. 4. 2 isa. ^Iv. 11 [LXX.]. ^ John vi. 37.

Chap. 25. â€” Therefore rebuke Is to be used.

Let no one therefore say that a man must not be rebuked if he deviates from the right way, but that his return and perseverance must only be asked for from the Lord for him. Let no considerate and believing man say this. For if such an one is called according to the purpose, beyond all doubt God is working together for good to him even in the fact of his being rebuked. But since he who rebukes is ignorant whether he is so called, let him do with love what he knows ought to be done; for he knows that such an one ought to be rebuked. God will show either mercy or judgment; mercy, indeed, if he who is rebuked is separated by the bestowal of grace from the mass of perdition, and is not found among the vessels of wrath which are completed for destruction, but among the vessels of mercy which God has prepared for glory; ^ but judgment, if among the former he is condemned, and is not predestinated among the latter.

Chap. 26. [x.] â€” Whether Adam received the gift of perseverance.

Here arises another question, not reasonably to be slighted, but to be approached and solved in the help of the Lord in whose hand are both we and our discourses. For "I am asked, in respect of this gift of God which is to persevere in good to the end, what I think of the first man himself, who assuredly was made upright without any fault. And I do not say: If he had not perseverance, how was he without fault, seeing that he was in want of so needful a gift of God? For to this interrogatory the answer is easy, that he had not perseverance, because he did not persevere in that goodness in which he was without sin; for he began to have sin from the point at which he fell; and if he began, certainly he was without sin before he had begun. For it is one thing not to have sin, and it is another not to abide in that goodness in which there is no sin. Because in that very fact, that he is not said never to have been without sin, but he is said not to have continued without sin, beyond all doubt it is demonstrated that he was without sin, seeing that he is blamed for not having continued in that goodness. But it should rather be asked and discussed with greater pains in what way we can answer those who say, If in that uprightness in which he was made without sin he had perseverance, beyond all doubt he persevered in it; and if he persevered, he certainly did not sin, and did not forsake that his uprightness. But that he did sin, and was a forsaker of goodness, the Truth declares. Therefore he had not perseverance in that goodness; and if he had it not, he certainly received it not. For how should he have both received perseverance, and not have persevered? Further, if he had it not because he did not receive it, what sin did he commit by not persevering, if he did not receive perseverance? For it cannot be said that he did not receive it, for the reason that he was not separated by the bestowal of grace from the mass of perdition. Because that mass of perdition did not as yet exist in the human race before he had sinned from whom the corrupted source was derived.

'Chap. 27. â€” The answer.

Wherefore we most wholesomely confess what we most accurately believe, that because the God and Lord of all things in His strength created all things good, and foreknew that evil things would arise out of good, and knew that it pertained to His most omnipotent goodness even to do good out of evil things rather than not to allow evil things to be at all, He so ordained the life of angels and men that in it He might first of all show what their free choice could do, and then what the kindness of His grace and the judgment of His righteousness could do. Finally, certain angels, of whom the chief is he who is called the devil, became by free choice outcasts from the Lord God. Yet although they fled from His goodness, wherein they had been blessed, they could not flee from His judgment, by which they were made most wretched. Others, however, by the same free choice, stood fast in the truth, and merited the knowledge of that most certain truth that they should never fall.\(^2\) For if from the Holy Scriptures we have been able to attain the knowledge that none of the holy angels shall fall evermore, how much more have they themselves attained this knowledge by the truth more sublimely revealed to them! Because to us is promised a blessed life without end, and equality with the angels,\(^2\) from which promise we certainly gather that when after judgment we shall have come to that life, we shall not fall from it; but if the angels are ignorant of this truth concerning themselves, we shall not be their equals, but more blessed than they. But the Truth has promised us equality with them. It is certain, then, that they have known this by sight, which we have known by faith, to wit, that there shall be no more any fall of any holy angel. But to the devil and his angels,\(^2\) although they were blessed before they fell, and did not know that they should fall unto misery, there was still something which might be added to their blessedness, if of free will they had stood in the truth, until they should receive that fulness of the highest blessing as the reward of that very continuance of theirs; that is, that by the great abundance of the love of God, given by the Holy Spirit, they should absolutely not be able to fall any more, and that they should know this with the utmost certainty concerning themselves.

They had not this plenitude of blessedness; but since they were ignorant of their future misery, they enjoyed a blessedness which was less, indeed, but still without any defect. For if they had known their future fall and eternal punishment, they certainly could not have been blessed, since the fear of so great an evil as this would compel them even then to be miserable.

Chap. 28. Æ"” The first man Idmself also might have stood by his free-will.

Thus also He [God] made man with free-will; and although ignorant of his future fall, yet therefore happy, because he thought it was in his own power both not to die and not to become miserable. In which state of uprightness and freedom from sin, if he had willed by his own free choice to continue, assuredly without any experience of death and of infelicity he would have received by the merit of that continuance the fulness of blessing with which the holy angels also are blessed; that is, the impossibility of falling any more, and the knowledge of this with absolute certainty. For even he himself could not be blessed although in Paradise, nay, he would not be there, where it would not become him to be miserable, if the foreknowledge of his fall made him wretched with the dread of such a disaster. But because of his free choice he forsook God, he experienced the just judgment of God, that with his whole race, which being as yet all constituted in him had sinned with him, he should be condemned. For as many of this race as are delivered by God's grace are certainly delivered from the condemnation in which they are already held bound. Whence, even if none should be delivered, no one could justly blame the judgment of God. That, therefore, in comparison of those that perish few, but in their absolute number many, are delivered, is effected by grace, is effected freely. Thanks must be given that it is effected that no one may be lifted up as of his own deservings, but that every mouth, may be stopped, and he that glorieth may glory in the Lord.

Chap. 29. [xi. ] â€” Distinction between the grace given before and after the Fall.

What then? Did not Adam have the grace of God? Yes, truly, he had it largely, but of a different kind. He was placed in the midst of benefits which he had received from the goodness of his Creator; for he had not procured those benefits by Ms own deservings; in which benefits he suffered absolutely no evil. But saints in this life, to whom pertains this grace of deliverance, are in the midst of evils out of which they cry to God, " Deliver us from evil." \(^ {\text{E}} ^ {\text{E}}\)\\n\[Adam\] in those benefits needed not the death of Christ: the blood of that Lamb absolves them from guilt, as well inherited as their own. He had no need of that assistance which they implore when they say, " I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and making me captive in the law of sin which is in my members. wretched man that I am ! who shall deliver me from the body of this death ? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord." \(^ \)

Because in them the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and as they labour and are imperilled in such a contest, they ask that by the grace of Christ the strength to fight and to conquer may be given them. He, however [scil. Adam], tempted and disturbed in no such conflict concerning himself against himself, in that position of j blessedness enjoyed his peace with himself ^
Chap. 30. â€” The Incarnation of the Word,

Hence, although these do not now require a grace more joyous for the present, they nevertheless need a more powerful grace; and what grace is more powerful than the onlybegotten Son of God, equal to the Father and co-eternal, made man for them, and, without any sin of His own, either original or actual, crucified by men who were sinners? And although He rose again on the third day, never to die any more. He yet bore death for men who gave life to the dead, so that redeemed by His blood, having received so great and such a pledge, they could say, " If God be for us, who is against us? He who spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how has He not with Him also given to us all things?"^ God therefore took upon Him our nature â€” that is, the rational soul and flesh of the man Christ â€” by an undertaking singularly marvellous, or marvellously singular; so that with no preceding merits of His own righteousness He might in such wise be the Son of God from the beginning, in which He had begun to be man,^atâ€žIle, and the AWord wliich is without beginning, might be one person. For there is no one blinded by such ignorance of this matter and the Faith as to dare to say that, although born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin ]\ary, the Son of man, yet of His own free-will by righteous living and by doing ' good works, without sin, deserved to be the Son of God; in opposition to the gospel, which says, " The Word was made flesh." ^ For where was this made flesh except in the womb of the Virgin, whence was the beginning of the man Christ? And, moreover, when the Virgin asked how that should come to pass which was told her by the angel, the angel answered, " The Holy Ghost shall come over on to thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee, therefore that holy thing that shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." ^ " Therefore," He said; not because of works, which certainly of a yet unborn infant there are none; but " therefore," because " the Holy Ghost shall come over on to thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee, that holy thing wliich shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." That nativity, absolutely gratuitous, conjoined, in the unity of the person, man to God, flesh to the Word!

Good works followed that nativity; good works did not merit it. For it was in no wise to be feared that the human nature taken up by God the Word in that ineffable manner into a unity of person would sin by free choice ofwiU, since that taking up itself was such that the nature of man so taken up by God would admit into itself no movement of an evil will. Through this Mediator God makes known that He makes those whom He redeemed by His blood from evil, everlastingly good; [through this Mediator], whom He in such wise assured that He never would be evil, and, not being made out of evil, would always be good.^
Chap. 31. â€” The first man had received the grace necessary for his perseverance, but its exercise was left in his free choice.

The first man had not that grace by which he should never will to be evil; but assuredly he had that in which if he willed to abide lie would never be evil, aud without which, moreover, he could not of free choice be good, but which, nevertheless, by free choice he would forsake. God, therefore, did not will even him to be without His grace, which He left in his free choice; because free-will is sufficient for evil, but is of little avail for good, unless it is aided by Omnipotent Good. And if that man had not forsaken that assistance of his free-will, he would always have been good; but he forsook it, and he was forsaken. ' Because such was the nature of the aid, that he could forsake it when he would, and that he could continue in it when he would; but not such that he could be made to will his continuance. This first is the grace which was given to the first Adam; but more powerful than this is that in the second Adam. For the first is that whereby it is effected that a man may have righteousness if he will; the second, therefore, can do more than this, since by it it is even effected that he will, and wills so much, and loves with such ardour, that by the will of the Spirit he overcomes the will of the flesh, that lusteth in opposition to it. Nor was that, indeed, a small grace by which was demonstrated even the power of free choice, because man was so assisted that without this assistance he could not continue in good, but could forsake this assistance if he would. But this latter grace is by so much the greater, that it is a small matter for a man by its means to regain his lost freedom; it is of little account, finally, not to be able without it either to apprehend the good or to continue in good if he will, unless he is also made to will.'

Chap. 32. â€” The gifts of graces con/erred on Adam in creation.

At that time, therefore, God had given to man a good will, because in that will He had made him, since He had made him upright. He had given help without which he could not continue therein if he would; but that he should will. He left in his free choice. He could therefore continue if he would, because the help was not wanting whereby he could, and without which he could not, perseveringly hold fast the good which he would. But that he willed not to continue is absolutely the fault of him whose merit it would have been if he had willed to continue; as the holy angels did, who, while others fell of their own free choice, themselves by the same free choice stood, and deserved to receive the due reward of this continuance â€” to wit, such a fulness of blessing that by it they might have the fullest certainty of always abiding in it. If, however, this help had been wanting, either to angel or to man when they were first made, since their nature was not made such that without the divine help it could abide if it would, they certainly would not have fallen by their own fault, because the help would have been wanting without which they could not continue. Xow, however, to those to whom such assistance is wanting, it is the penalty of sin; but to those to whom it is given, it is given of grace, not of debt; and by so much the more is given through Jesus Christ our Lord to those to whom it has pleased God to give it, that not only we have that help without which we cannot continue even if we will, but moreover, we have so great and such a help as [to cause us] to will. Because by this grace of God there is caused in us, in the reception of good and in the persevering hold of it, not only to be able to do what we will, but even to will to do what we are able. But this was not the case in the first man; for the one of these things was in him, but the other was not. For he was not without the grace to receive good, because he had not yet lost it; but he was without the aid of grace to continue in it, and without this aid he could not do this at all; and he had received the ability if he would, but he had not the will to exercise the ability; for if he had possessed it, he would have persevered. For he could persevere if he would; but that he would not was the result of free choice, which at that time was in such wise free that he was capable of willing well and ill. For what shall be more free than free-will, when it shall not be able to serve sin? and this will be to man also as it has been made to the holy angels, the reward of deserving. But now that good deserving has been lost by sin in those who are delivered, that has become the gift of grace which would have been the reward of deserving. "

102 A TREATISE ON REBUKE AND GRACE. [CHAP. 34.

Chap. 33. [xii.] â€” WJiat is the difference between the ability not to sin, to die, and to forsake good, and the inability to sin, to die, and to forsake good?

On which account we must consider with diligence and attention in what respect those two things differ from one another, â€” to be able not to sin, and not to be able to sin; to be able not to die, and not to be able to die; to be able not to forsake good, and not to be able to forsake good. For the first man was able not to sin, was able not to die, was able not to forsake good. Are we to say that he who had such a free-will could not sin? Or that he to whom it was said, "If thou shalt sin thou shalt die by death," could not die? Or could not he forsake good, when he would forsake this, by sinning, and so die? Therefore the first liberty of the will was to be able not to sin, the last was much greater to be able to sin; the first immortality was to be able not to die, the last was much greater, not to be able to die; the first was the power of perseverance, to be able not to forsake good; the last was the felicity of perseverance, not to be able to forsake good.

But because the last blessings were preferable and better, were those first ones, therefore, either no blessings at all, or trifling ones?

Chap. 34. The aid without which a thing does not come to pass, and the aid with which a thing comes to pass.

Moreover, the helps themselves are to be distinguished.
The assistance without which a thing does not come to pass is one thing, and the assistance with which a thing comes to pass is another. For without food we cannot live; and yet although food should be at hand, it would not cause a man to live who should will to die. Therefore the aid of food is that without which it does not come to pass that we live, not that with which it comes to pass that we live. But, indeed, when the blessedness which a man has not is given him, he becomes continually blessed. For the aid is not only that without which that does not happen, but also with which that does happen for the sake of which it is given. Wherefore this is an assistance both by which it comes to pass, and without which it does not come to pass; because, on the one hand, if blessedness should be given to a man, he becomes continually blessed; and, on the other, if it should never be given

CHAP. 35.] PERSEVERANCE OF THE SAINTS, 10?)

he will never be so. But food does not of necessity cause a man to live, and yet without it he cannot live. Therefore to the first man, who, in that [condition of] good in which he had been made upright, had received the ability not to sin, the ability not to die, the ability not to forsake that very [condition of] good, was given the aid of perseverance; not that by it, it might come to pass that he should persevere, but because without it he could not of free-will persevere. But now to the saints predestinated to the kingdom of God by God's grace, the aid of perseverance that is given is not such as the former, but such that to them perseverance itself is bestowed; not only so that without that gift they cannot persevere, but, moreover, so that by means of this gift they cannot help persevering. For not only did He [Christ] say, " Without me ye can do nothing," ^ but He also said, " Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain."^ By which words He showed that He had given them not only righteousness, but perseverance therein.' For when Christ thus ordained them that they should go and bring forth fruit, and that their fruit should remain, who would dare to say, It shall not remain? Who w^ould dare to say. Perchance it will not remain? " For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance; " ^ but the calling is of those who are called according to the purpose. When Christ intercedes, therefore, on behalf of those, that their faith should not fail, doubtless it will not fail unto the end. And thus it shall persevere even unto the end; nor shall the end of this life find it anything but continuing.

Chap. 35. â€” There is a greater freedom now in the saints than there teas before in Adam.

Certainly a larger liberty is necessary in the face of so many and so great temptations, which had no existence in ParadisCi â€” a liberty fortified and confirmed by the gift of perseverance, so that this w^orld, with all its loves, its fears, its errors, may be overcome: the martyrdoms of the saints have taught this. In fine, he [Adam], not only with nobody to make him afraid, but, moreover, in spite of the authority of ' Jolin xr. 5. ^ John xt. 16. ^ Eom. xi. 29.

104 A TREATISE ON REBUKE AND GRACE. [CHAP. 35.

God's fear, availing himself of his free-will, did not continue in such a state of happiness, in such a facility^ of [not] sinning.
But these [the saints], I say, not under the fear of the world, but in spite of the rage of the world lest they should stand, stood firm in the faith; while he could see the good things present which he was going to forsake, they could not see the good things future which they were going to receive. Whence is this, save by the gift of Him from whom they obtained mercy to be faithful; from whom they received the spirit, not of fear, whereby they would yield to the persecutors, but of power, and of love, and of continence, in which they could overcome all threatenings, all seductions, all torments? To him, therefore, without any sin, was given the free-will with which he was created; and he made it to serve sin. But although the will of these had been the servant of sin, it was delivered by Him who said, "If the Son shall make you free, then shall ye be free indeed." And by that grace they receive so great a freedom, that although as long as they live here they are fighting against sinful lusts, and some sins creep upon them unawares, on account of which they daily say, "Forgive us our debts," yet they do not any more obey the sin which is unto death, of which the Apostle John says, "There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it." Concerning which sin (since it is not expressed) many and different notions may be entertained. I, however, say, that that is the sin, to forsake even unto death the faith which worketh by love. This sin they who are not free on the first condition, as Adam was, no further obey; for they are freed by the grace of God through the second Adam, and by that deliverance they have that free-will which enables them to serve God, not by which they may be made captive by the devil. From being made free from sin they have become the servants of righteousness, in which they will stand till the end, by the gift to them of perseverance from Him who foreknew them, and predestinated them, and called them according to His purpose, and justified them, and glorified them, since He has even already formed those things that are to come which He promised concerning them. And when He promised, "Abraham believed Him, and it was counted unto him for righteousness." For "he gave glory to God, most fully believing," as it is written, "that what He has promised He is able also to perform."^

CHAP. 37.] WHAT GOD FORESEES HE FULFILS. 105

purpose, and justified them, and glorified them, since He has even already formed those things that are to come which He promised concerning them. And when He promised, "Abraham believed Him, and it was counted unto him for righteousness." For "he gave glory to God, most fully believing," as it is written, "that what He has promised He is able also to perform."^

CHAP. 36. ^â€” God not only foreknew that men will he good, but Himself makes them, so. He Himself, therefore, makes those men good, to do good works. For He did not promise them to Abraham because He foreknew that of themselves they would be good. For if this were the case, what He promised was not His, but theirs.
But it was not thus that Abraham believed, but "he was not weak in faith, giving glory to God; and most fully believing that what He has promised He is able also to perform." He does not say, What He foreknew. He is able to promise; nor what He foretold. He is able to manifest; nor what He promised. He is able to foreknow: but what He promised. He is able also to do. It is He, therefore, who makes them to persevere in good, who makes them good. But they who fall and perish have never been in the number of the predestinated.

Although, then, the apostle might be speaking of all persons regenerated and living piously when he said, "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth;" yet he continually had regard to the predestinated, and said, "But he shall stand;" and that they might not arrogate this to themselves, he says, "For God is able to make him stand." It is He Himself, therefore, that gives perseverance, who is able to establish those who stand, so that they may stand fast with the greatest perseverance; or to restore those who have fallen, for "the Lord setteth up those who are broken down."^1

Chap. 37. â€” To a sound will is committed the power of persevering or of not persevering.

As, therefore, the first man did not receive this gift of God, â€” that is, perseverance in goodness, â€” but it was left in his own choice to persevere or not to persevere, his will had such strength, â€” inasmuch as it had been created without any sin, and there was nothing in the way of concupiscence of himself that withstood it, â€” that the choice of persevering could worthily be entrusted to such goodness and to such facility in living well. But God at the same time foreknew what he would do in unrighteousness; foreknew, however, but did not force him to this; but at the same time He knew what He Himself would do in righteousness concerning him. But now, since that great freedom has been lost by the desert of sin, our weakness has remained to be aided by still greater gifts. For it pleased God, in order most effectually to quench the pride of human presumption, "that no flesh should glory in His presence" â€” that is, "no man." But whence should flesh not glory in His presence, save concerning its merits? Which, indeed, it might have had, but lost; and lost by that very means whereby it might have had them, that is, by its freewill; on account of which loss there remains nothing to those who are to be delivered, save the grace of the Deliverer. Thus; therefore, no flesh glories in His presence. For the unrighteous do not glory, since they have no ground of glory; nor the righteous, because they have a ground from Him, and have no glory of theirs, but Himself, to whom they say, "My glory, and the lifter up of my head."^ And thus it is that what is written pertains to every man, " that no flesh should glory in His presence." To the righteous, however, pertains that Scrip-

â– ture: " He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." ^ ' For this the apostle most manifestly showed, when, after saying " that no flesh should glory in His presence," lest the saints should suppose that they had been left without any glory, he presently added, " But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: that, according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." * Hence it is that in this abode of miseries, where trial is the life of man upon the /earth. "strength is made perfect in weakness."^ ^What strength, save " that he that glorieth should glory in the Lord " ?

CHAP. 38.] man's good WILL DEPENDENT ON GOD'S. 107

Chap. 38. â€” What is the nature of the gift of perseverance that is now given to the saints.

And thus God willed that His saints should not â€” even concerning perseverance itself in goodness â€” glory in their own strength, but in Himself, who not only gives them aid such as He gave to the first man, without which they cannot persevere if they will, but in them He also causes the will; that since they will not persevere unless they both can and will, both the capability and the will to persevere should be bestowed on them by the liberality of divine grace. Because by the Holy Spirit their will is so much enkindled that they therefore can, because they so will, they therefore so will, because God works in them to will. For if in so much weakness of this life (in which weakness, however, for the sake of checking pride, strength behoved to be perfected) their own will should be left to themselves, that they might, if they willed, continue in the help of God, without which they could not persevere, and God should not work in them to will, in the midst of so many and so great weaknesses their will itself would give way, and they would not be able to persevere, for the reason that failing from infirmity they would not will, or in the weakness of wU1 they would not so will that they would be able. Therefore aid was brought to the infirmity of human will, so that it might be unchangeably and invincibly influenced by divine grace; and thus, although weak, it still might not fail, nor be overcome by any adversity. Thus it happened that man's will, weak and incapable, in good as yet small, persevered by God's strength; while the will of the first man, strong and healthful, having the power of free choice, did not persevere in a greater good; because although God's help was not wanting, without which it could not persevere if it would, yet it was not such a help as that by which God would work in man to ivill. Certainly to the strongest He yielded and permitted to do what He ivilled; to those that were weak He reserved that by His own gift they should most imdncibly will what is good, and most invincibly refuse to forsake this.
Therefore when Christ says, " I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not," ^ we may understand that it was said to him

duce fruit, that the number which was promised to Abraham would not be wanting, â€” is yet more plainly declared in the Apocalypse: " Hold fast that which thou hast, lest another take thy crown." ^ For if anotJier would not receive unless one should have lost, the number is fixed. ^

Chap. 40. â€” No one is certain and secure of his own predestination and salvation.

But, moreover, that such things as these are so spoken to Saints who will persevere, as if it were reckoned uncertain if they will persevere, is a reason that they ought not otherwise to hear these things, since it is well for them " not to be highminded, but to fear." ^ For who of the multitude of believers can presume, so long as he is living in this mortal state, that he is in the number of the predestinated ? Because it is necessary that in this condition that should be kept hidden; since here we have to beware so much of pride, that even so great an apostle was buffeted by a messenger of Satan, lest he should be lifted up. ^ Hence it was said to the apostles,

' Matt. iii. 8, 9. - Rev. iii. 11.

3 Rom. xi. 20. * 2 Cor. xii. 7.
"If ye abide in me," ^ and this He said who knew for a certainty that they would abide; and through the prophet, "If ye shall be willing, and will hear me," ^ although He knew in whom He would work to will also. And many similar things are said. For the sake of the benefit of this secrecy, lest, perchance, any one should be lifted up, but that all, even although they are running well, should fear, in that it is not known who may attain, â€” for the sake of the advantage of this secrecy, it must be believed that some of the children of perdition, who have not received the gift of perseverance to the end, begin to live in the faith which worketh by love, and live for some time faithfully and righteously, and afterwards fall away, and are not taken away from this life before this happens to them. If this had happened to none of these, men would have that very wholesome fear, by which the sin of presumption is kept down, only so long as until they should attain to the grace of Christ by which to live piously, and afterwards would for time to come be secure that they would never fall away from Him. And such presumption in this condition of trials is not fitting, where there is so great weakness, that security may engender pride. Finally, this also shall be the case; but it shall be at that time, in men also as it already is in the angels, when there cannot be any pride. Therefore the number of the saints, by God's grace predestinated to God's kingdom, with the gift of perseverance to the end bestowed on them, shall be guided thither in its completeness, and there shall be at length without end preserved in its fullest completeness, most blessed, the mercy of their Saviour still cleaving to them, whether in their conversion, in their conflict, or in their crown!

Chap. 41. â€” Even in judgment God's mercy â– will he necessary to us.

^ For the Holy Scripture testifies that God's mercy is then also necessary for them, when the Saint says to his soul concerning the Lord its God, "Who crowneth thee in mercy and compassion." ^ The Apostle James also says: "He shall have judgment without mercy who hath showed no mercy;" * where he sets forth that even in that judgment in which the righteous are crowned and the unrighteous are condemned, some will be judged with mercy, others without mercy. ' On which account also the mother of the Maccabees says to her son, "That in that mercy I may receive thee with thy brethren." ^ "For when a righteous king," as it is WTitten, "shall sit on the throne, no evil thing shall oppose itself to him. Who will boast that he has a pure heart? or who will boast that he is pure from sin? ^ 'And thus God's mercy is even then necessary, by which he is made " blessed to whom the Lord has not imputed sin." ^ But then, in proportion to the merits of good works, even mercy itself shall be allotted by righteous judgments. For when it is said, " Judgment without mercy to him that hath showed no mercy," it is plainly shown that in those whom are found the good works of mercy, judgment shall be executed with mercy; and thus even that mercy itself shall be returned to the merits of good works.

It is not so now; when not only no good works, but many bad works precede. His mercy prevents a man so that he is delivered from evils, ^ as well from evils which he has done, as from those which he would have done if he were not controlled by the grace of God; and from those, too, which he would have suffered for ever if he were not plucked from the power of darkness, and transferred into the kingdom of the Son of God's love. ^ Nevertheless, since even that life eternal itself, which, it is certain, is given as due to good works, is called by so great an apostle the grace of God, although grace is not rendered to works, but is given freely, it must be confessed without any doubt, that eternal life is called grace for the reason that it is rendered to those merits which grace has conferred upon man. Because that saying is rightly understood which in the gospel is read, " grace for grace," ^ that is, for those merits which grace has conferred.

Chap. 42. Â“ The reprobate are to be punished for merits of a different hind.

choice of their will, or -with a choice of will truly free, because it is freed by grace itself Â“ the grace of God brings to His kingdom, Â” Hose, then, who do not belong to that most certain and blessed number, are most righteously judged according to their deservings. For either they lie under the sin which they have inherited by original generation, and depart hence with that inherited debt which is not put away by regeneration, or by their free choice have added other sins besides; their will, I say, frze., but not freed, Â“ free from righteousness, but enslaved to sin, by which they are tossed about by divers mischievous lusts, some more evil, some less, but all evil; and they must be adjudged to diverse punishments, according to that very diversity.' Or they receive the grace of God, but they are only for a season, and do not persevere; they forsake and are forsaken. For by their free-will, as they have not received the gift of perseverance, they are abandoned to the righteous and hidden judgment of God.
Chap. 43. [xiv.] Rehulce and r/race do not set aside one another.

^Let men then suffer themselves to be rebuked when they sin, and not conclude against grace from the rebuke itself, nor from grace against rebuke; because both the righteous penalty of sin is due, and righteous rebuke pertains to it, if it is medicinally applied, even although the salvation of the ailing man is uncertain; so that if he who is rebuked belongs to the number of the predestinated, rebuke may be to him a wholesome medicine, and if he does not belong to that number, it may be to him an instrument of punishment. Under that very uncertainty, therefore, it must of charity be applied, although its result is unknown; and prayer must be made on his behalf to whom it is applied, that he may be healed. But when men either come or return into the way of righteousness by means of rebuke, who is it that worketh salvation in their hearts but that God who giveth the increase, whoever plants and waters, and whoever labours on the fields or shrubs, â€” that God whom no man's will resists when He wills to give salvation? ^ For to will or not to will is in the power of Him who willeth or willeth not, so that it hinders not the divine will nor overcomes the divine power. For even concerning those who do what He wills not, He [God] Himself does what He will.

Chap. 44. â€” In what way God loills all men to he saved.

And what is written, that " He will have all men to be saved/" ^ while yet all men are not saved, may be understood in many ways, some of which I have mentioned in other writings^ of mine; but here I will say one thing: " He will have all men to be saved," is so said that all predestinated people may be understood by it, because every race of men is among them.

Just as it was said to the Pharisees, " Ye tithe every herb;" ^ where the expression is only to be understood of every herb that they had, for they did not tithe every herb which was found throughout the whole earth. According to the same manner of speaking, it was said, " Even as I also please all men in all things." * For did he who said this please even so many of his persecutors? But he pleased every kind of men that assembled in the Church of Christ, whether they were already established therein, or were to be introduced into it.

Chap. 45. â€” Scriptural instances w JJierein it is i^roved that God has men's wills more in His power than they themselves have.

It is not, then, to be doubted that men's wills cannot withstand the will of God, " who hath done all things whatsoever He pleased in heaven and in earth," ^ and who also " has formed those things that are to come," ^ in such wise as to prevent His doing what He wills, since He does even concerning the wills themselves of men what He will, when He will. Unless, perchance (to mention some things among many), when God willed to give the kingdom to Saul, it was so in the power of the Israelites, as it certainly was placed in their will, either to subject themselves or not to the man in question, that they could even prevail to withstand God. God, however, did not do this, save by the will of the men themselves, doubtless having, the most omnipotent power of inclining men's hearts whither it pleased Him. For thus it is written: "And Sainuel sent the people away, and every one went away unto his own place.

And Saul went away to his house in Gibeah: and there went away with Saul mighty men, whose hearts the Lord touched.
And [some] pestilent children said, Who shall save us ? This man ? And they despised him, and brought him no presents."
Will any one say that any of those whose hearts the Lord touched to go with Saul would not have gone with him, or that any of those pestilent fellows, whose hearts He did not touch to do this, would have gone ? Of David also, whom the Lord ordained to the kingdom in a more prosperous succession, we read thus: "And David continued to increase, and was magnified, and the Lord was with him." ^ This having been premised, it is said a little afterwards, "And the Spirit clothed Amasai, chief of the thirty, and he said. We are thine, David; and we will be with thee, son of Jesse: Peace, peace be unto thee, and peace be to thy helpers; because the Lord has helped thee." ^ Could he withstand the will of God, and not rather do the will of Him who wrought in his heart by His Spirit, with which he was clothed, to will, speak, and do thus ? ]|loreover, a little afterwards the same Scripture says, "All these warlike men, setting the battle in array, came with a peaceful heart to Hebron to establish David over all Israel." * By their own will, certainly, they appointed David king. Who cannot see this ? Who can deny it ? For they did not do it under constraint or without good-will, since they did it with a peaceful heart. And yet He wrought this in them who worketh what He will in the hearts of men.
For which reason the Scripture premised, "And David continued to increase, and was magnified, and the Lord Omnipotent was with him." And thus the Lord Omnipotent, who was with him, induced these men to appoint him king. And how did He induce them ?
Did He constrain thereto by any bodily fetters ? He wrought within; He stirred their hearts, and drew them by their own wills, which He Himself wrought in them. If, then, correction to result in the heart of him that is rebuked, that he may be established in the kingdom of heaven?

Chap. 46. [xv.] "Rthuhe must he varied according to the variety of faults. There is no punishment in the Church greater than excommunication. Therefore, let brethren who are subject be rebuked by those who are set over them, with rebuke that springs from love, varied according to the diversity of faults, whether smaller or greater. Because that very penalty that is called condemnation, which episcopal judgment inflicts, than which there is no greater punishment in the Church, may, if God will, result and be of advantage for most wholesome rebuke. For we know not what may happen on the coming day; nor must any one be despaired of before the end of this life; nor can God be contradicted, that He may not look down and give repentance, and receive the sacrifice of a troubled spirit and a contrite heart, and absolve from the charge of damnation, however just, and so Himself not condemn the condemned person. Yet the necessity of the pastoral office requires, in order that the terrible contagion may not creep through the many, that the diseased sheep should be separated from the sound ones; perchance, by that very separation, to be healed by Him to whom nothing is impossible. For as we know not who belongs to the number of the predestinated, we ought in such wise to be influenced by the affection of love as to will all men to be saved. For this is the case when we endeavour to lead every individual to that point where they may meet with those agencies by which we may prevail, to the accomplishment of the result, that being justified by faith they may have peace with God," which peace, moreover, the apostle announced when he said, "Therefore, we discharge an embassage for Christ, as though God were exhorting by us, we pray you in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God." For what is "to be reconciled" to Him but to have peace towards Him? For the sake of which peace, moreover, the Lord Jesus Christ Himself said to His disciples, "Into whatsoever house ye enter first, say. Peace be to this house; and if the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon it; but if not, it shall return to you... Query, Excommunication?" Eom. v. 3. '2 Cor, v. 20.

CHAP. 47.] THE PREACHING OF PEACE. 115
again." ^ When they preach the gospel of this peace of whom it is predicted, " How beautiful are the feet of those that publish peace, that announce good things ! " ^ to iis, indeed, everyone then begins to be a son of peace who obeys and believes this gospel, and who, being justified by faith, has begun to have peace towards God; but, according to God's predestination, he was already a son of peace. For it was not said. Upon whomsoever your peace shall rest, he shall become a son of peace; but Christ says, " If the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon that house." Already, therefore, and before the announcement of that peace to him, the son of peace was there, as he had been known and foreknown, by â€” not the evangelist, but â€” God. Tor we need not fear lest we should lose it, if in our ignorance he to whom we preach is not a son of peace, for it will return to us again â€” that is, that preaching wiU profit ns, and not him; but if the peace proclaimed shall rest upon him, it will profit both us and him.

Chap. i7.â€” Another interpretation of the apostolic passage, " Who will have allvien to he saved."

That, therefore, being ignorant who shall be saved, God commands us to will that all to whom we preach this peace may be saved, and Himself works this in us by diffusing that love in our hearts by the Holy Spirit who is given to us, â€” may also thus be understood, that God wills all men to be saved, because He makes us to will this; just as " He sent the Spirit of His Son [into our hearts], crying, Abba, Father;"^ that is, making us to cry, Abba, Father ! Because, concerning that same Spirit, He says in another place, " We have received the Spirit of adoption, in v/hom we cry, Abba, Father ! " * We therefore cry, but He is said to cry who makes us to cry. If, then. Scripture rightly said that the Spirit was crying by whom we are made to cry, it rightly also says that God ivills, when by Him we are made to will. And thus, because by rebuke we ought to do nothing save to avoid any departure from that peace which is towards God, or to induce the return to it of him who had departed, let us do in hope what we do. If he whom we rebuke is a son of peace, our peace shall rest upon ' him; but if not, it shall return to us again.'

116 A TREATISE OX KECKUE AND GRACE. [CIIAP. 49.

Chap, i^.-â€” The purpose of rebuke.

Although, therefore, even while the faith of some is subverted, the foundation of God standeth sure, since the Lord knoweth them that are His, still, we ought not on that account to be indolent and negligent in rebuking those who should be rebuked. For not for nothing was it said, " Evil communications corrupt good manners; " ^ and, " The weak brother shall perish in thy knowledge, for whose sake Christ died." ^ Let us not, in opposition to these precepts, and to a wholesome fear, pretend to argue, saying, " Well, let evil communications corrupt good manners, and let the weak brother perish. What is that to us? The foundation of God standeth sure, and no one perishes but the son of perdition."

[xvi] Be it far from us to babble in this wise, and think that we ought to be secure in this negligence. For it is true that no one perishes except the son of perdition, but God says by the mouth of the prophet Ezekiel: ^" He shall surely die in his sin, but his blood will I require at the hand of him who is privy to it." "'

Chap. 49. â€” Conclusion.

Hence, as far as concerns us, who are not able to distinguish those who are predestinated from those who are not, we ought on this very account to wish all men to be saved. Severe rebuke should be medicinally applied to all by us that they perish not themselves, or that they may not be the means of destroying others. It belongs to God, however, to make that rebuke useful to them whom He Himself has foreknown and predestinated to be conformed to the image of His Son. For, if at any time we abstain from rebuking, for fear lest by rebuke a man should perish, why do we not also rebuke, for fear lest a man should rather perish by our withholding it?

For we have not greater bowels of love than the blessed apostle who says, " Eebuke those that are unruly; comfort the feeble-minded; support the weak; be patient towards all men. See that none render to any man evil for evil." *

CHAP. 49.] EEBUKE TO BE WISELY ADMINISTERED. 117

Where it is to be understood that evil is then rather rendered for evil when one who ought to be rebuked is not rebuked, but by a wicked dissimulation is neglected. He says, moreover, " Them that sin rebuke before all, that others also may fear; " ^ which must be received concerning those sins which are not concealed, lest he be thought to have spoken in opposition to the word of the Lord. For He says, " If thy brother shall sin against thee, rebuke him between thee and him." ^

Notwithstanding, He Himself carries out the severity of rebuke to the extent of saying, " If he will not hear the church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican." ^ And who loved the weak more than He who became weak for us all, and of that very weakness was crucified for us all? And since these things are so, grace neither restrains rebuke, nor does rebuke restrain grace; and on this account righteousness is so to be prescribed that we may ask in faithful prayer, that, by God's grace, what is prescribed may be done; and both of these things are in such wise to be done that righteous rebuke may not be neglected. But let all these things be done with charity, since, while charity does no sin, it covers the multitude of sins.
A TREATISE ON THE PEE DESTINATION OF THE SAINTS.

By AURELIUS AUGUSTINE, Bishop of Hippo.

THE FIRST BOOK.

ADDEESSED TO PEOSPER AND HILAEL.

A.D. 428 OR 429.

WHEREIN THE TRUTH OF PREDESTINATION AND GRACE IS DEFENDED AGAINST THE SEMI-PELAGIANS, â€” THOSE PEOPLE, Tt) WIT, WHO BY NO MEANS WITH-
DRAW ALTOGETHER FROM THE PELAGIAN HERESY, IN THAT THEY CONTEND THAT THE BEGINNING OF SALVATION AND OF FAITH IS OF OURSELVES; SO THAT IN VIRTUE, AS IT WERE, OF THIS PRECEDENT MERIT, OTHER GOOD GIFTS OF GOD ARE ATTAINED. AUGUSTINE SHOWS THAT NOT ONLY THE INCREASE, BUT THE VERY BEGINNING ALSO OF FAITH IS IN GOD'S GIFT. ON THIS MATTER HE DOES NOT DISAVOW THAT HE ONCE THOUGHT DIFFERENTLY, AND THAT IN SOME SMALL WORKS, WRITTEN BEFORE HIS EPISCOPATE, HE WAS IN ERROR, AS IN THAT EXPOSITION, WHICH THEY OBJECT TO HIM, OF PROPOSITIONS FROM THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS. BUT HE POINTS OUT THAT HE WAS SUBSEQUENTLY CONVINCED CHIEFLY BY THIS TESTIMONY, "but WHAT HAST THOU THAT THOU HAST NOT RECEIVED?" WHICH HE PROVES IS TO BE TAKEN AS A TESTIMONY CONCERNING FAITH ITSELF ALSO.
HE SAYS THAT FAITH IS TO BE COUNTED AMONG OTHER WORKS, BY WHICH THE APOSTLE SAYS THAT GOD'S GRACE IS NOT PREVENTED WHEN HE SAYS, "NOT OF WORKS." HE DECLARES THAT THE HARDNESS OF THE HEART IS TAKEN AWAY BY GRACE, AND THAT ALL COME TO CHRIST WHO ARE TAUGHT TO COME BY THE FATHER; BUT THAT THOSE WHOM HE TEACHES, HE TEACHES IN MERCY, WHILE THOSE WHOM HE TEACHES NOT, IN JUDGMENT HE TEACHES NOT. THAT THE PASSAGE FROM HIS HUNDRED AND SECOND EPISTLE, QUESTION 2, "CONCERNING THE TIME OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION," WHICH IS ALLEGED BY THE SEMI-PELAGIANS, MAY JUSTLY BE EXPLAINED WITHOUT DETRIMENT TO THE DOCTRINE OF GRACE AND PREDESTINATION. HE TEACHES WHAT IS THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN GRACE AND

PREDESTINATION. FURTHER, HE SAYS THAT GOD IN HIS PREDESTINATION FOREKNEW "WHAT HE HAD PURPOSED TO DO. HE MARVELS GREATLY THAT THE ADVERSARIES OF PREDESTINATION, WHO ARE SAID TO BE UNWILLING TO BE DEPENDENT ON THE UNCERTAINTY OF GOD'S WILL, PREFER RATHER TO TRUST THEMSELVES TO THEIR OWN WEAKNESS THAN TO THE STRENGTH OF GOD'S PROMISE. HE CLEARLY POINTS OUT THAT THEY ABUSE THIS AUTHORITY, "IF THOU BELIEVEST, THOU SHALT BE SAVED." THAT THE TRUTH OF GRACE AND PERSEVERANCE SHINES FORTH IN THE CASE OF INFANTS THAT ARE SAVED, WHO ARE DISTINGUISHED BY NO MERITS OF THEIR OWN FROM OTHERS WHO PERISH. FOR THAT THERE IS NO DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THEM ARISING FROM THE FOREKNOWLEDGE OF MERITS WHICH THEY WOULD HAVE HAD IF THEY HAD LIVED LONGER. THAT THAT TESTIMONY IS WRONGFULLY REJECTED BY THE ADVERSARIES AS BEING UNCANONICAL, WHICH HE ADDUCED FOR THE PURPOSE OF THIS DISCUSSION, "he was TAKEN AWAY LEST WICKEDNESS," ETC. THAT THE MOST ILLUSTROUS INSTANCE OF PREDESTINATION AND GRACE IS THE SAVIOUR HIMSELF, WHO OBTAINED THE PRIVILEGE OF BEING THE SAVIOUR AND THE ONLY-BEGOTTEN SON OF GOD BY NO PRECEDENT MERITS, EITHER OF WORKS OR OF FAITH. THAT THE PREDESTINATED ARE CALLED BY SOME CERTAIN CALLING PECULIAR TO THE ELECT, AND THAT THEY HAVE BEEN ELECTED BEFORE THE FOUNDATION OF THE WORLD; NOT BECAUSE THEY WERE FORE-KNOWN AS MEN WHO WOULD BELIEVE AND WOULD BE HOLY, BUT IN ORDER THAT BY MEANS OF THAT VERY ELECTION THEY MIGHT BE SUCH, ETC.

Chap. 1. [i.] â€” Introduction.

WE know that in the Epistle to the Philippians the apostle said, " To write the same things to you to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe;" ^ yet the same apostle, writing to the Galatians, when he saw that he had done enough among them of what he regarded as being needful for them, by the ministry of his preaching, said, " For the rest let no man cause me labour," ^ or as it is read in many codices, "Let no one be troublesome to me." But although I confess I am troubled that the divine eloquence with which the grace of God is preached (which is absolutely no grace if it is given according to our merits), great and manifest as it is, is not yielded to, nevertheless my dearest sons, Prosper and Hilary, your zeal and brotherly affection â€” which makes you so reluctant to see any of the brethren in error, as to wish that, after so many books and letters of mine on this subject, I should write again from here â€” I love more than I can tell, although I do not dare to say that I love it as much as I ought. Wherefore, behold, I write to you again. And although I am no longer acting with you, yet by your means I am still doing what I thought I had done sufficiently.

CHAP. 2.] DOCTRINE OF THE MASSILIANS. 121

Chap. 2. â€” To what extent the Massilians withdraw from the Pelagians.

For on consideration of your letters, I seem to see that those brethren on whose behalf you exhibit a pious care that they may not hold the poetical opinion in which it is affirmed,
" Every one is a hope for himself," ^ and so fall under that condemnation which is declared, not poetically, but prophetically, "Cursed is every man that hath hope in man,"^^must be treated in that way wherein the apostle dealt with those to whom he said, " And if in any thing ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you." ^ For as yet they are in darkness on the question concerning the predestination of the saints, but they have the source whence, " if in any thing they are otherwise minded, God will reveal even this unto them," if they are walking in that to which they have attained.
For which reason the apostle, when he had said, " If ye are in any thing otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you," says, " ISTEvertheless, whereunto we have attained, let us walk in the same." * And those brethren of ours, on whose behalf your pious charity is solicitous, have attained with Christ's Church to the belief that the human race is born obnoxious to the sin of the first man, and that none can be delivered from that evil save by the righteousness of 'the Second Man.' Moreover, they have attained to the confession that men's wills are prevented by God's grace; and to the agreement that no one can suffice to themselves either for beginning or for completing any good work. These things, therefore, unto which they have attained, abundantly distinguish them from the error of the Pelagians. Further, if they walk in them, and beseech Him who giveth understanding, if in anything concerning predestination they are otherwise minded. He will reveal even this unto them. Yet let us also spend upon them the influence of our love, and the ministry of our discourse, according to

122 ON THE PREDESTINATION OF THE SAINTS. [CHAP, 4.

His gift, whom we have asked that in these letters we might say what should be suitable and profitable to them. For whence do we know whether by this our service, wherein we are serving them in the free love of Christ, our God may perchance will to effect that purpose?

Chap. 3. [ii.] â€” Even the beginning of faith is of God's gift.

Therefore I ought first to show that the faith by which we are Christians is the gift of God, if I can do that more thoroughly than I have already done in so many and so large volumes. "â– But I see that I must now reply to those who say that the divine testimonies which I have adduced concerning this matter are of avail for this purpose, to assure us that we have faith itself of ourselves, but that its increase is of God; as if faith were not given to us by Him, but were only increased in us by Him, on the ground of the merit of its having begun from us. Thus there is here no departure from that opinion which Pelagius himself was constrained to condemn in the judgment of the bishops of Palestine, as is testified by the same transactions, " That the grace of God is given according to our merits," ^ if it is not of God's grace that we begin to believe, but rather that on account of this beginning an addition is made to us of a more full and perfect belief; and so we first give the beginning of our faith to God, that His supply or completion may also be given to us again, and whatever else we faithfully ask.

Chap. 4. â€” Continuation.

But why do we not, in opposition to this, rather hear the words, " Who hath first given to Him and it shall be recompened to him again ? since of Him, and through Him, and in Him, are all things," ^ and' from whom, then, is that very beginning of our faith if not from Him? For this is not excepted when other things are spoken of as of Him; but " of Him, and through Him, and in Him, are all things." But who can say that he who has already begun to believe deserves

^ Some Mss. read "ajyerta" soil, "plain."

CHAP. 5.] THE BEGINNINGS OF FAITH ARE GOD'S. 123

nothing from Him in whom he has believed? Whence it results that, to him who already deserves, other things are said to be added by a divine retribution, and thus that God's grace is given according to our merits. And this assertion when put before him, Pelagius himself condemned, that he might not be condemned. Whoever, then, wishes on every side to avoid this damnable opinion, let him understand that what the apostle says is said with entire truthfulness, " Unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake." He shows that both are the gifts of God, because he said that both were given. And he does not say, "To believe on Him more fully and perfectly," but, " to believe on Him." Neither does he say that he himself had obtained mercy to be more faithful, but "to be faithful,"^ because he knew that he had not first given the beginning of his faith to God, and had its increase given back to him again by Him; but that he had been made faithful by God, who also had made him an apostle. For the beginnings of his faith are recorded, and they are very well known by being read in the church on an occasion calculated to distinguish them: ^ how, being turned away from the faith which he was destroying, and being vehemently opposed to it, he was suddenly by a more powerful grace converted to it, by the conversion of Him, to whom as One who would do this very thing it was said by the prophet, " Thou wilt turn and quicken us; so that not only from one who refused to believe he was made a willing beKever, but, moreover, from being a persecutor, he suffered persecution in defence of that faith which he [once] persecuted. Because it was given him by Christ " not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake."

Chap. 5. â€” To believe is to consider ivith assent.

And, therefore, commending that grace which is not given according to any merits, but is the cause of all good merits, he says, " ISTot that we are sufficient to think anything as of

* Ps. Ixxv. 6 [LXX.].
ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God." Let them give attention to this, and well weigh these words, who think that the beginning of faith is of ourselves, and the supplement [or increase] of faith is of God. For who cannot see that think;—iug is prior to believing? For no one believes anything unless he has first thought that it is to be believed. ' For however suddenly, however rapidly, some thoughts fly before the will to believe, and this presently follows in such wise as to attend them, as it were, in closest conjunction, it is yet necessary that everything which is believed should be believed after thought has preceded; ' although even belief itself is nothing else than consideration with assent. To'r"Tris'Tib there is a one who thinks that believes, since many think in order that they may not believe; but everybody who believes, thinks, 'â€” both thinks in believing, and believes by thinking. Therefore in what pertains to religion and piety (of which the apostle was speaking), if we are not capable of thinking anything as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God, we are certainly not capable of believing anything as of ourselves, since we cannot do this without thinking; but our sufficiency, by which we begin to believe, is of God. Wherefore, as no one is sufficient for himself, for the beginning or the completing of any good work whatever, â€” and this those brethren of yours, as what you have written intimates, already agree to be true, whence, as well in the beginning as in the carrying out of every good work, our sufficiency is of God, â€” so no one is sufficient for himself, either to begin or to perfect faith; but our sufficiency is of God. Because if faith is not a matter of thought, it is of no account; and we are not sufficient to think anything as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God.

Chap. 6. â€” Presumption and arrogance to be avoided.

Care must be taken, brethren, beloved of God, that a man do not lift himself up in opposition to God, when he says that he does what God has promised to do. Was not the faith of the nations promised to Abraham, " and he, giving glory to God, most fully believed that what He promised He is able

' 2 Cor. iii. 5.

CHAP. 7.] man's claim TO ORIGINATE FAITH. 125

also to perform "? ^ He therefore makes the faith of the nations, who is able to do what He has promised. Further, if God is the agent of our faith, acting in a wonderful manner in our hearts so that we believe, is there any reason to fear that He cannot do the whole; and ""does man^ on that account 'arrogate to himself its first elements, that he may merit to receive its last from God? Consider if in such a way any other result be gained than that the grace of God is given in any degree we please, according to our merits, and so grace is no more grace. ^ For on this principle it is made a matter of debt, it is not bestowed freely; for it is due to the believer that his faith itself should be increased by the Lord, and that the increased faith should be the wages of the faith begun; nor is it observed when this is said, that that very wage is assigned to believers, not of grace, but of debt. And I do not at all see why the whole should not be attributed to man, â€” as he who could originate for himself what he had not previously, can himself increase what he had originated, â€” except that it is impossible to withstand the most manifest divine testimony, by which faith, whence piety takes its beginning, is shown also to be the gift of God: such as is that testimony that " God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith; " ^ and that one, " Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ," ^ and other similar passages. ' Man, therefore, unwilling to resist such clear testimonies as these, and yet desiring himself to have the merit of believing, compounds as it were with God to claim a portion of faith for himself, and to leave a portion for Him; and, what is still more arrogant, he takes the first portion for himself, and gives the subsequent to Him; and so in that which he says belongs to both, he makes himself the first, and God the second !

Chap. 7. [m.] â€” Augustine confesses that he had formerly been in error concerning the grace of God.

It was not thus that that pious and humble teacher thought â€” I speak of the most blessed Cyprian â€” when he said " that we must boast in nothing, since nothing is our own."^ And in order to show this, he appealed to the apostle as a witness, where he said, " For what hast thou that thou hast not received ? And if thou hast received it, why boastest thou as if thou hast not received it ? " ^ And it was chiefly by this testimony that I myseK also was convinced when I was in a similar error, thinking that the faith whereby we believe on God is not God's gift, but that it is, in us of ourselves, and that by it we obtain the gifts of God, whereby we may live temperately and righteously and piously in this world. For I did not think that faith was prevented__by, God's grace, so that by its means would be given to us what we might profitably ask, excejDt that we could not believe if the proclamation of the truth did not precede; but that we should consent when the gospel was preached to us I thought was our own doing, and came to us from ourselves. And this my error is sufficiently indicated in some small works of mine written before my episcopate. Among these is that which you have mentioned in your letters,^ wherein is an exposition of certain propositions from the Epistle to the Eomans. Eventually, when I was retracting all my small works, and was prosecuting that retractation in writing, "of which task I had already completed two books before I had taken up your more lengthy letters, " when in the first volume I had reached the retractation of this book, I then spoke thus: " miglit obtain eternal life also. I had not yet very carefully sought, nor had I as yet found, what is the nature of the election of grace, of which the apostle says, ' A remnant are saved according to the election of grace.' Which assuredly is not grace if any merits recede it; lest what is now given, not according to grace, but according to debt, be rather paid to merits than freely given. For the same apostle says, ' The same God which worketh all in all; ' but it was never said, God believeth all in all; and thereupon I subjoined. Therefore what we believe is our own, but what good thing we do is of Him who giveth the Holy Spirit to them that believe.

I certainly could not say, even if I knew, that faith itself also is found among those gifts of God which are given by the same Spirit. Both, therefore, are ours on account of the choice of the will, and yet both are given by the spirit of faith and love. For faith is not alone, but, as it is written, ' Love with faith, from God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ.' And what I said a little after, " For it is ours to believe and to will, but it is His to give to those who believe, and with us the power of doing good works through the Holy Spirit, by whom love is shed abroad in our hearts, " true indeed; but by the same rule both are also God's, because God prepares the win; and both are ours too, because we are only brought about with our good wills. ' And thus what I subsequently said also: Because we are not able to will unless we are called; and when, after our calling, we would will, our willing is not sufficient, nor our running, unless God gives strength to us that run, and leads us whither He calls us; and thereupon I added: It is plain, therefore, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy, that we do good works, â€” this is absolutely most true. But I discovered little concerning the calling itself, which is according to God's purpose; for not such is the calling of all that are called, but only of the elect. Therefore what I said a little afterwards:

For as in those whom God elects it is not works but faith that inchoates the merit of doing good works by the gift of God, thus in those whom He condemns, unbelief and impiety inchoate.

the desert of punishment, so that even by way of punishment itself they do evil works, â€” I spoke most truly. But that even the merit itself of faith was God's gift, I neither thought of inquiring into, nor did I say. And in another place I say:

Por if He has mercy on a man. He makes him to do good works, and whom He hardeneth He leaves to do evil works; but that mercy is bestowed upon the preceding merit of faith, and that hardening is applied to preceding iniquity. And this indeed is true; but it should further have been asked, whether even the merit of faith does not come from God's mercy, â€” that is, whether that mercy is manifested in man only for the reason that he is a believer, or whether it is manifested precisely that he might be a believer? For we read in the apostle's words: ' I obtained mercy to be faithful.' â€” He does not say. Because I was faithful. Therefore, although it is given to the believer, yet it has been given also that he might be a believer. ' Therefore, also, in another place in the same book I most truly said: Because, if it is of God's mercy, and not of works, that we are called that we may believe, and it is granted to us when we believe to do good works, that mercy must not be grudged to the heathen; â€” although I there discoursed less carefully about that calling which is given according to God's purpose.'

Chap. 8. [iv.] â€” What Augustine wrote to SimpUcianus, the successor of Ambrose, Bishop of Milan.

You see plainly what was at that time my opinion concerning faith and works, although I was labouring in commending God's grace; and in this opinion I see that those brethren of ours now are, because they have not been as careful to make progress with me in my writings as they were in reading them.

For if they had been so careful, they would have found that question solved in accordance with the truth of the divine Scriptures in the first book of the two which I wrote in the very beginning of my episcopate to Simphcianus, of blessed memory, Bishop of the Church of Milan, and successor to St. Ambrose. Unless, perchance, they may not have known these books; in which case, take care that they do know them. Of this first of those two books, I first spoke in the second book of the BetractatioTis; and what I said is as follows: " Of the books, I say, on which, as a bishop, I have laboured, the first two are addressed to Simplicianus, president of the Church of Milan, who succeeded the most blessed Ambrose, â€” concerning divers questions, two of which I gathered into the first book from the Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Eomans. The former of them is about what is written: ' What shall we say, then? Is the law sin? Ly no means; ' ^ as far as the passage where he says, * Who shall deliver me from the body of this death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord.' ^ And therein I have expounded those words of the apostle: ' The law is spiritual; but I am carnal; ' ^ and others in which the flesh is declared to be in conflict against the Spirit, in such a way as if a man were there described as still under law, and not yet established under grace. For long afterwards I perceived that those words might even be (and probably were) the utterance of a spiritual man. The latter question in this book is gathered from that passage where the apostle says^, ' And not only this, but when Eebecca also had conceived by one,* even by our father Isaac,' ^ as far as that place where he says, 'Except the Lord of Sabaoth had left us a seed, we should be as Sodoma, and should have been like unto Gomorra.' ^ In the solution of which question I laboured indeed on behalf of the free choice of the human w^ill, but God's grace overcame, and I could only reach that point where the apostle is perceived to have said with the most evident truth, ' Eor who maketh thee to differ? and what hast thou that thou hast not received? Xow, if thou hast received it, why dost thou glory as if thou receivest it not? ' ^ And this the martyr Cj'prian was also desirous of setting forth when he compressed the whole of it in the very title: ' That we must boast in nothing, since nothing is our own.' " ^ This is why I previously said that it was chiefly by this apostolic testimony that I myself had been convinced, when I thought otherwise concerning this matter; ' which God revealed to me as I sought to solve this question when I was writing, as I said, to the Bishop Simplicianus. ^This testimony, therefore, of the apostle, when for the sake of repressing man's conceit he said, "For what hast thou which thou hast not received?"

' 1 Cor. vii. 25.

does not allow any believer to say, I have faith which I received not. All the arrogance of this answer is absolutely repressed by these apostolic words. Moreover, it cannot even be said, Although I have not a perfected faith, yet I have its beginning [scil. which I have not received], whereby I first of all believed in Christ. Because here also is answered: "But what hast thou that thou hast not received? Now, if thou hast received it, why dost thou glory as if thou receivedst it not?"

Chap. 9. The purpose of the apostle in these words.

The notion, however, which they entertain, that these words, "What hast thou that thou hast not received?" cannot be said of this faith, because it remained in the same nature, although degraded, which at first Avas endowed with health and perfection, is perceived to have no force for the purpose that they desire, if it be considered why the apostle said these words; for he was concerned that no one should glory in man, because dissensions had sprung up among the Corinthian Christians, so that every one was saying, "I, indeed, am of Paul, and another, I am of ApoUos, and another, I am of Cephas;" and thence he went on to say: "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the strong things: and God hath chosen the ignoble things of the world, and contemptible things, and those things which are not, to make of no account things which are; that no flesh should glory in God's presence." Here the design of the apostle is of a certainty sufficiently plain against ^he pride of man, that no one should glory in man; and thus, no one should glory in himself Finally, when he had said "that no flesh should glory in God's presence," in order to show in what man ought to glory, he immediately added, "But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, who is made unto us

1 1 Cor. iv. 7. " 1 Cor. i. 12. ^ i (jor. i. 27.

CHAP. 10.] EVERYTHING RECEIVED FROM GOD. 131

wisdom from God, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: that according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." Thence that purpose of his progressed, till afterwards rebuking them he says, "For ye are yet carnal; for whereas there are among you envying and contention, are ye not carnal, and walk according to man? For while one saith I am of Paul, and another, I am of ApoUos, are ye not men?" - What, then, is Apollos, and what Paul? Ministers by whom you believed; and to every one as the Lord has given. I have planted, and Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. Therefore, neither is he that planteth anything, nor he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase." Do you not see that the sole purpose of the apostle is that man may be humbled, and God alone exalted? Since in all those things, indeed, which are planted and watered, he says not that even the planter and the waterer are anything, but God who giveth the increase. Since the very fact, also, of the one's planting and the other's watering he attributes also not to themselves, but to God, when he says, " To every one as the Lord hath given; I have planted, Apollos watered." Hence, therefore, persisting in the same purpose he comes to the point of saying, " Therefore let no man glory in man," ^ for he had already said, " He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." After these and some other matters which are associated therewith, that same purpose of his is carried on in the words: " And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes, that ye might learn in us that no one of you should be puffed up for one against another above that which is written. For who maketh thee to differ ? And what hast thou which thou hast not received ? Now, if thou hast received it, why dost thou glory as if thou receivedst it not ? " *

Chap. 10. â€” It is God's grace u-likh specially distinguishes one man from another-

In this the apostle's most evident intention, in which h^ speaks against human pride, that none should glory in man, bttt in God, it is too absurd, as I think, to regard God's natural gifts [as comprehended], whether man's entire and perfected nature

1 1 Cor. i. 30. 2 1 Cor. iii. 3 ff. ^ 1 Cor. iii. 21. * 1 Cor. ir. 6.

itself, as it was bestowed on him in his first state, or the ' remains, whatever they may he, of his degraded nature. "^ For is it by such gifts as these, which are common to all men, that men are distinguished from one another ? But here he first said,
" For who maketh thee to differ ?" and then added, " And what hast thou that thou hast not received ? " Because a man, puffed up against another, might say. My faith makes me to differ, or my righteousness, or anything else of the kind. In reply to such notions, the good teacher says, " But what hast thou that thou hast not received ?" And from whom but from Him who maketh thee to differ from another, on whom He bestowed not what He bestowed on thee ? " Now if," says he, " thou hast received it, why dost thou glory as if thou receivedst it not ?" Is he concerned, I ask, about anything else save that he who glorieth should glory in the Lord ?
But nothing is so opposed to this feeling as for any one to glory concerning his own merits in such a way as if he himself had made them for himseK, and not the grace of God, â€” a grace, however, which makes the good to differ from the wicked, and is not common to the good and the wicked.
Let the grace, therefore, whereby we are living and reasonable creatures, and are distinguished from cattle, be attributed to nature; let that grace also by which, among men themselves, the handsome are made to differ from the ill-formed, or the intelligent from the stupid, or anything of that kind, be ascribed to nature. But he whom the apostle was rebuking did not puff himself up as contrasted with cattle, nor as contrasted with any other man, in respect of any natural endowment which might be found even in the worst of men. But he ascribed to himself, and not to God, some good gift which pertained to a holy life, and was puffed up therewith when he deserved to hear the rebuke, "Who hath made thee to differ?" and what hast thou that thou receivest not?" For though it is a natural endowment to be able to have faith, is it also natural to have it? "For all men have not faith," ^ although all men have the capacity to have faith. But the apostle does not say, "And what art thou able to have, the ability to have which thou receivest not?" but he says, "And what hast

1 2 Thess, iii, 2.

CHAP. 11.] god's MERCY IN ELECTIO^*. 133

thou which thou receivest not?" Accordingly, the ability to have faith/ as the ability to have love, belongs to men's nature; but to have faith, even as to have love, belongs to the grace of believers. That nature, therefore, in which is given to us the capability of having faith, does not distinguish man from man, but faith itself makes the believer to differ from the unbeliever. And thus, when it is said, "For who maketh thee to differ? and what hast thou that thou receivest not?" if any one dare to say, I have faith of myself, I did not, therefore, receive it, he directly contradicts this most manifest truth, — not because it is not in the power of man's will to believe or not to believe, but because in the Elect the will is prepared by the Lord. Thus, moreover, the passage, "For who maketh thee to differ? and what hast thou that thou receivest not?" refers to that very faith which is in the will of man.

Chap. 11. [vi.] â€” Tliat some men are elected Is of God's mercy.

Many hear the word of truth; but some believe, while others contradict. Therefore, the former will to believe; the latter do not will. Who does not know this? "Who can deny this? But since in some the will is prepared by the Lord, in others it is not prepared, we must assuredly be able to distinguish what comes from God's mercy, and what from His judgment.

"What Israel sought for," says the apostle, "he hath not obtained, but the election hath obtained it; and the rest were blinded, as it is written, God gave to them the spirit of compunction, â€” eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear, even to this day. 'And David said, Let their table be made a snare, a retribution, and a stumblingblock to them; let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see; and bow down their back always."^ Here is mercy and judgment, "mercy towards the election which has obtained the righteousness of God, but judgment to the rest which have been blinded. And yet the former, because they willed,/^Thence says Bernard, in his treatise On Grace and Free-will, ch. i.: "God is the author of salvation. Free-will is only capable of it. " Comp. de Vocat. believed; the latter, because they did not will believed not. Therefore mercy and judgment were manifested in these very wills. Certainly such an election is of grace, not at all of merits. For he had before said, " So, therefore, even at this present time, the remnant has been saved by the election of grace. And if by grace, now it is no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace." â– " Therefore the election obtained what it obtained freely; there preceded none of those things which they might first give, and it should be given to them again. He saved them for nothing. But to the rest who were blinded, as is there plainly declared, it was done in recompense. "All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth." ^ But His ways are unsearchable. Therefore the mercy by which He freely delivers, and the truth by which He righteously judges, are equally unsearchable.^

Chap. 12. [vii.] â€” Why the apostle said that we are justified by faith and not by works.

But perhaps it may be said: " The apostle distinguishes faith from works; he says, indeed, that grace is not of works, but he does not say that it is not of faith." This, indeed, is true. But Jesus says that faith itself also is the work of God, and commands us to work it. For the Jews said to Him, " What shall we do that we may work the work of God ? Jesus answered, and said unto them, This is the work of God, ' that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent." ^ ' The apostle, therefore, distinguishes faith from works, just as Judah is distinguished from Israel in the two kingdoms of the Hebrews, although Judah is Israel itself. And he says that a man is justified by faith and not by works, because faith itself is first given, from which may be obtained other things which are specially characterized as works, in which a man may live righteously. ^ For he himself also says, "By grace ye are saved through faith; and this not of yourselves; but it is the gift of God," * ã€” that is to say. And in saying, "through faith," [I meant] even faith itself is not of yourselves, but is God's gift. "Not of works," he says, "lest any man should be lifted up." For it is usually said. He deserved to believe, because he was a good man even before he believed. Which may be said of Cornelius, since his alms were accepted and his prayers heard before he had believed on Christ; and yet without some faith he neither gave alms nor prayed. For how did he call on Him on whom he had not believed ? But if he could have been saved without the faith of Christ, the Apostle Peter would not have been sent as an architect to build him up; although, "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain who build it." * And we are told. Faith is of ourselves; other things which pertain to works of righteousness are of the Lord; as if faith did not belong to the building, * ã€” as if, I say, the foundation did not belong to the building. But if this primarily and especially belongs to it, he labours in vain who seeks to build up the faith by preaching, unless the Lord in His mercy builds it up from within. * â€˘ Whatever therefore, of good works Cornelius performed, as well before he believed in Christ as when he believed and after he had believed, are all to be ascribed to God, lest, perchance, any man be lifted up.

Chap. 13. [vni.] * ã€” The effect of divine grace.

Accordingly, our only Master and Lord Himself, when He had said what I have above mentioned, * ã€” "This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent," * ã€” says a little afterwards in that same discourse of His, "I said unto you that ye also have seen me and have not believed. All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." * What is the meaning of "shall come to me," but, "shall believe in me" ? But it is the Father's gift that this may be the case. Moreover, a little after He says, "Murmur not among yourselves. No one can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him; and I will raise him up at the last day. It is written in the prophets. And they shall be all teachable * of God. Every man that hath heard of the Father, and hath learned, cometh unto me." * What is the meaning of, "Every man that hath heard of the Father, and hath learned, cometh unto me," except that there is none who hears of the Father,

* Acts X. - Ps. cxxvii. 1. * John vi. 36.

* Docibiles. * John vi. 43 ff.
and learns, who cometh not to me? For if every one who has heard of the Father, and has learned, comes, certainly every one who does not come has not heard of the Father; for if he had heard and learned, he would come. For no one has heard and learned, and has not come; but every one, as the Truth declares, who has heard of the Father, and has learned, comes. Far removed from the perceptions of the flesh is this teaching in which the Father is heard, and teaches to come to the Son. Engaged herein is also the Son Himself, because He is His word by which He thus teaches; and He does not do this through the ear of the flesh, but of the heart. Herein engaged, also, at the same time, is the Spirit of the Father and of the Son; and He, too, teaches, and does not teach separately, since we have learned that the workings of the Trinity are inseparable. And that is certainly the same Holy Spirit of whom the apostle says, "We, however, having the same Spirit of faith." ^ But this is especially attributed to the Father, for the reason that of Him is begotten the Only Begotten, and from Him proceeds the Holy Spirit, of which it would be tedious to argue more elaborately; and I think that my work in fifteen books on the Trinity which God is has already reached you. Very far removed, I say, from the perceptions of the flesh is this instruction wherein God is heard and teaches. We see that many come to the Son because we see that many believe on Christ, but when and how they have heard this from the Father, and have learned, we see not. It is true that that grace is exceedingly secret, but who doubts that it is grace? This grace, therefore, which is hiddenly bestowed in human hearts, is rejected by no hard heart, because it is given for the sake of first taking away the hardness of the heart. When, therefore, the Father is heard within, and teaches, so that a man comes to the Son, He takes away the heart of stone and gives a heart of flesh, as in the declaration of the prophet He has promised.

Because He thus makes them children and vessels of mercy which He has prepared for glory.

Chap. 14. "Why the Father does not teach all that they may come to Christ.

i~ Why, then, does He not teach all that they may come to

CHAP. 14.] now GOD TEACHES ALL MEN. 137

Christ, except because all whom He teaches, He teaches in mercy, while those whom He teaches not, in judgment He teaches not? Since, "On whom He will He has mercy, and whom He will He hardeneth." ^ But He has mercy when He gives good things. He hardens when he recompenses what is deserved. " Or if, as some would prefer to distinguish them, those words also are his to whom the apostle says, "Thou sayest then unto me," so that he may he regarded as having said, "Therefore hath He mercy on whom He will, and whom He will He hardeneth," as well as those which follow, â€” to wit,
"What is it that is still complained of? for* who resists His will?" Does the apostle answer, "0 man, what thou hast said is false? " No; but he says, " man, who art thou that repliest against God? Doth the thing formed say to him that formed it. Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay of the same lump?"^ and what follows, which you very well know. And yet after a certain measure the Father teaches all men to come to His Son.
For it was not in vain that it was written in the prophets,
" And they shall all be teachable of God." ^ And when He too had premised this testimony. He added, " Every man, therefore, who has heard of the Father, and has learned, cometh to me." "As, therefore, we speak justly when we say, concerning any teacher of literature who is alone in a city. He teaches literature here to everybody, â€” not that all men learn, but that there is none who learns literature there who does not learn from him, â€” so we justly say, God teaches all men to come to Christ, not because all come, but because none comes in any other way. And why He does not teach all men the apostle explained, as far as he judged that it was to be explained, because, " willing to show His wrath, and to exhibit His power.
He endured with much patience the vessels of wrath which were perfected for destruction; and that He might make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy which He has prepared for glory." * Hence it is that the " word of the cross is foolishness to them that perish; but unto them that are saved it is the power of God." ^
God teaches all such to come

* Rom. ix. 22. ^ 1 Cor. i. 18.

to Christ, for He wills all such to be saved, and to come to
't the knowledge of the truth. ^ And if He had willed to teach even those to whom the word of the cross is foolishness to come to Christ, beyond all doubt these also would have come.
For He neither deceives nor is deceived when He says,
" Every one that hath heard of the Father, and hath learned, Cometh to me." Away, then, with the thought that any one cometh not, who has heard of the Father and has learned.

Chap. 15. â€” It is believers that are taught of God.

" Why," say they, " does He not teach all men? " If we should say that they whom He does not teach are unwilling to learn, we shall be met with the answer: And what becomes of what is said to Him, " God, Thou wilt turn us again, and quicken us" ?^ Or if God does not make men willing who were not willing, on what principle does the Church pray, according to the Lord's commandment, for her persecutors? For thus also the blessed Cyprian would have it to be understood that we say, "Thy will be done, as in heaven so in earth," â€” that is, as in those who have already believed, and who are, as it were, heaven, so also in those who do not believe, and on this account are still the earth. What, then, do we pray for on behalf of those who are unwilling to believe, except that God would work in them to will also? Certainly the apostle says, "Brethren, my heart's good desire, indeed, and my prayer to God for them, is made for their salvation." ^ He prays for those who do not believe, â€” for what, except that they may believe? For in no other way do they obtain salvation. "' If, then, the faith of the petitioners precede the grace of God, does the faith of them on whose behalf prayer is made that they may believe precede the grace of God, since this is the very thing that is besought for them, that on them that believe not â€” that is, who have not faith â€” faith itself may be bestowed? ^ When, therefore, the gospel is preached, some believe, some believe not; but they who believe at the voice of the preacher from without, hear of the Father from within,

'Rom. X. 1.

CHAP. 16.] TO COME TO CHRIST IS TO BELIEVE. 139

and learn: while they who do not believe, hear outwardly, but inwardly do not hear nor learn; â€” that is to say, to the former it is given to believe; to the latter it is not given. Because 'â€œno man," says He, "cometh to me, except the Father which sent me draw him." ^ And this is more plainly said afterwards. For after a little time, when He was speaking of eating His flesh and drinking His blood, and some even of His disciples said, "This is a hard saying, who can hear it?" ^ And this is more plainly said afterwards. For after a little time, when He was speaking of eating His flesh and drinking His blood, and some even of His disciples said, "This is a hard saying, who can hear it?" ^ And this is more plainly said afterwards. For after a little time, when He was speaking of eating His flesh and drinking His blood, and some even of His disciples said, "This is a hard saying, who can hear it?" ^ And this is more plainly said afterwards. For after a little time, when He was speaking of eating His flesh and drinking His blood, and some even of His disciples said, "This is a hard saying, who can hear it?"

Jesus, knowing in Himself that His disciples murmured at this, said unto them. Doth this offend you?" ^ And a little after He said, "The words that I have spoken unto you are spirit and life; but there are some among you which believe not." ^ And immediately the evangelist says, "For Jesus knew from the beginning who were the believers, and who should betray Him; and He said. Therefore said I unto you, that no man can come unto me except it were given him of my Father." Therefore, to be drawn to Christ by the Father, and to hear and learn of the Father in order to come to Christ, is nothing else than to receive from the Father the gift by which to believe in Christ. For not the hearers of the gospel were distinguished from those who did not hear, but the believers from those who did not believe, by Him who said, "No man cometh to me except it were given him of my Father."

Chap. 16. â€” "Thy the gift of faith is not given to all.

"Faith, when, as well in its beginning as in its completion, is God's gift; and let no one have any doubt whatever, unless he desires to resist the plainest sacred writings, that this gift is given to some, while to some it is not given. And [the question] why it is not given to all ought not to disturb the believer, who believes that all have gone from one into a condemnation, which undoubtedly is most righteous; so that even if none were delivered therefrom, there would be no just cause for finding fault with God. Whence it is plain that it is a great grace for many to be delivered, and to acknowledge in those that are not delivered what would be due to themselves; so that he that glorieth may glory not in his own 1 Jolm vi. 44. - John vi. 60 ff. ^ John vi. 63 ff.

merit s, which he sees to be equalled in those that are condemned, but in the Lord. And why He delivers one rather than another. " His judgments are unsearchable, and His ways ^ast finding out." For it is better in this case for us to hear or to say, " man, who art thou that repliest against God ? " ^ than to dare to say, as if we could know what He has chosen to be kept secret. Since, moreover, He could ' not will anything unrighteous. '

Chap. 17. [ix.] â€” His argument in his letter against Porphyry.

But that which you remember my saying' in a certain small treatise of mine against Porphyry, under the title of The Time of the Christian Religion, I so said ^ for the sake of escaping this more careful and elaborate argument about grace; although its meaning, which could be unfolded elsewhere or by others, was not wholly omitted, although I had been unwilling in that place to explain it [at large]. For, among other matters, I spoke thus in answer to the question proposed, why Christ should have come after so long a time: "Accordingly, I say, since they do not object to Christ that all do not follow His teaching (for even they themselves feel that this could not be objected at all with any justice, either to the wisdom of the philosophers or even to the deity of their own gods), what will they reply, if â€” leaving out of the question that depth of God's wisdom and knowledge where perchance some other divine plan is far more secretly hidden, without prejudging also other causes, which cannot be

j traced out by the wise â€” we say to them only this, for the sake of brevity in the arguing of this question, that Christ

I willed to appear to men, and that His doctrine should be preached among them, at that time when He knew, and at that place where He knew, that there were some who would believe on Him. For at those times, and in those places, at which His gospel was not preached. He foreknew that all would be in [respect of] His preaching such as, not indeed all, but many of them, were in His bodily presence, who would neither believe on Him, nor on the dead who were raised by Him; such as many whom we can now see, although the declarations of the prophets concerning Him are fulfilled by such manifestations, still unwilling to believe, and professing to resist by human astuteness, rather than to yield to divine authority so clear and perspicuous, and so lofty, and sublimely made known, so long as the human understanding is small and weak in its approach to divine truth. What wonder is it, then, if Christ knew the world in former ages to be so full of unbelievers, that He should reasonably refuse to appear, or to be preached to them, who, as He foreknew, would believe neither His words nor His miracles? For it is not incredible that all at that time were such, as from His coming even to the present time we marvel that there have been and are so many. And yet from the beginning of the human race, sometimes more hiddenly, sometimes more evidently, as to Divine Providence seemed to be more fitting, there was neither a failure of prophecy [concerning Him], nor were there wanting those who believed on Him; as well [in the period] from Adam to Moses, as in the people of Israel itself, which by a certain special mystery was a prophetic people; and in other nations before He had come in the flesh. For as some are mentioned in the sacred Hebrew book, as early as the time of Abraham, neither of his fleshly race nor of the people of Israel, nor of the extraneous society among the people of Israel, who were, nevertheless, sharers in their sacrament [scil. of circumcision], why may we not believe that there were others elsewhere among other people, here and there, although we do not read any mention of them in the same authorities?

Thus the salvation [announced by] this religion, by which, as the only true one, true salvation is faithfully promised, never failed him who was worthy of it; and w^h^ever it faded was not worthy of it. ’ And from the very beginning of the propagation of man, even to the end, the gospel is preached, to some for a reward, to some for judgment; and thus also those to whom the faith was not announced at all were foreknown as those who would not believe; and those to whom it was announced, although they were not such as would believe, are set forth as an example for the former; while those to whom it is announced who should believe, are prepared for the kingdom of heaven, and the company of the holy angels.”

142 ON THE PREDESTINATION OF THE SAINTS. ’ [CHAP. 19.

Chap. 18. â€” The gist of the preceding argument.
Do you not see that my desire was, without any prejudgment of the sacred counsel of God, and of other [possible] reasons, to say something that might seem sufficient about Christ's foreknowledge, to convince the unbelief of the pagans who had brought forward this question? For what is more true than that Christ foreknew who should believe on Him, and at what times and places they should believe? But whether by the preaching of Christ to themselves by themselves they were to have faith, or whether they would receive it by God's gift, â€” that is, whether God only foreknew them, or also predestinated them, I did not at that time think it necessary to inquire or to discuss. Therefore what I said, "that Christ willed to appear to men at that time, and that His doctrine should be preached among them when He knew, and where He knew, that there were those who would believe on Him," may also thus be said, That Christ willed to appear to men at that time, and that His gospel should be preached among those, whom He knew, and where He knew, that there were those who had been elected in Himself before the foundation of the world. But since, if it were so said, it would make the reader desirous of asking about those things which now by the warning of Pelagian errors must of necessity be discussed with greater copiousness and care, it seemed to me that what at that time was sufficient should be briefly said, making exception, as I said, of the depth of the wisdom and knowledge of God, and without prejudging other reasons, concerning which I thought that we might more fittingly argue, not then, but at some other time.

Chap. 19. [x.]â€”what respects predestination and grace differ.

Moreover, that which I said, " That the salvation offered by this religion has never failed him who was worthy of it, and that he whom it failed was not worthy," if it be discussed and asked whence any man can be worthy, there are not wanting those who say â€” by human will. But we say, by divine grace or predestination. Further, between grace and predestination

CHAP. 19.] GRACE AND PREDESTINATION. 143

there is only this difference, that predestination is a preparation for grace, while grace is actually the endowment itself.
"When, therefore, the apostle says, " Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus in good works," ^ it is grace; but what follows â€”
" which God hath prepared that we should walk in them " â€” is predestination, which cannot exist without foreknowledge, although foreknowledge may exist without predestination; because God foreknew by predestination those things which He was about to do, whence it was said, " He made those things that shall be."^ Moreover, He is able to foreknow even those things which He does not Himself do, â€” as all sins whatever; because, although there are some which are in such wise sins as that they are also the penalties of sins, whence it is said,
"God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient,"^ it is not in such a case the sin that is God's, but the judgment. Therefore God's predestination in [respect of] good is, as I have said, the preparation of grace; which grace is the effect of that very predestination. ^

Therefore when God promised to Abraham in his seed the faith of the nations, saying, "I have established thee a father of many nations," * whence the apostle says, "Therefore it is of faith, that the promise, according to grace, might be established to all the seed,"^ He promised not concerning the power of our will, but concerning His own predestination. For He promised what He Himself would do, not what men would do. Because, although men do those good things which pertain to God's worship. He Himself makes them to do what He has commanded; it is not they that cause Him to do what He has promised. Otherwise the fulfilment of God's promises would not be in the power of God, but in that of men; and thus what was promised by God to Abraham would be given to Abraham by men themselves. Abraham, however, did not believe thus, but "he believed, giving glory to God, that what He promised He is able also to perform."^ He does not say, "to foretell." He does not say, "to foreknow;" for He can foretell and foreknow the doings of strangers also; but ^ Eph. ii. 9, 10. - Isa. xlv, 11 [LXX.]. ' Eom. i. 28.

144 ON THE PREDESTINATION OF THE SAINTS. [CHAP. 21.

He says, "He is able also to do;" and thus He is speaking not of the doings of others, but of His own.

Chap. 20. â£” Did God promise the good works of the nations, and not their faith, to Abraham?

Did God, perchance, promise to Abraham in his seed the good works of the nations, as He would promise that which He Himself does, and not the faith of the nations, which men make for themselves; but as He would promise what He Himself does, did He so foreknow that men would effect that faith? The apostle, indeed, does not speak thus, because God promised children to Abraham, who should follow the footsteps of his faith, as he very plainly says. But if He promised the works, and not the faith of the nations, certainly since they are not good works unless they are of faith (for "the righteous lives of faith," ^ and, "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin,"^ and, "Without faith it is impossible to please [God] " ^), nevertheless it is in man's power that God should fulfil what He has promised. For unless man should do what without the gift of God pertains to man, he will not cause God to give it, â£” that is, unless man have faith of himself.
God does not fulfil what He has promised, that works of righteousness should be given by God. And thus that God should be able to fulfil His promises is not in God's power, but in man's. And if truth and piety do not forbid our believing this, let us believe with Abraham, that what He has promised He is able also to perform. But He promised children to Abraham; and this men cannot be unless they have faith, therefore He gives faith also.

Chap. 21. ò€” It is to be wondered at that men should rather trust to their own weakness than to God's strength.

Certainly, when the apostle says, " Therefore it is of faith that the promise may be sure according to grace,"* I marvel that men would rather entrust themselves to their own weakness, than to the strength of God's promise. But sayest thou, God's will concerning myself is to me uncertain? What then?

Is thine own will concerning thyself certain to thee? and dost thou not fear, ò€” " Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall " ?^ Since, then, both are uncertain, why does not man commit his faith, hope, and love to the stronger will, rather than to the weaker?

Chap. 22. ò€” God's promise is sure.

"Eut," say they, "when it is said, 'If thou believest, thou shalt be saved,' one of these things is required; the other is offered.

What is required is in man's power; what is offered is in God's.' Why are not both in God's, as well what He commands as what He offers? For He is asked to give what He commands. Believers ask that their faith may be increased; they ask on behalf of those who do not believe, that faith may be given to them; therefore both in its increase and in its beginnings, faith is the gift of God. But it is said thus: " If thou believest, thou shalt be saved," in the same way that it is said, " If by the Spirit ye shall mortify the deeds of the flesh, ye shall live." ^ For in this case also, of these two things one is required, the other is offered. It is said, " If by the Spirit ye shall mortify the deeds of the flesh, ye shall live," Therefore, that we mortify the deeds of the flesh is required, but that we may live is offered. Is it, then, fitting for us to say, that to mortify the deeds of the flesh is not a gift of God, and not to confess it to be a gift of God, because we hear it required of us, with the offer of life as a reward if we shall do it? Away with the notion of this being approved by the partakers and champions of grace! This is the damnable error of the Pelagians, whose mouths the apostle immediately stopped when he added, " For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God; " ^ lest w^e should believe that we mortify the deeds of the flesh, not by God's Spirit, but by our own. And of this Spirit of God, moreover, he- was speaking in that place where he says, " But all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing unto every man what is his own, as He w^ill; " * and among all these things, as you know, he also named faith. As, therefore, although it is the gift of God to mortify the deeds of the flesh, yet it is required of us, and life is set before us as a reward

[for doing it]; ^ so also faith is the gift of God, although when it is said, " If thou believest, thou shalt be saved," faith is required of us, and salvation is proposed to us as a reward.

Tor these things are both commanded us, and are shown to be God's gifts, in order that we may understand both that we do them, and that God makes us to do them, as He most plainly says by the prophet Ezekiel. For what is plainer than when He says, "I will cause you to do"?^ Give heed^ to that very passage of Scripture, and you will see that God promises that He will make them to do those things which He commands to be done. He truly is not disguising the merits, but the evil deeds, of those to whom He shows that He is returning good for evil, by the very fact that He causeth them thenceforth to have good works, in causing them to do the divine commands.

Chap. 23. [xii.] â€” Remarkable illustrations of grace and predestination in infants, and in Christ,

But all this reasoning, whereby we maintain the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord to be truly grace, that is, that it is not given according to our merits, although it is most manifestly asserted by the witness of the divine declarations; yet, among those who think that they are withheld from all desire of piety unless they can attribute to themselves something, which they first give that it may be recompensed to them again, [among such, I say, this reasoning] involves somewhat of a difficulty in respect of the condition of grown-up people, who are already exercising the free choice of their will. But when we come to the case of infants, and to the Mediator between God and man Himself, the man Christ Jesus, there is wanting any assertion of human merits that precede the grace of God, because the former are not distinguished from others by any preceding good deserts that they should belong to the Deliverer of men; any more than He Himself, being Himself a man, was made the Deliverer of men by virtue of any precedent human merits.
Chap. 24. â€” That no one is judged according to what he would have done if he had lived longer.

For who can hear that infants, baptized in the condition of

' Ezek. xxxvi. 27.

CHAP. 24.] TZFOUND OF GOD's JUDGMENT. 147

mere infancy^ are said to depart from this life according to their future merits, and that others not baptized are said to die in the same age because their future deservings are foreknown, â€” but foreknown as evil, â€” so that what God rewards or condemns in them is not their good or evil life, but no life at all? The apostle, indeed, fixed a limit which man's incautious suspicion, to speak gently, ought not to transgress, for he says, "We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may receive according to the things which he has done by means of the body, whether it be good or evil recompense." ^ " Has done," he said; and he did not add, " or would have done." But I know not whence this thought should have entered the minds of such men, that the future merits of infants which shall never exist (scil. the merits) should be punished or honoured. And why is it said that a man is to be judged according to those things which he has done by means of the body, although many things are done by the mind alone, and not by the body, nor by any member of the body; and for the most part things of such importance, that a most righteous punishment would be due to such thoughts, such as, â€” to say nothing of others, â€” that " The fool hath said in his heart there is no God "? ^

What, then, is the meaning of, " According to those things that he hath done by means of the body," except according to these things which he has done during that time in which he was in the body, so that we may understand "by means of the body" as meaning " throughout the season of bodily life "? But after the body, no one will be in the body except at the last resurrection, [and then] not for the purpose of establishing any claims of merit, but for the sake of receiving recompenses for good deservings, and enduring punishments for evil deservings. But in this intermediate period between the putting off and the taking again of the body, the souls are either tormented or they are in repose, according to those things which they have done during the period of the bodily life.

And to this period [of the bodily life] moreover pertains, what the Pelagians deny, but Christ's Church confesses, original sin; and according to whether this is by God's grace loosed, or by

1 2 Cor. V. 10. 2 Ps. xiv. 1.
God's judgment not loosed, when infants die, they pass, on the one hand, by the merit of regeneration from evil to good, or on the other, by the merit of their origin from evil to evil. The Catholic faith acknowledges this, and even some heretics, without any contradiction, agree to this.

But in the height of wonder and astonishment I am unable to discover whence men, whose intelligence your letters show to be by no means contemptible, could entertain the opinion that any one should be judged not according to the merits that he had as long as he was in the body, but according to the merits which he would have had if he had lived longer in the body; and I should not dare to believe that there were such men, if I could venture to disbelieve you. But I hope that God will interpose, so that when they are admonished they may at once perceive, that if those sins which are said to have been about to exist can rightly be punished by God's judgment in those who are not baptized, they may also be rightly remitted by God's grace in those who are baptized. For whoever says that future sins can only be punished by God's judgment, but cannot be pardoned by God's mercy, ought to consider how great a wrong he is doing to God and His grace; as if future sin could be foreknown, and could not be foregone. And if this is absurd, it is the greater reason that help should be afforded to those who would be sinners if they lived longer, when they die in early life, by means of that laver wherein sins are washed away.

Chap. 25. [xiii.] â€” Possibly the baptized infants could have repented if they had lived, and the unbaptized not.

But if, perchance, they say that sins are remitted to penitents, and that those who die in infancy [unbaptized] are not baptized because they are foreknown as not likely to repent if they should live, while God has foreknown that those who are baptized and die in infancy would have repented if they had lived, let them observe and see that if it be so it is not in this case original sins which are punished in infants that die without baptism, but what would have been the sins of each one had he lived; and also in baptized infants, that it is not original sins that are washed away, but their own future sins.

CHAP. 26.] PELAGIAN VIEW OF INFANT BAPTISM. 149

if they should live, since they could not sin except in more mature age; but that some were foreseen as such as would repent, and others as such as would not repent, therefore some were baptized, and others departed from this life without baptism. If the Pelagians should dare to say this, by their denial of original sin they would thus be relieved of the necessity of seeking, on behalf of infants outside of the kingdom of God, for some place of I know not what happiness of their own; especially since they are convinced that they cannot have eternal life because they have not eaten the flesh nor drunk the blood of Christ; and because in them who have no sin at all, baptism, which is given for the remission of sins, is falsified. For they would go on to say that there is no original sin, but that those who as infants are released are either baptized or not baptized according to their future deserving if they should live, and that according to their future merits they either receive or do not receive the body and blood of Christ, without which they absolutely cannot have life; and are baptized for the true remission of sins although they derived no sins from Adam, because the sins are remitted unto them concerning which God foreknew that they would repent. Thus with the greatest ease they would plead and would win their cause, in which they deny that there is any original sin, and contend that the grace of God is only given according to our deserving. But that the future merits of men, which merits will never come into existence, are beyond all doubt no merits at all, it is absolutely most easy to see: for this reason even the Pelagians were not able to say this; and much rather those who are only semi-Pelagians ought not to say it. For it cannot be said with what pain I find that they who with us on Catholic authority condemn the error of those heretical [Pelagians], have not seen [the absurdity of] this, which the Pelagians themselves have seen to be most false and absurd.

Chap. 26. [xiv.] æ” Reference to Cyprian's treatise " On the Mortality."

Cyprian wrote a work On the Mortality,^ known with approval to many and almost all who love ecclesiastical literature,

150 ON THE PREDESTINATION OF THE SAINTS. [CHAP. 9G, wherein lie says that death is not only not disadvantageous to believers, but that it is even found to be advantageous, because it withdraws men from the risks of sinning, and establishes them in a security of not sinning. But wherein is the advantage of this, if even future sins which have not been committed are punished? Yet he argues most copiously and well that the risks of sinning are not wanting in this life of ours, and that they do not continue after this life is done; where also he adduces that testimony from the book of Wisdom: " He was taken away, lest wickedness should alter his understanding." ^ And this was also adduced by me when you said that those brethren of yours had rejected it on the ground of its not having been brought forward from a canonical book; as if, even setting aside the attestation of this book, the thing itself were not clear which I wished to be taught therefrom. For what Christian Avould dare to deny that the righteous man, if he should be prematurely laid hold of by death, will be in repose? Whoever should say this, will any man of sound faith think that he can withstand it? Moreover, if he should say that the righteous man, if he should depart from his righteousness in which he has long lived, and should die in that impiety after having lived in it, I say not a year, but one day, will go hence into the punishment due to the wicked, his righteousness having no power in the future to avail him, â€” will any believer contradict this evident truth?

Further, if we are asked whether, if he had died then at the time that he was righteous, he would have incurred punishment or repose, shall we hesitate to answer repose? This is the whole reason why it is said, â€” whoever says it, â€” " He was taken away, lest wickedness should alter his understanding."
For it was said in reference to the risks of this life, not with reference to the foreknowledge of God, who foreknew that which was about to be, not that which was not about to be â€” that is, that He would bestow on him an immature death in order that he might be withdrawn from the uncertainty of temptations; [and who did not foreknow] that he would sin, since he was not about to remain in temptation. Because, concerning this life, we read in the book of Job, " Is not the life of man upon earth a [state of] trial? "^ But why it should be granted to some to be taken away from the perils of this life while they are righteous, while others who are righteous until they fall from righteousness are kept in the same risks in a more lengthened life, â€” who has known the mind of the Lord?

And yet it is permitted to be understood from this, that even those righteous people who maintain good and pious characters, even to the maturity of old age and to the last day of this life, must not glory in their own merits, but in the Lord, since He who took away the righteous man from the shortness of life, lest wickedness should alter his understanding, Himself
guards the righteous man in any length of life [however prolonged it may be], that wickedness may not alter his understanding. But why He should have kept the righteous man here to fall, when He might have withdrawn him before, â€” His judgments, although absolutely righteous, are yet unsearchable,

Chap. 27. â€” The book of Wisdom obtains in the Church the authority of canonical Scripture.

And since these things are so, the judgment of the book of Wisdom ought not to be repudiated, since for so long a course of years that book has deserved to be read in the Church of Christ, from the position of the readers of the Church of Christ, and to be heard by all Christians, from bishops downwards, even to the lowest lay believers, penitents, and catechumens, with the veneration paid to divine authority. For assuredly, if, from those who have been before me in commenting on the divine Scriptures, I should bring forward a defence of this judgment, which we are now called upon to defend more carefully and copiously than usual against the new error of the Pelagians, â€” that is, that God's grace is not given according to our merits, and that it is given freely to whom it is given, because it is neither of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy; but that by righteous judgment it is not given to whom it is not given, because there is no unrighteousness with God; â€” if, therefore, I should put forth a defence of this opinion [gathered] from Catholic commentators on the divine oracles who have preceded us, assuredly these there, then, for us to look into the writings of those who, before this heresy sprang up, had no necessity to be conversant in a question so difficult of solution as this, which beyond a doubt they would have done if they had been 'compelled to answer such objections as these' ? "Whence it arose that they touched upon what they thought of God's grace briefly in some passages of their writings, and cursorily; but on those matters which they argued against the enemies of the Church, and in exhortations to every virtue by which to serve the living and true God for the purpose of attaining eternal life and true happiness, they dwelt at length. But to the recapitulations of prayers God's grace simply seemed to be what it could do; for what God commands to be done would not be asked for from God, unless it could be given by Him that it should be done."

Chap. 28. â€” Cyprian's treatise " On the Mortality."

But if any wish to be instructed in the opinions of those who have handled the subject, it behoves them to prefer to all commentators the book of Wisdom, where it is read, " He was taken away, that wickedness should not alter his understanding; " because illustrious commentators, even in the times nearest to the apostles, preferred it to themselves, seeing that when they made use of it for a testimony, they believed that they were making use of nothing but a divine testimony; and certainly it appears that the most blessed Cyprian, in order to commend the advantage of an earlier death, contended that those who end this life, wherein sin is possible, are taken away from the risks of sins. In the same treatise, among other things, he says, " Why, when you are about to be with Christ, and are secure of the divine promise, do you not embrace [the assurance] of being called to Christ, and rejoice that you are free from the devil? " ^ And in another place he says, " Boys escape the peril of their unstable age." ^ And again, in another place, he says, " Why do we not hasten and run, that we may see our country; that we may hail our relatives? A great number of those who are dear to us are expecting us there, &c.” a dense and abundant crowd of parents, brethren, sons, are longing for us; already secure of their own safety, but still anxious about our salvation.” By these and such like sentiments, that teacher sufficiently and plainly testifies, in the clearest light of the Catholic faith, that perils of sin and trials are to be feared even until the putting off of this body, but that afterwards no one shall suffer any such things. And even if he did not testify thus, when could any manner of Christian be in doubt on this matter? How, then, should it not have been of advantage to a man who has lapsed, and who finishes his life wretchedly in that same state of lapse, and passes into the punishment due to such as he, &c.” how, I. say, should it not have been of the greatest and highest advantage to such an one to be snatched by death from this sphere of temptations before his fall?

Chap. 29. &c.” God's dealing does not depend upon any contingent merits of men.

And thus, unless we indulge in reckless disputation, the entire question is concluded concerning him who is taken away lest wickedness should alter his understanding. And the book of Wisdom, which for such a series of years has deserved to be read in Christ's Church, and in which this is read, ought not to suffer injustice because it withstands those who are mistaken on behalf of men's deserving, [in supposing] that they may come in opposition to the most manifest grace of God: which grace chiefly appears in infants, of whom, while some who are baptized, and some who are not baptized, come to the end of this life, they sufficiently point to God's mercy and His judgment. His mercy, indeed, gratuitous; His judgment, of debt. For if men should be judged according to the merits of their life, which merits they have been prevented by death from actually having, but would have had if they had lived, it would be of no advantage to him who is taken away lest wickedness should alter his understanding; it would be of no advantage to those who die in a state of lapse if they should die before. And this no Christian will venture to say. Wherefore our brethren, who with us on behalf of the Catholic faith assail the pest of the Pelagian error, ought not to such an extent to favour the Pelagian opinion, - wherein they conceive that God's grace is given according to our merits, as to endeavour (which they cannot dare) to invalidate a true sentiment, plainly and from ancient times Christian, &c.” ” He was taken away, lest wickedness should alter his understanding; ” and to build up that which we should think, &c.” I do not say, no one would believe, but no one would dream, "aें" to wit, that any deceased person would be judged according to those things which he would have done if he had lived for a more lengthened period." Surely thus what we say manifests itself clearly to be incontestable, "aें" that the grace of God is not given according to our merits; so that ingenious men who contradict this truth should be constrained to say those things which must be rejected from the ears and from the thoughts of all men.

Chap. 80. [sv.] "The most illustrious instance of predestination is Christ Jesus.

Moreover, the most illustrious Light of predestination and grace is the Saviour Himself, "aें" the Mediator Himself between God and men, the man Christ Jesus. And, pray, by what preceding merits of His, whether of works or of faith, did the human nature which was in Him procure for Him that He 'should be this?" Let this have an answer, I beg. That man, whence did He deserve this, "aें" to be taken up by the Word into unity of person with the co-eternal Father, and be the only-begotten Son of God? Was it because any kind of goodness in Him preceded? What did He do before? What did He believe? What did He ask, that He should attain to this unspeakable excellence? By the act and the assumption of the Word did not that man Himself, from the time He began to be, begin to be the only Son of God? Did not that woman, full of grace, conceive the only Son of God? Was He not born the only Son of God, of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary, "aें" not of the lust of the flesh, but by God's peculiar gift? 'Was it to be feared that as age matured such a man as He would sin of free-will? Or was the will in Him not free on that account? and was it not so much the more free in proportion to the greater impossibility of His becoming the servant of sin? Certainly, in Him human nature "aें" that is to say, our nature "aें" specially received all those specially admirable gifts, and any others that may most truly be said to be peculiar to Him, by virtue of no merits of His which preceded. Let a man here answer to God if he dare, and say. Why was it not I also? And if he should hear, "man, who art thou that repliest against God?" ^ let him not at this point restrain himself, but increase his impudence and say, "How is it that I hear, Who art thou, man? since I am what I hear, "aें" that is, a man, and He of whom I speak is but the same? Why should not I also be what He is? For it is by grace that He is such and so great; why is grace different when nature is common? Assuredly, there is no respect of persons with God." I say, not what Christian man, but what madman will say this?

CHAP. 31.] PEEDESTINATION OF CHRIST, 155

Chap. 31. "aें" Christ predestinated to he tlie Son of God.
Therefore in Him who is our Head let there appear to be the very fountain of grace, whence, according to the measure of every man. He diffuses Himself through all His members.

It is by that grace that every man from the beginning of his faith becomes a Christian, by which grace that one man from His beginning became Christ: the former also is born again by the same Spirit of which the latter was born. By the same Spirit is effected in us the remission of sins, by which Spirit it was effected that He should have no sin. God certainly foreknew that He would do these things. This, therefore, is that same predestination of the saints which most especially shone forth in the Saint of saints and who is there of those who rightly understand the declarations of the truth that can deny this predestination? For we have learned that the Lord of glory Himself was predestinated in so far as the man was made the Son of God. The teacher of the Gentiles exclaims, in the beginning of his epistles, " Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle, separated unto the gospel of God (which He had promised afore by His prophets in the Holy Scriptures) concerning His Son, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh, who was predestinated to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of sanctification by the resurrection of the dead." Therefore Jesus was predestinated, so that He who was to be the Son of David according to the flesh should yet be in power the Son of God, according to the Spirit of sanctification, because He was born of the Holy Spirit and of the Virgin Mary. This is that ineffably accomplished special taking up of man by God the Word, so that He might truly and properly be called at the same time the Son of God and the Son of man, â€” Son of man on account of the taking up of the man, and the Son of God on account of the God only-begotten who took Him up, so that a Trinity and not a Quaternity might be believed in.

Such a transplantation of human nature was predestinated, so great, so lofty, and so sublime that there was no possibility of exalting it more highly, â€” just as on our behalf that divinity itself had no possibility of more humbly putting itself off, save by the assumption of man's nature with the weakness of the flesh, even to the death of the cross. As, therefore, that one man was predestinated to be our Head, so we being many are predestinated to be His members. Here let human merits which have perished through Adam keep silence, and let that grace of God reign which reigns through Jesus Christ our Lord, the only Son of God, the one Lord. Let whoever could find in our Head the merits which preceded that peculiar generation, seek in us His members for those merits which preceded our manifold regeneration. For that generation was not recompensed to Christ, but given; that He should be born, namely, of the Spirit and the Virgin, remote from all obligation of sinning. Thus also our being born again of water and the Spirit is not recompensed to us for any merit, but freely given; and if faith has brought us to the laver of regeneration, we ought not therefore to suppose that we have first given anything, so seed of David according to the flesh, who was predestinated [to be] the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of sanctification by the resurrection of the dead." that the regeneration of salvation should be recompensed to us again; because He made us to believe in Christ, who made for us a Christ on whom we believe. He makes in men the beginning and the completion of the faith in Jesus who made the man Jesus the beginner and finisher.

CHAP. 33.] THE TWOFOLD CALLING. 157

of the faith:^ for thus, as you know, He is called in the epistle which is addressed to the Hebrews.

Chap. 32. [xvi.] â€” The twofold calling.

God indeed calls many of his children to be predestinated, to make them members of His only predestinated Son, â€” not with that calling with which they were called who would not come to the marriage, since with that calling were called also the Jews, to whom Christ crucified is an offence, and the Gentiles, to whom Christ crucified is foolishness; but with that vocation He calls them predestinated which the apostle distinguished when he said that he preached Christ, the wisdom of God and the power of God, to them that were called, Jews as well as Greeks. For thus he says, " But unto them which are called," in order to show that there were some who were not called; knowing that there is a certain definite calling of those who are called according to God's purpose, whom He has foreknown and predestinated before to be conformed to the image of His Son. And it was this calling he meant when he said, " Not of works, but of Him that calleth; it was said unto her. That the elder shall serve the younger."^ Did he say, " ISTot of works, but of him that believeth " ? Eather, he actually took this away from man, that he might give the whole to God. Therefore he said, " But of Him that calleth," â€” not with any sort of calling whatever, but with that calling wherewith a man is made a believer.

Chap. 33. â€” It is in the power of evil men to sin; but to do this or that hy means of that wickedness is in God's power alone.

Moreover, it was this that he had in view when he said,

"The gifts and calling of God are without repentance."* And in that saying also consider for a little what was its purport.

For when he had said, " For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, that ye may not be wise in yourselves, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in, and so all Israel should be saved; as it is written. There shall come out of away their sins; ^ he immediately added, what is to be very carefully understood, ^ " As concerning the gospel, indeed, they are enemies for your sakes; but as concerning the election, they are beloved for their fathers' sakes." ^ "^ "What is the meaning of, "as concerning the gospel, indeed, they are enemies for your sakes," but that their enmity wherewith they put Christ to death was, without doubt, as we see, an advantage to the gospel ? And he shows that this came about by God's ordering, who knew how to make a good use even of evil things; not that the vessels of wrath might be of advantage to Him, but that by His own good use of them they might be of advantage to the vessels of mercy.

For what could be said more plainly than what is actually said, " As concerning the gospel, indeed, they are enemies for your sakes " ? It is, therefore, in the power of the wicked to sin; but that in sinning they should do this or that particular thing by that wickedness is not in their power, but in God's, who divides the darkness and regulates it; so that hence even what they do contrary to God's will is not fulfilled except as God's will. We read in the Acts of the Apostles that when the apostles had been sent away by the Jews, and had come to their own friends, and shown them what great things the priests and elders said to them, they all with one consent lifted up their voices to the Lord, and said, " Lord, thou art God, which hast made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein; who, by the mouth of our father David, thy holy servant, hast said, Why did the heathen rage, and the peoples imagine vain things ?
The kings of the earth stood up, and the princes were gathered together against the Lord, and against His Christ. For in truth, there have assembled together in this city against Thy holy child Jesus, whom Thou hast anointed, Herod and Pilate, and the people of Israel, to do whatever Thy hand and counsel predestinated to be done."^ See what is said: " As concerning the gospel, indeed, they are enemies for your sakes." Because God's hand and counsel predestinated such things to be done by the hostile Jews as were necessary for the gospel, for our sakes. But what is it that follows ? " But as concerning the election, they are beloved for their fathers' sakes." For are those enemies who perished in their enmity, and those of the same people who still perish in their opposition to Christ, â€“ are those chosen and beloved! Away with the thought! Who is so utterly foolish as to say this? But both expressions, although contrary to one another â€“ that is, "enemies" and "beloved" â€“ are appropriate, though not to the same men, yet to the same Jewish people, and to the same carnal seed of Israel, of whom some belonged to the falling away, and some to the blessing of Israel himself. For the apostle previously explained this meaning more clearly when he said, "That which Israel wrought for, he hath not obtained; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded." Yet in both cases it was the very same Israel. Where, therefore, we hear, "Israel hath not obtained," or, "The rest were blinded," there are to be understood the enemies for our sakes; but where we hear "that the election hath obtained it," there are to be understood the beloved for their fathers' sakes, to which fathers those things were assuredly promised; because "the promises were made to Abraham and his seed," whence also in that olive-tree is grafted the wild olive-tree of the Gentiles. Now subsequently we certainly ought to fall in with the election, of which he says that it is according to grace, not according to debt, because "there was made a remnant by the election of grace." This election obtained it, the rest being blinded. As concerning this election, the Israelites were beloved for the sakes of their fathers. For they were not called with that calling of which it is said, "Many are called," but with that whereby the chosen are called. Whence also after he had said, "But as concerning the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes," he went on to add those words whence this discussion arose: "For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance," â€“ that is, they are firmly established without change. Those who belong to this calling are all teachable by God; nor can any of them say, "I believed in order to being thus called," because the mercy of God prevented him, because he was so called in order that he might believe. For all who are teachable of God come to the Son because they have heard and learned from the Father through the Son,

' Rom. xi. 7. 2 Gal. iii. 16. Â» Eom. xi. 5.
Chap. 34. [xvii.] â€” The special calling of the elect is not because they have believed, but in order that they may believe.

Let us, then, understand the calling whereby they become elected, â€” not those who are elected because they have believed, but who are elected that they may believe. For the Lord Himself also sufficiently explains this vocation when He says, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you." For if they had been elected because they had believed, they themselves would certainly have first chosen Him by believing in Him, so that they should deserve to be elected. But He takes away this supposition altogether when He says, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you." And yet they themselves, beyond a doubt, chose Him when they believed on Him. Whence it is not for any other reason that He says, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you," than because they did not choose Him that He should choose them, but He chose them that they might choose Him; because His mercy prevented them according to grace, not according to debt. Therefore He chose them out of the world while here He was wearing flesh, but as those who were already chosen in Himself before the foundation of the world. This is the memorable truth concerning predestination and grace. For what is it that the apostle says, "As He hath chosen us in Himself before the foundation of the world"? And assuredly, if this were said because God foreknew that they would believe, not because He Himself would make them believers, the Son is speaking against such a foreknowledge as that when He says, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you;" when God should rather have foreknown this very thing, that they themselves would have chosen Him, so that they might deserve to be chosen by Him. Therefore they were elected before the foundation of the world with that predestination in which God foreknew what He Himself would do; but they were elected out of the world with that calling whereby God fulfilled that which He predestinated. "For whom He predestinated, them He also called, with that calling, to wit, which is according to His purpose. He did not call others, therefore, but those whom He predestinated, them He also called; nor [did He justify] others, but those whom He so called, them He also justified; nor [did He glorify] others, but those whom He predestinated, called, and justified, them He also glorified assuredly with that result which has no end. Therefore God elected believers; but He chose them that they might be so, not because they were already so. The Apostle James says: "Has not God chosen the poor in this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love Him?" By electing them, therefore, He makes selves would have chosen Him, so that they might deserve to be chosen by Him. Therefore they were elected before the foundation of the world with that predestination in which God foreknew what He Himself would do; but they were elected out of the world with that calling whereby God fulfilled that which He predestinated. "For whom He predestinated, them He also called, with that calling, to wit, which is according to His purpose. He did not call others, therefore, but those whom He predestinated, them He also called; nor [did He justify] others, but those whom He so called, them He also justified; nor [did He glorify] others, but those whom He predestinated, called, and justified, them He also glorified assuredly with that result which has no end. Therefore God elected believers; but He chose them that they might be so, not because they were already so. The Apostle James says: "Has not God chosen the poor in this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love Him?" By electing them, therefore, He makes them rich in faith, as He makes them heirs of the kingdom; because He is rightly said to choose that in them, which that He might make in them He chose them. I ask, who can hear the Lord saying, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you," and can dare to say that men believe in order to be elected, when they are rather elected to believe; lest against the judgment of truth they be found to have first chosen Christ to whom Christ says, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you"?

CHAP. 35.] ELECTION TO HOLINESS. 161

Chap. 35. [sviii.] â€” Election is for the purpose of holiness.

Who can hear the apostle saying, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us in all spiritual blessing in heavenly [places] in Christ; as 'He has chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we 'should be holy and without spot in His sight in love; predestinating us to the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to Himself according to the good pleasure of His will, wherein He hath shown us favour^ in His beloved Son; in whom we have redemption through His blood, the remission of sins

according to the riches of His grace, which hath abounded to us in all wisdom and prudence; that He might show to us the mystery of His will according to His good pleasure, which He hath purposed in Himself, in the dispensation of the fulness of times, to restore all things in Christ, which are in heaven, and in the earth, in Him: in whom also we have obtained a share, being predestinated according to [His] purpose who worketh all things according to the counsel of His will, that we should be to the praise of His glory;"^ And whom, I say, can hear these words with attention and intelligence, and can dare to have any doubt concerning a truth so clear as this which we are defending? God chose Christ's members in Him before the foundation of the world; and how should He choose those who as yet did not exist, except by predestinating them? Therefore He chose us by predestinating us. Would he choose the unholy and the unclean? Now if the question be proposed, whether He would choose such, or rather the holy and unstained, who can ask which of these he may answer, and not give his opinion at once in favour of the holy and pure?

Chap. Z^.â€”"God chose the righteous; not those whom He foresaw as being so of themselves, but those whovi He predestinated for the purpose of making so.

" Therefore," says the Pelagian, "He foreknew who would be holy and immaculate by the choice of their free-will, and on that account elected them before the foundation of the world in that same foreknowledge of His in which He foreknew that they would be such. Therefore He elected them,"* says he, "before they existed, predestinating them to be children whom He foreknew to be such as would be holy and immaculate. Certainly He did not make them so, nor did He foresee that He would make them so; but [He foresaw] that they would be so." Let us, then, look into the words of the apostle and see whether He chose us before the foundation of the world because we were likely to be holy and immaculate, or in order that we might be so. "Blessed," says he, "be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us in all spiritual blessing in heavenly [places] in Christ; even as He hath chosen us in Himself before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and unspotted."^ Not, then, because we were to be so, but that we might be so. Assuredly it is certain, "assuredly it is manifest. Certainly we were to be such for the reason that He has chosen us, predestinating us to be such by His grace. Therefore He so blessed us with spiritual blessing in heavenly [places] in Christ Jesus, as He chose us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and immaculate " in His sight, predestinating us in love to the adoption of children through Jesus Christ to Himself." Attend to what he then adds:

' Eph. i. 3 fF.

"According to the good pleasure," he says, "of His will;" that we might not in such a benefit of grace glory concerning the good pleasure of our will. ^ "In which," says he, "He hath shown us favour in His beloved Son," â€” in which, certainly His own will. He hath shown us favour. Thus, it is said. He hath shown us grace by grace, even as it is said. He has made us righteous by righteousness. "In whom," he says, "we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace, which has abounded to us in all wisdom and prudence; that He might show to us the mystery of His will, according to His good pleasure.". In this mystery of His will. He placed the riches of His grace, according to His good pleasure, not according to ours, which could not possibly be good unless He Himself, according to His own good pleasure, should aid it to become so. But when he had said, "According to His good pleasure," he added, "which He purposed in Him," that is, in His beloved Son, "in the dispensation of the fulness of times to restore all things in Christ, which are in heaven, and which are in earth, in Him: in whom also we too have obtained a share, being predestinated according to His purpose who worketh all things according to the counsel of His will; that we should be to the praise of His glory."

Chap. 37. â€” We were elected and predestinated, not because we were likely to be holy, but that we might be so.

It would be too tedious to argue about single points. But you see without doubt, you see with what evidence of apostolic declaration this grace is defended, in opposition to which human merits are set up, as if man could first give something, for it to be recompensed to him again. Therefore God elected us in Christ before the foundation of the world, predestinating us to the adoption of children, not because we were about to be of ourselves holy and immaculate, but He elected and predestinated us that we might be so.
Moreover,’ He did this according to the good pleasure of His will, so that nobody might glory concerning his own will, but about God's will towards himself. " He did this according to the riches of His grace, according to His good pleasure, which He purposed in His beloved Son, in whom we have obtained a share, being predestinated according to the purpose, not ours, but His, who worketh all things to such an extent as that He worketh in us to will also. Moreover, He worketh according to the counsel of His good pleasure, that we may be to the praise of His glory. For this reason it is that we cry that no one should glory in man, and thus not in himself; but whoever glorieth let him glory in the Lord, that he may be for the praise of His glory. Because He Himself worketh according to His purpose that we may be to the praise of His glory, certainly holy and immaculate, for which purpose He called us, predestinating us before the foundation of the world. Of this His purpose is that special calling of the elect for whom He worketh together all things for good, because they are called according to His purpose, and " the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." ^

Chap. 38. [xix.] â€” What is the view of the Pelagians, and what of the semi-Pelagians, concerning predestination.

But these brethren of ours, about whom and on whose behalf we are now discoursing, say that the Pelagians are refuted by this apostolical testimony in which it is said that we are elected in Christ and predestinated before the foundation of the world, in order that we should be holy and immaculate in His sight in love. For they themselves think that " having received God's commands we are made holy and immaculate of ourselves by the choice of our free-will in His sight in love; and since God foresaw that this would be the case," they say, " He therefore chose and predestinated us in

1 Phil. ii. 13. - Rom. xi. 29

CHAP. 39.] GOD FOREKNOWS AND GIVES FAITH. 165

Christ before the foundation of the world." Although the apostle says that it was not because He foreknew that we should be such, but in order that we might be such by the same election of His grace by which He showed us favour in His beloved Son. When, therefore, He predestinated us, He foreknew His own work by which He makes us holy and immaculate. Whence the Pelagian error is rightly refuted by this testimony. " But we say," say they, " that God did not foreknow any faith of ours except that by which we begin to believe, and that He chose and predestinated us before the foundation of the world, in order that we might be holy and immaculate by His grace and by His work." But let them also hear in this testimony the words where he says, " We have obtained a share, being predestinated according to His purpose who worketh all things." ^ He, therefore, worketh the beginning of our belief who worketh all things; because faith itself does not precede that calling of which it is said: "For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance;" ^ and of which it is said: " Not of works, but of Him that calleth" ^ (although He might have said, " of Him that believeth "); and the election which the Lord signified when He said: " Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you." * For He chose us, not because we believed, but that we might believe, lest we should be said first to have chosen Him, and so His word be false (which be it far from us to think possible), "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you.""

Neither are we called because we believed, but that we may believe; and by that calling which is without repentance it is effected and carried through that we should believe. Neither are all things to be unfolded concerning this matter so fully as those of which we have spoken.

Chap. 39. â€” The beginning of faith is God's gift.

Finally, also, in what follows this testimony, the apostle gives thanks to God on behalf of those who have believed; â€” not, certainly, because the gospel has been declared to them, but because they have believed. For he says, "In whom ^ Eph. i. 11. 2 Eom. xi. 29.

also after ye had heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation; in Yhom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, which is the pledge of our inheritance, to the redemption of the purchased possession unto the praise of His glory. ^Wherefore I also, after I had heard of your faith in Christ Jesus and [love] towards all the saints, cease not to give thanks for you." ^ Their faith was new and recent on the preaching of the gospel to them, which faith when he hears of, the apostle gives thanks to God on their behalK. If he were to give thanks to man for that which he might either think or know that man had not given, it would be called a flattery or a mockery, rather than a giving of thanks: " Do not err, for God is not mocked; " ^ for His gift is also the beginning of faith, imless the apostolic giving of thanks be rightly judged to be either mistaken or fallacious.

What is that if it does not appear as the beginning of the faith of the Thessalonians, of which, nevertheless, the same apostle gives thanks to God when he says, "^ For this cause also we thank God without ceasing, because when ye had received from us the word of the hearing of God, ye received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth the word of God, which effectually worketh in you who have believed" 1

What is that for which he here gives thanks to God? As assuredly it is a vain and idle thing if He to whom he gives thanks did not Himself do the thing. But, since this is not a vain and idle thing, certainly God, to whom he gave thanks concerning this work. Himself did it; that when they had received the word of the hearing of God, they received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth the word of God. God, therefore, worketh in the hearts of men with that calling according to His promise, of which we have spoken a great deal, that they should not hear the gospel in vain, but when they hear it, should be converted and believe, receiving it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth the word of God.

CHAP. 41.] THE BEGINNINGS OF FAITH. 167

Moreover, we are admonished that the beginning of men's faith is God's gift, since the apostle signifies this when, in the Epistle to the Colossians, he says, " Continue in prayer, and watch in the same in giving of thanks. Withal praying also for us that God would open unto us the door of His word, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which also I am in honds, that I may make it manifest as I ought to speak." ^ How is the door of His word opened, except when the sense of the hearer is opened so that he may believe, and, having made a beginning of faith, may admit those things which are declared and reasoned, for the purpose of building up wholesome doctrine, lest, by a heart closed through unbelief, he reject and repel those things which are spoken? Whence, also, he says to the Corinthians: " But I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost. For a great and evident door is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries." ^ What else can be understood here, save that, when the gospel had been first of all preached there by him, many had believed, and there had appeared many adversaries of the same faith, in accordance with that saying of the Lord, " No one cometh unto me, unless it were given him of my Eather;" ^ and, " To you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given "? * Therefore, there is an open door in those to whom it is given, but there are many adversaries among those to whom it is not given.
Chap. 41. â€” Further apostolic testimonies.

And again, the same apostle says to the same people, in his second Epistle: " When I had come to Troas for the gospel of Christ, and a door had been opened unto me in the Lord, I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus, my brother: but, making my farewell to them, I went away into Macedonia." Â° To whom did he bid farewell but to those who had believed, â€” to wit, in whose hearts the door was opened for his preaching of the gospel? But attend to what

1 Col. iv. 2 ff. * 1 Cor. xvi. 8. 3 John vi. 66.

168 ox THE PREDESTINATION OF THE SAINTS. [CHAP. 42.

he adds, saying, " Now thanks be unto God, who always causes us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savour of His knowledge by us in every place: because we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ in them who are saved, and in them who perish: to some, indeed, we are the savour of death unto death, but to some the savour of life unto life." ^

See concerning what this most zealous soldier and invincible defender of grace gives thanks. See concerning what he gives thanks, â€” that the apostles are a sweet savour of Christ unto God, both in those who are saved by His grace, and in those who perish by His judgment. But in order that those who little understand these things may be less enraged, he himself gives a warning when he adds the words: " And who is sufficient for these things? " ^ But let us return to the opening of the door by which the apostle signified the beginning of faith in his hearers. For what is the meaning of, " Withal praying also for us that God would open unto us a door of the word," ^ unless it is a most manifest demonstration that even the very beginning of faith is the gift of God? For it would not be sought for from Him in prayer, unless it were believed to be given by Him. This gift of heavenly grace had descended to that seller of purple * for whom, as Scripture says in the Acts of the Apostles, " The Lord opened her heart, and she gave heed unto the things which were said by Paul; " for she was so called that she might believe. Because God does what He will in the hearts of men, either by assistance or by judgment; so that, even through their means, may be fulfilled what His hand and counsel have predestinated to be done.

Chae. 42. â€” Old Testament testimonies.

Therefore it is in vain, moreover, that objectors have alleged, that what we have proved by Scripture testimony from the books of Kings and Chronicles has nothing to do with the subject of which we are discoursing:^ such, for instance, as that when God wills that to be done which ought only to be done by the intelligence of men, their hearts are inclined to will this, â€” inclined, that is to say, by His power, who, in a marvellous and ineffable manner, worketh in us also to will. What else than this is to say nothing, and yet to contradict? Unless, perchance, they have given some reason to you for the view that they have taken, which reason you have preferred to say nothing about in your letters. But what that reason can be I do not know. Whether, possibly, since we have shown that God has so acted on the hearts of men, and has induced the wills of those whom He pleased to incline, that Saul or David should be established as king, â€” io they not think that these instances are appropriate to this subject, because to reign in this world temporally is not the same thing as to reign eternally with God? And so do they suppose that God inclines the wills of those whom He pleases to the attainment of earthly kingdoms, but does not incline them to the attainment of a heavenly kingdom? But I think that it was in reference to the kingdom of heaven, and not to an earthly kingdom, that it was said,” Incline my heart unto Thy testimonies; “ or, ” The steps of a man are ordered by the Lord, and He will will His way; “ or, ” The will is prepared by the Lord; “ or, ” Let our Lord be with us as with our fathers; let Him not forsake us, nor turn Himself away from us; let Him incline our hearts unto Him, that we may walk in all His ways;” or, ” I will give them a heart to know me, and ears that hear; “ or, ” I will give them another heart, and a new spirit will I give them.” ^ Let them also hear this, ” I will give my Spirit within you, and I will cause you to walk in my righteousnesses; and ye shall observe my judgments, and do them.” ^ Let them hear,

" Man's goings are directed by the Lord, and how can a man understand His ways? " ^ "Let them hear," Every man seemeth right to himself, but the Lord directeth the hearts." ^ Let them hear, " As 'many as were ordained to eternal life believed." ^ Â‘ Let them hear these passages, and whatever others of the kind I have not mentioned in which God is declared to prepare and to convert men's wills, even for the kingdom of heaven and for eternal life.

And consider what sort of a thing it is to believe that God worketh men's wills for the foundation of earthly kingdoms, but that men work their own wills for the attainment of the kingdom of heaven.

Chap. 43. [xxi.] “Conclusion.

I have said a great deal, and, perchance, I could long ago have persuaded you what I wished, and am still speaking this to such intelligent minds as if they were obtuse, to whom even what is too much is not enough. But let them pardon me, for a new question has compelled me to this. Because, although in my former little treatises I had proved by sufficiently appropriate proofs that faith also was the gift of God, there was found this ground of contradiction, viz. that those testimonies were good for this purpose, to show that the increase of faith was God's gift, but that the beginning of faith, whereby a man first of all believes in Christ, is of the man himself, and is not the gift of God, “but that God requires this, so that when it has preceded, other gifts may follow, as it were on the ground of this merit, and these are the gifts of God; and that none of them is given freely, although in them God's grace is declared, which is not grace except as being gratuitous.
And you see how absurd all this is.

Wherefore I determined, as far as I could, to set forth that this very beginning also is God's gift. And this if I have done at a greater length than perhaps those on whose account I did it might wish, I am prepared to be reproached for it by them, so long as they nevertheless confess that, although at greater length than they wished, although with the disgust and weariness of those who understand, I have done what I have done; that is, I have taught that even the beginning of faith, as continence, patience, righteousness, piety, and the rest, concerning which there is no dispute with them, is God's gift. Let this, therefore, be the end of this treatise, lest too great length in this one may give offence.

A TREATISE ON THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE.

By AUKELIUS AUGUSTINE, Bishop of Hippo.
THE SECOND BOOK.

ADDRESSED TO PROSPER AND HILARY.
A.D. 428 OR 429.

IN THE FIRST PART OF THE BOOK HE PROVES THAT THE PERSEVERANCE
BY WHICH A MAN IS ENABLED TO PERSEVERE IN CHRIST TO THE END IS GOD'S GIFT; FOR THAT IT IS A MOCKERY TO ASK OF GOD THAT WHICH IS NOT BELIEVED TO BE GIVEN BY GOD. MOREOVER, THAT IN THE LORD'S PRAYER SCARCELY ANYTHING IS ASKED FOR BUT PERSEVERANCE, ACCORDING TO THE EXPOSITION OF THE MARTYR CYPRIAN, BY WHICH EXPOSITION, INDEED, THE ENEMIES TO THAT GRACE ITSELF WERE CONVICTED BEFORE THEY WERE BORN. HE TEACHES THAT THE GRACE OF PERSEVERANCE IS NOT GIVEN ACCORDING TO THE MERITS OF THE RECEIVERS, BUT TO SOME IT IS GIVEN BY GOD'S MERCY; TO OTHERS IT IS NOT GIVEN, BY HIS RIGHTEOUS JUDGMENT. THAT IT IS INSCRUTABLE WHY, OF ADULTS, ONE RATHER THAN ANOTHER SHOULD BE CALLED; JUST AS, MOREOVER, OF TWO INFANTS IT IS INSCRUTABLE WHY THE ONE SHOULD BE TAKEN, THE OTHER LEFT. BUT THAT IT IS STILL MORE INSCRUTABLE WHY, OF TWO PIOUS PERSONS, TO ONE IT SHOULD BE GIVEN TO PERSEVERE, TO THE OTHER IT SHOULD NOT BE GIVEN; BUT THAT THIS IS MOST CERTAIN, THAT THE FORMER IS OF THE PREDESTINATED, THE LATTER IS NOT. HE OBSERVES THAT THE MYSTERY OF PREDESTINATION IS SET FORTH IN OUR LORD'S WORDS CONCERNING THE PEOPLE OF TYRE AND SIDON, WHO WOULD HAVE REPENTED IF THE SAME MIRACLES HAD BEEN DONE AMONG THEM WHICH HAD BEEN DONE IN CHORIZIN. HE SHOWS THAT THE CASE OF INFANTS IS OF FORCE TO CONFIRM THE TRUTH OF PREDESTINATION AND GRACE IN OLDER PEOPLE; AND HE ANSWERS THE PASSAGE OF HIS THIRD BOOK ON FREE-WILL, UNSOUNDLY ALLEGED ON THIS POINT BY HIS ADVERSARIES. SUBSEQUENTLY, IN THE SECOND PART OF THIS WORK, HE REBUTS WHAT THEY SAY, TO WIT, THAT THE DEFINITION OF PREDESTINATION IS OPPOSED TO THE ADVANTAGE OF EXHORTATION AND REBUKE. HE ASSERTS, ON THE OTHER HAND, THAT IT IS ADVANTAGEOUS TO PREACH PREDESTINATION, SO THAT MAN MAY NOT GLORY IN HIMSELF, BUT IN THE LORD. AS TO THE OBJECTIONS, HOWEVER, WHICH THEY MAKE AGAINST PREDESTINATION, HE SHOWS THAT THE SAME OBJECTIONS MAY BE

172 ox THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE. [CHAP. 1.

TO PREACH PREDESTINATION, SO THAT MAN MAY NOT GLORY IN HIMSELF, BUT IN THE LORD. AS TO THE OBJECTIONS, HOWEVER, WHICH THEY MAKE AGAINST PREDESTINATION, HE SHOWS THAT THE SAME OBJECTIONS MAY BE
TWISTED IN NO UNLIKE MANNER EITHER AGAINST GOD's FOREKNOWLEDGE OR AGAINST THAT GRACE WHICH THEY ALL AGREE TO BE NECESSARY FOR OTHER GOOD THINGS (WITH THE EXCEPTION OF THE BEGINNING OF FAITH AND THE COMPLETION OF PERSEVERANCE). FOR THAT THE PREDESTINATION OF THE SAINTS IS NOTHING ELSE THAN GOD's FOREKNOWLEDGE AND PREPARATION FOR HIS BENEFITS, BY WHICH WHOEVER ARE DELIVERED ARE MOST CERTAINLY DELIVERED. BUT HE BIDS THAT PREDESTINATION SHOULD BE PREACHED IN A HARMONIOUS MANNER, AND NOT IN SUCH A WAY AS TO SEEM TO AN UNSKILFUL MULTITUDE AS IF IT WERE DISPROVED BY ITS VERY ANNOUNCEMENT. LASTLY, HE COMMENDS TO US JESUS CHRIST, AS PLACED BEFORE OUR EYES, AS THE MOST EMINENT INSTANCE OF PREDESTINATION.

Chap. 1. [i.] â€” Of the nature of the perseverance here discoursed of.

I HAVE now to consider the subject of perseverance with greater care; for in the former treatise also I said some things on this subject when I was discussing the beginning of faith. I assert, therefore, that he perseverance by which we persevere in Christ even to the end is the gift of God;" and I call that the end by which is finished that life wherein alone there is a risk of falling. " Therefore it is uncertain whether any one has received this gift so long as he is still alive. For if he fall before he dies, he assuredly is said not to have persevered; and most truly is it said. How, then, should he be said to have received or to have had perseverance who has not persevered ? For if any one have continence, and fall away from that virtue and become incontinent, â€” or, in like manner, if he have righteousness, if patience, if even faith, and fall away, he is rightly said to have had these virtues and to have them no longer; for he was continent, or he was righteous, or he was patient, or he was believing, as long as he was so; but when he ceased to be so, he no longer is what he was. But how should he who has not persevered have ever been persevering, since it is only by persevering that any one shows himself persevering, â€” and this he has not done ? But lest any one should struggle against this, and say. If from the date at which any one became a believer he has lived â€” for the sake of argument â€” ten years, and in the midst of them has fallen from the faith, has he not persevered for five years ? I am not contending about words. If it be thought that this also should be called perseverance, as it were for so long as it lasts, assuredly he is not to be said to have had in any degree that perseverance of which we are now discoursing, by which one perseveres in Christ even to the end. ^And the believer of one year, or of a period as much shorter as may be conceived of, if he has lived faithfully until he died, has rather had this perseverance than the believer of many years' standing, if a little time before his death he has fallen away from the steadfastness of his faith.

CHAP. 2.] PESEVERAXCE TO THE END, GOD'S GIFT. I73

Chap. 2. [ii.] â€” Faith is the beginning of a Christian man. Martyrdom for Christ's sake is his best ending.

Which matter being settled, let us see whether this perseverance, of which it was said, "He that persevereth unto the end, the same shall be saved," ^ is a gift of God. Because, if if be not, how is that saying of the apostle true: "Unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake " ? ^ Of these things, certainly, one has respect to the beginning, the other to the end [scil. of life]. Yet both are the gift of God, because both are said to be given; as, moreover, I have already said above. For what is more truly the beginning for a Christian than to believe in Christ? What end is better than to suffer for Christ? But so far as pertains to believing in Christ, whatever kind of contradiction has been discovered, that not the beginning but the increase of faith should be called God's gift, â€” to this opinion, by God's gift, I have answered enough, and more than enough. But what reason can be given why perseverance to the end should not be given in Christ to him to whom it is given to suffer for Christ, or, to speak more distinctly, to whom it is given to die for Christ? For the Apostle Peter, showing that this is the gift of God, says, "It is better, if the will of God be so, to suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing." ^ When he says, "If the will of God be so," he shows that this is given from heaven, yet not to all saints, to suffer for Christ's sake. For it is not those whom the will of God does not choose to attain to the experience and the glory of suffering, that do not attain to the kingdom of God if they persevere in Christ to the end. But who can say that this perseverance is not given to those who die in Christ from any weakness of body, or by any kind of accident, although a far more difficult perseverance is given to those by whom even death itself is undergone for Christ's sake? Because perseverance is much more difficult when the persecutor is engaged in preventing a man's perseverance; and therefore he is sustained in his perseverance unto death. Hence it is more difficult to have the former perseverance, â€” easier to have the latter; but to Him to whom nothing is difficult it is easy to give both. For God has promised this, saying, "I will put my fear in their hearts, that they may not depart from me." And what else is this than, Such and so great shall be my fear that I will put into their hearts that they will perseveringly cleave to me?

174 ON THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE. [CHAP. 3.

Chap. 3. "God is besought for it, because it is His gift.

But why is that perseverance asked for from God if it is not given by God? Is that a mocking petition when that is asked from Him which it is known that He does not give, but, although He gives it not, is in man's power; just as that giving of thanks is a mockery, if thanks are given to God for that which He did not give nor do? But what I said on that subject I say also here again: "Be not deceived," says the apostle, "God is not mocked." O man, God is a witness not only of your words, but even of your thoughts. If you ask anything in truth and faith of one who is so rich, believe that you receive from Him from whom you ask, what you ask. Abstain from honouring Him with your lips and extolling yourself over Him in your heart, believing that you have from yourself what you are pretending to beseech from Him. Is not that perseverance, perchance, asked for from Him?

He who says this is not to be rebuked by any arguments, but must be covered* with the prayers of the saints. Is there any of those who does not ask for himself from God that he may persevere in Him, when in that very prayer which is called the Lord'sâ€”because the Lord taught itâ€”when it is

3 Gal. vi. 6. * Some editions lead "recalled."

CHAP. 4.] CYPRIAN ON THE lord's PRAYER. 175 prayed by the saints, scarcely anything else is understood to be prayed for but perseverance?

Chap. 4. â€” Of the Pelagian doctrine there are three leading points.

Read with a little more attention the exposition of this in the treatise of the blessed martyr Cyprian, which he produced concerning this matter, the title of which is, On the Lord's Prayer; and see how many years ago, and what sort of an antidote was prepared against those poisons which the Pelagians were one day to use. For there are three points, as you know, which the Catholic Church chiefly maintains against them, â€” one of which is, that the grace of God is not given according to our merits; because even every one of the merits of the righteous is God's gift, and is conferred by God's grace. The second is, that no one lives in this corruptible body in righteousness of any degree without sins of any kind. The third is, that man is born obnoxious to the first man's sin, and bound by the chain of his condemnation, unless the condition of guilt which is contracted by generation be loosed by regeneration.' Of these three points, that which I have placed last is the only one that is not treated of in the above-named book of the glorious martyr; but of the two others the discourse there is of such perspicuity, that 'the above-named heretics, modern enemies of the grace of Christ, are found to have been convicted long before they were born.' Among these merits of the saints, then, which are no merits unless they are the gifts of God, he says that perseverance also is God's gift, in these words: ^ " We say, ' Hallowed be Thy name; ' not that we ask for God that He may be hallowed by our prayers, but that we beseech of Him that His name may be hallowed in us. But by whom is God sanctified, since He Himself sanctifies ? Well, because He says. Be ye holy because I also am holy, we ask and entreat that we, who were sanctified in baptism, may persevere in that which we have begun to be," ^ ' And a little after, still arguing about that selfsame matter, and teaching that we entreat perseverance from God, which we could in no wise rightly and truly do unless it were His gift, he says: " We pray that this sanctification may abide in us; and because our Lord and Judge warns the man that was healed and quickened by Him to sin no more, lest a worse thing happen unto him, we make this supplication in our constant prayers; we ask this day and night, that the sanctification and quickening which is received from the grace of God may be preserved by His protection," ^ That doctor, therefore, understands that we are asking from Him for perseverance in sanctification, that is, that we should persevere in sanctification, when we who are sanctified say, " Hallowed be Thy name." ^ For what else is it to ask for what we have already received, than that it be given to us also not to cease from possession ? As, therefore, the saint, when he asks God that he may be holy, is certainly asking that he may continue to be holy, so certainly the chaste person also, when he asks that he may be chaste, the continent that he may be continent, the righteous that he may be righteous, the pious that he may be pious, and the like, â€” which things, against the Pelagians, we maintain to be God's gifts, â€” they are asking, without doubt, that they may persevere in those good things which they have acknowledged that they have received. And if they receive this, assuredly they also receive perseverance itself, the great gift of God, whereby His other gifts are preserved.

Chap. 5. â€” The second petition in the Lord's Prayer.

What, when we say, " Thy kingdom come," do we ask else, but that that should also come to us which we do not doubt will come to all saints ? ^ And therefore here also, what do they who are already holy pray for, save that they may persevere in that holiness which has been given them ? For no otherwise will the Kingdom of God come to them; which it is certain will come not to others, but to those who persevere to the end.
Chap. 6. [in.] â€” The third petition. How heaven and earth are understood in the Lord's Prayer.

The third petition is, "Thy will* be done in heaven and in earth; " or, as it is read in many codices, and is more frequently made use of by petitioners, " As in heaven, so also

CHAP. 6.] AS IN HEAVEN, SO IN EAETH. iVY

iu earth," which many people understand, that we also may do Thy wiU as the holy angels do. That doctor and martyr will have heaven and earth, however, to be understood as spirit and flesh, and says that we pray that we may do the will of God with the full agreement of both our natures. He saw in these words also another meaning, fitting to the soundest faith, of which meaning I have already spoken above, â€” to wit, that for unbelievers, who are as yet earth, bearing in their first birth only the earthly man, believers are understood to pray, who, being clothed with the heavenly man, are not unreasonably called by the name of heaven; where he plainly shows both that the beginning of faith is God's gift, since the holy Church prays not only for believers, that faith may be increased or may continue in them, but, moreover, for unbelievers, that they may begin to have what they have not had at all, and against which, besides, they were indulging hostile feelings. Now, however, I am arguing not concerning the beginning of faith, of which I have already spoken much in the former book, but of that perseverance which must be had even to the end, â€” which assuredly even the saints, who do the will of God, seek when they say in prayer, "Thy will be done." For, since it is already done in them, why do they still ask that it may be done, except that they may persevere in that which they have begun to be? Although it may here be said that the saints do not ask that the will of God may be done in heaven, but that it may be done in earth as in heaven, â€” that is to say, that earth may imitate heaven, that is, that man may imitate the angel, or that an unbeliever may imitate a believer; and thus that the saints are asking that that may be which is not yet, not that that which is may continue. For, by whatever holiness men may be distinguished, they are not yet equal to the angels of God; not yet, therefore, is the will of God done in them as it is in heaven! And if this be so! in that portion indeed in which we ask that men from unbelievers may become believers, it is not perseverance, but beginning that seems to be asked for; but in that in which we ask that men may be made equal to the angels of God in doing God's will, â€” where the saints pray for this, they are found to be praying for perseverance; since no one attains to that highest blessed-

XV. M
ness which is in the kingdom, unless he shall persevere unto the end in that holiness which he has received on earth/

Chap. 7. [ia'.] â€” The fourth petition.

The fourth petition is, "Give us this day our daily bread," ^ where the blessed Cyprian shows how here also perseverance is understood to be asked for. Because he says, among other things, "And we ask that this bread should be given to us daily, that we who are in Christ, and daily receive the Euchasite for the food of salvation, may not by the interposition of some heinous sin be separated from Christ's body by being withheld from communicating and prevented from partaking of the heavenly bread." ^ These words of the holy man of God indicate that 'the saints ask for perseverance directly from God, when with this intention they say, "Give us this day our daily bread," that they may not be separated from Christ's body, but may continue in that holiness in which they allow no crime by which they may deserve to be separated from it.

Chap. 8. [v.]â€” The f/th petition. It is an error of the Pelagians that the righteous are free from any sin.

In the fifth sentence of the prayer we say, "Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors," ^ in which petition alone perseverance is not found to be asked for. For the sins which we ask to be forgiven us are past, but perseverance, which saves us for eternity, is indeed necessary for the time of this life; but not for the time which is past, but for that which remains even to its end. 'Yet it is worth the labour to consider for a little, how even already in this petition the heretics who were to arise long after were transfixed by the tongue of Cyprian, as if by the most invincible dart of truth. For the Pelagians dare to say even this: that the righteous man in this life has no sin at all, and that in such men there is even at the present time a Church not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, which is the one and only bride of Christ; as if she were not His bride who throughout the whole earth says what she has learnt from Him, "Forgive us our debts." But observe how the most glorious Cyprian destroys these. For when he was exjounding that very clause of the Lord's Prayer, he says among other things: "And how necessarily, how providently, and salutarily are we admonished that we are sinners, since we are compelled to entreat for our sins; and while pardon is asked for from God, the soul recalls its own consciousness of guilt! Lest any one should flatter himself that he is innocent, and by exalting himself should more deeply perish, he is instructed and taught that he sins daily, in that he is bidden daily to entreat for his sins. Thus, moreover, John also in his Epistle warns us, and says, 'If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.' And the rest, which it would be tedious to insert in this place.

Chap. 9. When perseverance is granted to a person, he cannot but persevere.

° Now, moreover, when the saints say, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," whatever do they pray for but that they may persevere in holiness? For, assuredly, when that gift of God is granted to them, which is sufficiently plainly shown to be God's gift, since it is asked of Him, that gift of God, then, being granted to them that they may not be led into temptation, none of the saints fails to keep his perseverance in holiness even to the end. For there is not any one who ceases to persevere in the Christian purpose unless he is first of all led into temptation. If, therefore, it be granted to him according to his prayer that he may not be led into temptation, certainly by the gift of God he persists in that sanctification which by the gift of God he has received.

Chap. 10. The gift of perseverance can be obtained by prayer.

But you write that these brethren will not have this perseverance declared in such a way as that it cannot be obtained by prayer or lost by obstinacy. In this they are little careful in considering what they say. For we are speaking of that perseverance whereby one perseveres unto the end, and if this is given, one does persevere unto the end; but if one does not persevere unto the end, it is not given, which I have already sufficiently discussed above. Let not men say, then, that perseverance is given to any one to the end, except when the end itself has come, and he to whom it has been given has been found to have persevered unto the end. Certainly, we say that one whom we have known to be chaste is chaste, whether he should continue or not in the same chastity; and if he should have any other divine endowment which may be kept and lost, we say that he has it as long as he has it; and if he should lose it, we say that he had it. But since "no one has perseverance to the end except he who does persevere unto the end, many people may have it, but none can lose it.

° Potens " or "ponens " are different readings. * 1 John i. 8.

For it is not to be feared that perchance when a man has persevered unto the end, some evil will may arise in him, so that he does not persevere unto the end. * This gift of God, therefore, may be obtained by prayer, but when it has been given, it cannot be lost by contumacy. For when any one has persevered unto the end, he neither can lose this gift, nor others which he could lose before the end. How, then, can that be lost, whereby it results that even that which could be lost is not lost?

Chap. 11. â€” Effect of prayer for perseverance.

But, lest perchance it be said that perseverance even to the end is not indeed lost when it has once been given, â€“ that is, when a man has persevered unto the end, â€“ but that it is lost in some measure when a man by contumacy so acts that he is not able to attain to it, as we say that a man who has not persevered unto the end has lost eternal life or the kingdom of God; not what he had already received and actually had, but what he would have received and had if he had persevered, â€“ let us lay aside controversies of words, and say that some things even which are not possessed, but are hoped to be possessed, may be lost. * Let any one who dares, tell me whether God cannot give what He has commanded to be asked from Him, Certainly he who affirms this, I say not is a fool, but he is mad. But God commanded that His saints should say to Him in prayer, " Lead us not into temptation." But, on the other hand, of his own will a man forsakes God, so that he is deservedly forsaken of Him.

Chap. 12. â€” Of his own, will a man forsakes God, so that he is deservedly forsaken of Him.

But, on the other hand, of his own will a man forsakes God, so as to be deservedly forsaken by God. Who would deny this? But it is for that reason we ask not to be led into temptation, so that this may not happen. And if we are heard, certainly it does not happen, because God does not allow it to happen. For nothing comes to pass except what either He Himself does, or Himself allows to be done. Therefore He is powerful both to turn wills from evil to good, and to convert those wills that are inclined to fall, or to direct them into a way pleasing to Himself. For to Him it is not said in vain, " O God, Thou shalt turn again and quicken us; " * it is not vainly said, " Give not my foot to be moved; " * it is not vainly said, " Give me not over, Lord, from my desire to the sinner; " * finally, not to mention many passages, since probably more may occur to you, it is not vainly said," Lead us not into temptation." * For whoever is not led into temptation, certainly is not led into the temptation of his own evil will; and he who is not led into the temptation of his own evil will, is absolutely led into no temptation. For " every one is tempted," as it is written, " when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed;" * " but God tempteth no man," * that is to say, with a hurtful temptation.

tation." * Whoever, therefore, is listened to when he asks this, is not led into the temptation of contumacy, whereby he could or would be worthy to lose perseverance in holiness. *
For temptation is moreover beneficial by which we are not deceived or overwhelmed, but proved, according to that which is said, "Prove me, Lord, and try me." Therefore, with that hurtful temptation which the apostle signifies when he says, "Lest by some means the tempter have tempted you, and our labour be in vain," God tempteth no man," as I have said, â€” that is. He brings or leads no one into temptation. For to be tempted and not to be led into temptation is not evil, â€” nay, it is even good; for this it is to be proved.

ON" THE GIFT OF PEESEVERANCE."
If, then, there were no other proofs, this Lord's Prayer alone would be sufficient for us on behalf of the grace which I am defending; because it leaves us nothing wherein we may, as it were, glory as in our own, since it shows that our not departing from God is not given except by God, when it shows that it must be asked for from God. For he who is not led into temptation does not depart from God. This is absolutely not in the strength of free-will, such as it now is; but it had been in man before he fell. And yet how much this freedom of will availed in the excellence of that primal state appeared in the angels; who, when the devil and his angels fell, stood in the truth, and deserved to attain to that perpetual security of not falling, in which we are most certain that they are now established. But, after the fall of man, God

CHAP. 15. god's hand UPON MAN. 183

willed it to pertain only to His grace that man should approach to Him; nor did He will it to pertain to aught but His grace that man should not depart from Him.

Chap. 14. â€” It is God's grace both that man comes to Him, and that man does not depart from Him.

This grace He established " in Him in whom we have obtained a share, being predestinated according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things." ^ And thus as He worketh that we come to Him, so He worketh that we do not depart. Wherefore it was said to Him by the mouth of the prophet,

" Let Thy hand be upon the man of Thy right hand, and upon the Son of man whom Thou madest strong for Thys'elf, and we will not depart from Thee." ^ This certainly is not the first Adam, in whom we departed from Him, but the second Adam, upon whom His hand is placed, so that we do not depart from Him. Tor Christ altogether with His members is â€” with reference to the Church, which is His body â€” the fulness of Him. When, therefore, God's hand is upon Him, that we depart not from God, assuredly God's work reaches to us (for this is God's hand); by which work of God we are caused to be abiding in Christ with God â€” not, as in Adam, departing from God. For in Christ we have obtained a share, being predestinated according to His purpose who worketh all things. ' This, therefore, is God's hand, not ours, that we depart not from God. That, I say, is His hand who said, " I will put my fear in their hearts, that they depart not from me." ^

Chap. 15. â€” Why God willed that He should he asked for that which He might give without prayer,-

On which account also He willed that He should be asked that we may not be led into temptation, because if we are not so led, we by no means depart from Him. And this might have been given to us even without our praying for it, but by our prayer He willed us to be admonished from whom we receive these benefits. For from whom but from Him do we receive from whom it is right for us to ask? Truly in this matter let not the Church look for laborious disputations, but consider its own daily prayers. It prays that the unbelieving may believe; therefore God converts to the faith. It prays that believers may persevere; therefore God gives perseverance to the end. God foreknew that He would do this. This

IS THE VERY PREDESTINATION OF THE SAINTS, " whom He haS chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy and unspotted before Him in love; predestinating them unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to Himself, according to the good pleasure of His will, to the praise of the glory of His grace, in which He hath shown them favour in His beloved Son, in whom they have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of His grace, which has abounded towards them in wisdom and prudence; that He might show them the mystery of His will according to His good pleasure which He hath purposed in Him, in the dispensation of the fulness of times to restore all things in Christ which are in heaven and which are in earth; in Him, in whom also we have obtained a share, being predestinated according to His purpose who worketh all things. Against a trumpet of truth so clear as this, what man of sober and watchful faith can receive any human arguments?

Chap. 16. [viii.] â€” Why is not grace given according to merit?

But why, says one, is not the grace of God given according to men's merits? I answer, Because God is merciful. Why, then, it is asked, is it not given to all? And here I reply. Because God is a Judge. And thus grace is given by Him freely; and by His righteous judgment it is shown in some what grace confers on those to whom it is given. Let us not then be ungrateful, that according to the good pleasure of His wiU a merciful God delivers so many to the praise of the glory of His grace from such deserved perdition; as, if He should deliver no one therefrom, He would not be unrighteous. Let him, therefore, who is delivered love His grace. Let him who is not delivered acknowledge his due. If, in remitting a debt, goodness is perceived, in requiring it, justice unrighteousness is never found to be with God.

CHAP. 18. DIVERSE JUDGMENTS IN SIMILAR CASES. 185

Chap. 17. " The difficulty of the distinction made in the choice of one and the rejection of another.

" But why," it is said, " in one and the same case, not only of infants, but even of twin children, is the judgment so diverse? " Is it not a similar question, Why in a different case is the judgment the same? Let us recall, then, those labourers in the vineyard who worked the whole day, and those who toiled one hour. Certainly it is a differing case of labour expended, and yet there was the same judgment in paying the wages. Did the murmurers in this case hear anything from the householder except. Such is my will? Certainly such was his liberality towards some, that there could be no injustice towards others. And both these classes, indeed, are among the good. Nevertheless, in what refers to justice and grace, it may be truly said to the guilty who is condemned, even concerning the guilty who is delivered, " Take what thine is, and go thy way; " " I will give unto this one that which is not due; " Is it not lawful for me to do what I will? is thine eye evil because I am good?" And how if he should say, Why not to me also? he will hear, and with reason, " Who art thou, man, that repliest against God?" And although assuredly in the one case you see a most benignant benefactor, and in your own case a most righteous exactor, in neither case do you behold an unjust God. ' For although He would be righteous even if He were to punish both, he who is delivered has good ground for thankfulness, he who is condemned has not any ground for finding fault. ^

Chap. 18. " But lohy should one be punished more than another?" But if, " it is said, " it was necessary that, although all were not condemned. He should still show what was due to all, and so that He should commend His grace more freely to the vessels of mercy; why in the same case will He punish me rather than another, or deliver him rather than me? " I say not this. If you ask wherefore, [I say] that I confess that I can find no answer to make. And if you further ask why is this, it is because in this matter, even as His anger is righteous and as His mercy is great, so His judgments are imsearchable,

186 ON THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE. [CHAP. 20.

Chap. 19. " Why does God mingle those who will persevere with those who will not? Let the inquirer still go on, and say, " Why has He not given to some who have in good faith worshipped Him to â– persevere to the end? " Why except because he does not speak falsely who says, " They went out from among us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, doubtless they would have continued with us." ^ Are there, then, two natures of men? By no means. If- there were two natures there would not be any grace, for there would be given a gratuitous deliverance to none if it were paid as a debt to nature. But it seems to men that all who appear good believers ought to receive perseverance to the end. But' God has judged it to be better to mingle some who would not persevere with a certain number of His saints, so that those for whom security from temptation in this life is not desirable may not be secure.

For that which the apostle says, checks many from mischievous elation: " Wherefore let him who seems to stand take heed lest he fall."^ And he who falls, falls by his own will, and he who stands, stands by God's will." "For God is able to make him stand," ^ therefore he is not able to make himself stand, but God. Nevertheless, it is good not to be high-minded, but to fear. Moreover, it is in his own thought that every one either falls or stands. Now, as the apostle says, and as I have mentioned in my former treatise, " We are not sufficient to think anything of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God."* Following whom also the blessed Ambrose ventures to say, " For our heart is not in our own power, nor are our thoughts." And this everybody who is humbly and truly pious feels to be most true.'

Chap. 20. â€” Ambrose on God's control over men's thoughts.

And when Ambrose said this, he was speaking in that treatise which he wrote concerning the avoidance of the world, wherein he taught that this world was to be shunned not by the body, but by the heart, which he argued could not be done except by God's help. For he says: " The discourse to us is frequent concerning the avoidance of this world, and I would that in proportion to the facility of the discourse on the subject, the disposition of mind were careful and solicitous; but what is worse, the enticement of earthly lusts constantly creeps in, and the pouring out of vanities takes possession of the mind; so that what you desire to avoid, this you think of and consider in your mind. And this is difficult for a man to beware of, but impossible to get rid of. Finally, the prophet bears witness that it is a matter of wish rather than of accomplishment, when he says, ' Incline my heart to Thy testimonies, and not to covetousness.'^ For our heart and our thoughts are not in our own power, and these, poured forth unexpectedly, confuse our mind and soul, and draw them in a different direction from that which you have proposed to yourself; they recall you to worldly things, they interpose things of time, they suggest voluptuous things, they inweave enticing things, and in the very moment when we are seeking to elevate our mmd, we are for the most part filled with vain thoughts and cast down to earthly things."^ Therefore it is not in the power of men, but in that of God, that men have power to become sons of God. Because they receive it from Him who gives pious thoughts to the human heart, by which it has faith, which worketh by love; for the receiving and keeping of which benefit, and for carrying it on perseveringly unto the end, we are not sufficient to think anything as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God, in whose power is our heart and our thoughts.

Chap. 21. [ix. ] â€” Instances of the unsearchable judgments of God.

Therefore, Â£f two infants, ec[ually bound by.firigiual sin, why the one is taken and the other left; and of two wicked men already mature in years, why this one should be so called that he follows Him that caUeth, while that one is either not called at all, or is not called in such a manner, â€” the judg e me nts of God are unsearchable. But o f two pious men, why to the one should be given perseverance into the end, and to the other it should not be given, God's judgments are even more unsearchable. Yet to believers it ousjht to be a most certain fact that the former is of the predestinated, the Ps. cxix. 36. - Ambrose, De Fuga Soeculi, c. 1.

latter is not. " For if they had been of us," says one of the predestinated, who had drunk this secret from the breast of the Lord, " certainly they would have continued with us."^ What, I ask, is the meaning of, " They were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would certainly have continued with us"?"
Were not both created by God â€” both born of Adam? Had not both been made from the earth, and received from Him who said, " I have created all breath," ^ souls of one and the same nature? Lastly, had not both been called, and followed Him that called them? and had not both become, from wicked men, justified men, and both been renewed by means of the laver of regeneration? But if he were to hear this who beyond all doubt knew what he was saying, he might answer and say. These things are true. In respect of all these things, they were of us; nevertheless, in respect of a certain other distinction, they were not of us, for if they had been of us, they certainly would have continued with us. What then is this distinction? God's books lie open, let us not turn away our view; the divine Scripture cries aloud, let us give it a hearing. They were not of them, because they had not been called according to God's purpose; they had not been chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world; they had not gained a share in Him; ' they had not been predestinated ' according to His purpose who worketh all things. For if they had been this, they would have been of them, and without doubt they would have continued with them.

Chap. 22. â€” It is an absurdity to say that the dead will he judged for sins loich they would have committed if they had lived.
For not to say how possible it may be for God to convert the wills of men averse and opposed to His faith, and to operate on their hearts so that they yield to no adversities, and are overcome by no temptation so as to depart from Him, â€” since He also can do what the apostle says, not allow them to be tempted above that which they are able; â€” not, then, to say this; God foreknowing that they would fall, was certainly able to take them away from this life before that fall should occur. Are we to return to that point of still arguing how absurdly it is said that dead men are judged even for those sins which

1 1 John ii. 10. ‘â—’ Isa. Ivii. 16 [see LXX.].

CHAP. 23.] CASE OF THE PEOPLE OF TYRE AND SIDON. 189

God foreknew that they would have committed if they had lived? which is so abhorrent to the feelings of Christians, or even of human beings, that one is even ashamed to rebut it. Why should it not be said that even the gospel itself has been preached, with so much labour and sufferings of the saints, in vain, or is even still preached in vain, if men could be judged, even without hearing the gospel, according to the contumacy or obedience which God foreknew that they would have had if they had heard it? Tyre and Sidon would not have been condemned, although more slightly than those cities in which, although they did not believe, wonderful works were done by Christ the Lord; because if they had been done in them they would have repented in dust and ashes, as the utterances of the Truth declare, in which words of His the Lord Jesus shows to us the loftier mystery of predestination.

Chap. 23. â€” Whijfor (he people of Tyre and Sidon, who would have believed, the miracles were not done luhich loere done in other places ivhich did not believe.

For if we are asked why such miracles were done among those who, when they saw them, would not believe them, and were not done among those who would have believed them if they had seen them, what shall we answer? Shall we say what I have said in that book^ wherein I answered some six questions of the Pagans, yet without prejudice of other matters which the wise can inquire into? This indeed I said, as you know, when it was asked why Christ came after so long a time: that at those times and in those places in which His gospel was not preached. He foreknew that all men would, in regard of His preaching, be such as many were in His bodily presence, â€” people, namely, who would not believe on Him, nor on those who were raised from the dead by Him. Moreover, a little after in the same book, and on the same question, I say. What wonder, if Christ knew in former ages that the world was so filled with unbelievers, that He was, with reason, unwilling for His gospel to be preached to them whom He foreknew to be such as would not believe either His words or His miracles? Certainly we cannot say this of Tyre and Sidon; and in their case we acknowledge that those divine judgments had reference to those causes of predestina-

tion, without prejudice of which latent causes I said that I was then answering such questions as those. Certainly it is easy to accuse the unbelief of the Jews, arising as it did from their free-will, since they refused to believe in such great wonders done among themselves. And this the Lord, reproaching them, declares when He says, "Woe unto thee, Chorazin and Bethsaida, because if the mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon which have been done in you, they would long ago have repented in dust and ashes." But can we say that even the Tyrians and Sidonians would not believe such mighty works done among them, or would not have believed them if they had been done, when the Lord Himself bears witness to them that they would have repented with great humility if those signs of divine power had been done among them? And yet in the day of judgment they will be punished; although with a less punishment than those cities which would not believe the mighty works done in them. For the Lord goes on to say, "Nevertheless, I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon in the day of judgment than for you." Therefore the former shall be punished with greater severity, the latter with less; but yet they shall be punished. Again, if the dead are judged even in respect of deeds which they would have done if they had lived, assuredly since these would have been believers if the gospel had been preached to them with so great miracles, they certainly ought not to be punished; but they will be punished. It is therefore false that the dead are judged in respect also of those things which they would have done if the gospel had reached them when they were alive. And if this is false, there is no ground for saying, concerning infants who perish because they die without baptism, that this happens in their case so far deservedly, because God foreknew that if they should live and the gospel should be preached to them, they would hear it with unbelief. It remains, therefore, that they are kept under the obligation of original sin alone, and for this alone they go into condemnation; because we see that in others having the same condition this is not remitted, except by the gratuitous grace of God in regeneration, and that, by His secret yet righteous

CHAP. 24.] JIE^T NOT JUDGED FOE WHAT THEY MIGHT EE. 191

judgment â€“ because there is no unrighteousness with God â€“ that some, even after baptism, who will perish by evil living, are yet kept in this life until they perish, who would not have perished if bodily death had forestalled their lapse into sin, and so come to their help. Because no dead man is judged by the good or evil things which he would have done if he had not died, otherwise the Tyrians and Sidonians would not have suffered the penalties in respect of what they did; but rather, in respect of those things that they would have done, if those evangelical mighty works had been done in them, they would have obtained salvation by great repentance, and by the faith of Christ.

Chap. 24. [x.] â€” It may be objected that the people of Tyre and Sidon might, if they had heard, have believed, and have subsequently lapsed from their faith.

A certain Catholic commentator of no mean reputation so expounded this passage of the gospel as to say, that the Lord foreknew that the Tyrians and Sidonians would have afterwards departed from the faith, although they might have believed the miracles done among them; and that by mercy He had not done those miracles there, because they would have been obnoxious to severer punishment if they had forsaken the faith which they had once held, than if they had at no time held it. In which opinion of a learned and excessively shrewd man, why am I now concerned to say what is still reasonably to be required, when the opinion itself is advantageous to us for the purpose at which we aim?
For if the Lord in His mercy did not do mighty works among them, by which works they might become believers, so that they might not be more severely punished when they should subsequently become unbelievers, which He foreknew that they would be, it is sufficiently and plainly shown that no dead person is judged for those sins which He foreknew that he would have done, if in some manner assistance were not given him lest he should do them; as Christ is said to have come to the aid of the Tyrians and Sidonians, if that opinion be true, who He had rather should not come to the faith at all, than that by a much greater wickedness they should depart from the faith, which, if they had come to it, He had foreseen that they would have done. Although if it be said, Why did it not happen that they should rather believe, and this gift should be bestowed on them, that before they forsook the faith they should depart from this life? I am ignorant -what reply can be made. For he who says that to those who would forsake their faith it would have been granted, as a kindness, that they should not begin to have what, by a more serious impiety, they would subsequently forsake, sufficiently indicates [by this assertion] that a man is not judged by that which it is foreknown he would have done ill, if by any act of kindness he may be prevented from doing it' Therefore it is an advantage also to him who is taken away, lest wickedness should alter his understanding. But why this advantage should not have been shared by the Tyrians and Sidonians, that they might believe and be taken away, lest wickedness should alter their understanding, he perhaps might answer who was pleased in such a way to solve the above question; but, as far as concerns what I am discussing, I see it to be enough that, even according to that very opinion, men are shown not to be judged in respect of those things which they have not done, even although they may have been foreseen as certain to have done them. However, as I have said, let us think shame even to refute this opinion, whereby sins are supposed to be punished in people who die or have died because they have been foreknown as certain to do them if they had lived; so that we also may not seem to have thought it to be of some importance what opinion we would rather repress by argument than pass over in silence.

192 ON THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE. [CHAP. 25.

Chap. 25. [xi.] â€” God's ways, both in mercy and judgment, 2^51 finding out.

Accordingly, as says the apostle, " It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy:"^ seeing that He also comes to the help of such infants as He will, although they neither will nor run, since He chose them in Christ before the foundation of the world as those to whom He intended to give His grace freely, â€” that is, with no merits of theirs, either of faith or of works, preceding; and seeing that He does not come to the help of those who are more mature, although He foresaw that they would

1 Rom. ix. 16.

CHAP. 26.] NO UNRIGHTEOUSNESS WITH GOD. 193

believe His miracles if they should be done among them, because He wills not to come to their help, since in His predestination He, secretly indeed, but yet righteously, has otherwise determined concerning them. For "there is no unrighteousness with God:"^ but "His judgments are imsearchable, and His ways are past finding out; all the ways of the Lord are mercy and truth." ^ Therefore the mercy is past finding out by which He has mercy on whom He will, although no deservings of his precede; and the truth is unsearchable by which He hardeneth whom He will, even although his merits may have preceded, but merits for the most part common to him with the man on whom He has mercy. As of two twins, of which one is taken and the other left, the end is unequal, while the deserts are common, yet in these the one is in such wise delivered by God's great goodness, that the other is condemned by no injustice of God's. For is there unrighteousness with God? Away with the thought! but His ways are past finding out. ^ Therefore let us believe in His mercy in the case of those who are delivered, and His truth in the case of those who are punished, without any hesitation; and let us not endeavour to look into that which is inscrutable, nor to trace that which cannot be found out. ^ Because out of the mouth of babes and sucklings He perfects His praise,^ so that what we see in those whose deliverance is preceded by no good deservings of theirs, and in"^ those whose condemnation is only preceded by original sin," common alike to both; â€” this we by no means shrink from as occurring in the case of grownup people, that is because we do not think either that grace is given to any one according to his own merits, or that any one is punished except for his own merits, whether they are alike who are delivered and who are punished, or have unequal degrees of evil; so that he who thinketh he standeth may take heed lest he fall, and he who glorieth may glory not in himself, but in the Lord.

Chap. 26. â€” The Manichaans do not receive all the books of the Old Testament, and of the New only those that they choose.

But wherefore is "the case of infants not allowed," as you write, "to be alleged as an example for grown-up people," by men who do not hesitate against the Pelagians to affirm the doctrine of original sin, which entered by one man into the world, in consequence of which from one all have gone into condemnation? And this, moreover, the Manicha^ans receive not, who not only do not hold all the Scriptures of the Old Testament as of any authority, but even receive those which belong to the New Testament in such a manner as that each man, by his own prerogative as it were, or rather by his own sacrilege, takes what he likes, and rejects what he does not like, â€™ in opposition to whom I treated in my writings on freewill, whence they think that they have a ground of objection against me. I have been unwilling to deal plainly with the very laborious questions that occurred, lest my work should become too long, in a case which, as opposed to such perverse men, I could not have the assistance of the authority of the sacred Scriptures. And I was able, â€™ as I actually did, whether anything of the divine testimonies might be true or not, seeing that I did not definitely introduce them into the argument, â€™ nevertheless, by certain reasoning, to conclude that God in all things is to be praised, without any necessity of believing, as they would have us, that there are two co-eternal, confounded substances of good and evil.

Chap. 27. â€™ Reference to the "Retractations."

Finally, in the first book of the Retractations} which work of mine you have not yet read, when I had come to the reconsidering of those same books, that is, on the subject of freewill, I thus spoke; " In these books, I say, many things were so discussed that some questions which occurred, and which either I was not able to elucidate, or which required a long discussion at once, might be put off in such a way as that from either side, or from all sides, of those questions in which what was most in harmony with the truth did not appear, . yet my reasoning might be of effect for that result, that whichever of them might be true, God might be believed, or even might be shown, to be worthy of praise. Because that discussion was undertaken for the sake of those who deny that the origin of evil is derived from the free choice of the will, ^ Retractations, book i. c. 0.

CHAP. 2:] FROM THE "HETKACTATIONS." 195
and contend that God, as He be so, as the Creator of all natures, is worthy of blame; desiring in that manner, according to the error of their impiety (for they are Manichreans), to introduce a certain immutable nature of evil co-eternal with God. Also, after a little time, in another place I say: Then it was said, From which misery, most righteously inflicted on sinners, God's grace delivers, because man of his own accord, that is by free-will, could fall, but could not also rise. To which misery of just condemnation pertain the ignorance and the difficulty which every man suffers from the beginning of his birth, and no one is delivered from that evil except by the grace of God. And this misery the Pelagians will not have as descending from a great condemnation, because they deny original sin; although even if the ignorance and difficulty were the natural beginnings of man, God would not even thus desire to be reproached, but to be praised, as I have argued in the same third book Which argument must be regarded as against the Manichseans, who do not receive the holy Scriptures of the Old Testament, in which original sin is narrated; and whatever thence is read in the apostolic epistles, they contend was introduced with a detestable impudence by the corrupters of the Scriptures, assuming that it was not said by the apostles. But against the Pelagians that must be maintained which both Scriptures commend, as they profess to receive them. These things I said in my first book of Retractations, when I was reconsidering the treatises on free-will. Nor, indeed, were these things all that were said by me there about these treatises, but there were many others also, which I thought it would be tedious to insert in this work for you, and not necessary; and this I think you also will judge when you have read all. Although, therefore, in the third book on free-will I have in such wise argued concerning infants, that if even if what the Pelagians say were true, that ignorance and difficulty, without which no man is born, are elements, not punishments, of our nature, still the Manichseans would be overcome, who will have it that the two natures, to wit, of good and evil, are co-eternal. Is, therefore, the faith to be called in question or forsaken, which the Catholic Church maintains against those very Pelagians, asserting as she does that it is original sin, the guilt of which, contracted by generation, must he remitted by regeneration? And if they confess this with us, so that we may at once, in this matter of the Pelagians, destroy error, why do they think that it must be doubted that God can deliver even infants, to whom He gives His grace by the sacrament of baptism, from the power of darkness, and translate them into the kingdom of the Son of His love? In the fact, therefore, that He gives that grace to some, and does not give it to others, why wiU they not celebrate to the Lord His mercy and judgment?

But wherefore is it given to them, rather than to those who have known the mind of the Lord? Who is able to look into unsearchable things? who to trace out that which is past finding out?

Chap. 28. [xii.] God's goodness and righteousness shewn in all.

It is therefore settled that God's grace is not given according to the deserts of the recipients, but according to the good pleasure of His will; to the praise and glory of His own grace so that he who glorieth may by no means glory in himself, but in the Lord, who gives to those men to whom He will because He is merciful; what if, however. He does not give

He is righteous: and He does not give to whom He will not that He may make known the riches of His glory to the vessels of mercy. For by giving to some what they do not deserve, He has certainly willed that His grace should be gratuitous, and thus genuine grace; by not giving to all, He has shown what all deserve." Kind in His kindness to some, righteous in the punishment of others, and good in respect of all; because it is good when that which is due is rendered, and righteous in respect of all, since that which is not due is given without wrong to any one.

Chap. 29. God's true grace could he defended even if there were no original sin, as Pelagius maintains,

"But God's grace is maintained even without merits, that is.

His true grace; even if infants, when baptized, according to the view of the Pelagians, are not plucked out of the power of darkness, because they are held to be guilty of no sin, as the

CHAP. 30.] ORIGINAL SIN NOT NECESSARY TO GRACE. 197

Pelagians think, but are only transferred into the Lord's kingdom: for even thus, without any deserving, the kingdom is given to those to whom it is given; and without any evil deserving it is not given to them to whom it is not given.

And this we are in the habit of saying in opposition to the same Pelagians, when they object to us that we attribute God's grace to fate, when we say that it is given not in respect to our merits. For they themselves rather attribute God's grace to fate in the case of infants, if they say that when there is no deserving it is fate. Certainly, even according to the Pelagians themselves, no merits can be found in infants to cause that some of them should be admitted into the kingdom, and others should be alienated from the kingdom.

But now, as in order to show that God's grace is not given according to our merits I preferred to maintain this truth in accordance with both opinions, "both in accordance with our own, to wit, who say that infants are bound by original sin, and according to that of the Pelagians, who deny that there is original sin, "yet neither on that account can I doubt that infants have what He can pardon them who saves His people from their sins.
So in the third book on free-will, according to both views, I have withstood the Manichseans, whether ignorance and difficulty be punishments or elements of nature without which no man is born; and yet I hold one of these views. There, moreover, it is sufficiently evidently declared by me, that that is not the nature of man as he was ordained, but his punishment as condemned.

Chap. so.

Therefore it is in vain that it is objected to me concerning the antiquity of that book of mine, that I am not arguing the case as I ought to argue it in respect of infants; and that thence I am persuading my opponents by the light of a manifest truth, that God's grace is not given according to men's merits. For if, when I began my treatises concerning free-will as a layman, and unfolded them as a presbyter, I still doubted of the condemnation of infants not born again, and of the deliverance of infants that were born again, no one, as I think, would be so unfair and envious as to hinder my progress, and judge that I must continue in that uncertainty. But since it might more correctly be understood that it ought to be believed that I did not doubt in that matter, for the reason that they against whom my purpose was directed seemed to me in such wise to be rebutted, as that whether there was a punishment of original sin in infants, according to the truth, or whether there was not, as some mistaken people think, yet in no degree should such a confusion of the two natures be believed in, to wit, of good and evil, as the error of the Manichseans introduces. *" Be it far from us so to forsake the case of infants as to say to ourselves that it is uncertain whether, being regenerated in Christ, if they die in infancy they pass into eternal salvation; but that, not being regenerated, they pass into the second death: because that which is written,

" By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men,"^ cannot be rightly understood in any other manner; nor from that eternal death which is most righteously repaid to sin does any deliver any one, small or great, save He who, for the sake of remitting our sins, both original and actual, died without any sin of His own, either original or actual. But why some rather than others? Again and again we say, and do not shrink from it, " man, who art thou that repliest against God? " ^ " His judgments are unsearchable, and His ways past finding out." ^ And let us add this, " Seek not out the things that are too high for thee, and search not the things that are above thy strength." *

Chap. 31. â€“” That infants are not judged according to that which they are foreknown as likely to do if they shouid live.

For you see, beloved, how absurd it is, and how foreign from soundness of faith and sincerity of truth, for us to say that infants, when they die, should be judged in respect of those things which they are foreknown as likely to do if they should live. For to this opinion, from which certainly every human feeling, on however little reason it may be founded, and especially every Christian feeling, revolts, they are compelled to advance who have chosen in such wise to be withdrawn from the error of the Pelagians as still to think that they must believe, and, moreover, must profess in argument, that the grace of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord, by which alone after the fall of the first man, in whom we all fell, help is afforded to us, is given according to our merits. And this belief Pelagius himself, before the Eastern bishops as judges, condemned in fear of his own condemnation. And if this be not said of the good or bad works, to wit, of those who have died, which they would have done if they had lived,â€” and thus of no works, and works that would never exist, even in the foreknowledge of God,^^ if this, therefore, be not said, and you see under how great a mistake it is said, what will remain but that we confess, when the darkness of contention is removed, that the grace of God is not given according to our merits, which position the Catholic Church defends against the Pelagian heresy; and that we see this in more evident truth especially in infants? For God is not compelled by fate to come to the help of these infants, and not to come to the help of those, â€” since the case is alike to both;â€” or shall we think that human affairs in the case of infants are not managed by Divine Providence, but by fortuitous chances, when rational souls are either to be condemned or delivered, although, indeed, not a sparrow falls to the ground without the will of our Father which is in heaven;â€” or must we so attribute it to the negligence of parents that infants die without baptism, as that heavenly judgments. have nothing to do with it; as if they themselves who in this way die badly had of their own will chosen the negligent parents for themselves of whom they were born ? What shall I say [in case] that an infant expires a little time before he can possibly be advantaged by the ministry of baptism? For often when the parents are eager and the ministers prepared for giving baptism to the infants, it still is not given, because God does not choose; since He has not kept it in this life for a little while in order that baptism might be given it. What, moreover, [shall I say in the case] that sometimes aid could be afforded by baptism to the children of unbelievers, that they should not go into perdition, and could not be afforded to the children of believers ? In which case it is certainly shown that there is no

1 Matt. X. 29.
acceptance of persons with God; otherwise He would rather deliver the children of His worshippers than the children of His enemies.

Chap. 32. [xiir.]

But now, since we are now treating of the gift of perseverance, why is it that benefit is afforded to the person about to die who is not baptized, while to the baptized person about to fall, aid is not afforded, so that he might die previously? Unless, perchance, we shall still listen to that absurdity by which it is said that it is of no advantage to any one to die before his fall, because he will be judged according to those actions which God foreknew that he would have done if he had lived. Who can hear with patience this perversity, so violently opposed to the soundness of the faith? Who can bear it? And yet they are driven to say this who do not confess that God's grace is not bestowed in respect of our deservings. They, however, who will not say that any one who has died is judged in respect of those things which God foreknew that he would have done if he had lived, considering with how manifest a falsehood and how great an absurdity this would be said, have no further reason to say, what the Church condemned in the Pelagians, and caused to be condemned by Pelagius himself, that the grace of God, namely, is given in respect of our merits, when they see some infants not regenerated taken from this life to eternal death, and others regenerated, to eternal life; and those themselves that are regenerated, some going hence, persevering even to the end, and others kept in this life even until they fall, who certainly would not have fallen if they had departed hence before their lapse; and again some falling, but not departing from this life until they return, who certainly would have perished if they had departed before their return.

Chap. 33.

From all which it is shown with sufficient clearness that the grace of God, which both begins a man's faith and which enables it to persevere unto the end, is not given in respect of our merits, but is given according to His own most secret and Since (as I have already said before) those who will not persevere are, by the most foreseeing will of God, mingled with those who will persevere, for the reason that we may learn not to mind high things, but to consent to the lowly, and may "work out our own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God that worketh in us both to will and to do for His good pleasure." We therefore will, but God worketh in us also. We therefore work, but God worketh in us to work also for His good pleasure. This is profitable for us both to believe and to say, "this is pious, this is true, that our confession be lowly and submissive, and that all should be given to God. Thinking, we believe; thinking, we speak; thinking, we do whatever we do; but, in respect of what concerns the way of piety and the true worship of God, we are not sufficient to think anything as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God. For "our heart and our thoughts are not in our own power," whence the same Ambrose who says this says also: "But who is so blessed who in his heart always rises upwards? And how can this be done without divine help? Assuredly, by no means. Finally," he says, "the same Scripture affirms above, Blessed is the man whose help is of Thee; Lord, ascent is in his heart." Assuredly to say this, Ambrose was not only enabled by reading in the holy writings, but as of such a man is to be without doubt believed, he felt it also in his own heart. Therefore, what is said in the sacraments of believers that we...
Chap. 34. [xiv.] â€” The doctrine of predestination not opposed to the advantage of preaching.

' But they say that the explanation of predestination is opposed to the advantage of preaching.\(^1\) as if, indeed, it were opposed to the preaching of the apostle! Did not that teacher of the heathen so often, in faith and truth, as well commend predestination, as without ceasing preach the word of God? Because he said, "It is God that worketh in you both to will and to do for His good pleasure," \(^2\) did he not also exhort that we should both will and do what is pleasing to God? or because he said, "He who hath begun a good work in you shall carry it on even unto the day of Christ Jesus," \(^3\) did he on that account cease to persuade men to begin and to persevere unto the end? Doubtless, our Lord Himself commanded men to believe, and said, "Believe in God, believe also in me:"\(^4\) and yet His judgment is not therefore false, nor is His explanation idle when He says, "No man cometh unto me" \(^5\) that is, no man believeth in me \(^6\) "except it were given him of my Father."\(^7\) Nor, again, because this explanation is true, is the former precept vain. Why, therefore, do we think the explanation of predestination useless to preaching, to precept, to exhortation, to rebuke, â€” all which things the divine Scripture repeats frequently, â€” seeing that the same Scripture commends this doctrine?

Chap. 35. — Meaning of Predestination. 203

W ill any man dare to say that God did not foreknow those to whom He would give, \(\ldots\) or whom He would give His Son, that of them He should lose none?\(^8\) And, certainly, if He foreknew these things, He as certainly foreknew His own H ndness, wherewith He condescends to deliver ns.

wit, the forekno wledged and the preparation of God's kindnesses, whereby they are most certainly delivered, whoever they are that are delivered. But where are the rest left by the righteous divine judgment except in the mass of ruin," where the Tyrians and the Sidonians were left? who, moreover, might have believed if they had seen Christ's wonderful miracles. But since it was not given to them to believe, the means of believing also was denied them. From which fact it appears that some have in their understanding itself a naturally divine gift of intelligence, by which they may be moved to the faith, if they either hear the words or behold the signs fitted for their minds; and yet if, in the more lofty judgment of God, they are not by the predestination of grace separated from the mass of perdition, neither those very divine words nor deeds are applied to them by which they might believe if they only heard or saw such things. Moreover, in the same mass of ruin the Jews were left, because they could not believe such great and eminent mighty works as were done in their sight.

For the gospel has not been silent about the reason why they could not believe, since it says: " But though He had done such great miracles before them, yet they believed not on Him; that the saying of Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled which he spake,^ Lord, who hath believed our report, and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed? And, therefore, they could not believe, because that Esaias said again,^ He hath blinded their eyes and hardened their heart, that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them."* Therefore the eyes of the Tyrians and Sidonians were not so ^ Isaiah vi. 10. 4 John xii. 37 fif.

204 ON THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE. [CHAP. 36.

blinded nor was their heart so hardened, since they would have believed if they had seen such mighty works as the Jews saw. But it did not do them any good that they were able to believe, because they were not predestinated by Him whose judgments are Inscrutable and His ways past finding out.

Neither would it have been a hindrance to them that they could not believe, if they had been so predestinated as that God should illuminate those blind eyes, and should will to take away the stony heart from those hardened ones. But what the Lord said of the Tyrians and Sidonians may perchance be understood in another way: yet that no one comes to Christ unless it were given him, and that it is given to those who are chosen in Him before the foundation of the world, he confesses beyond a doubt who hears the divine utterance, not with the deaf ears of the flesh, but with the ears of the heart; and yet this predestination, which is plainly enough unfolded even by the words of the gospels, did not prevent the Lord's saying as well in respect of the commencement, what I have a little before mentioned, " Believe in God; believe also in me," as in respect of perseverance, " A man ought always to pray, and not to faint." For they hear these things and do them to whom it is given; but they do them not, whether they hear or do not hear, to whom it is not given.
Because, "To you," said He, "it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given." Of these, the one refers to the mercy, the other to the judgment of Him to whom our soul cries, "I will sing of mercy and judgment unto Thee, Lord."^

Chap. 36. â€” Truth of God's grace not to hinder the preaching of predestination.

Therefore, by the preaching of predestination, the preaching of a persevering and progressive faith is not to be hindered; and thus they may hear what is necessary to whom it is given that they should obey. For how shall they hear without a preacher? Neither, again, is the preaching of a progressive faith which continues even to the end to hinder the preaching of predestination, so that he who is living faithfully and obediently may not be lifted up by that very obedience, as if by a benefit of his own, not received; but that he that glorieth may glory in the Lord. For "we must boast in nothing, since nothing is our own." And this Cyprian most faithfully saw and most fearlessly explained, and thus he pronounced predestination to be most assured.^ For if we must boast in nothing, seeing that nothing is our own, certainly we must not boast of the most persevering obedience.

Nor is it so to be called our own, as if it were not given to us from above. ' And, therefore, it is God's gift, which, by the confession of all Christians, God foreknew that He would give to His people, who were called by that calling whereof it was said, "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance." ^ This, then, is the predestination which we faithfully and humbly preach. Nor yet did the same teacher and doer, who both believed on Christ and most perseveringly lived in holy obedience, even to suffering for Christ, cease on that account to preach the gospel, to exhort to faith and to pious manners, and to that very perseverance to the end, because he said, "We must boast in nothing, since nothing is our own," when he declared without ambiguity the true grace of God, that is, which is not given in respect of our merits: which because God foreknew that He would give, predestination was announced beyond a doubt by these words of Cyprian; and if this did not prevent Cyprian from preaching obedience, it certainly ought not to prevent us."

Chap. 37. â€” Ears to hear are a willingness to obey.

Although, therefore, we say that obedience is the gift of God we still exhort men to it. But to those who obediently hear the exhortation of the truth is given that very gift of God â€” that is, to hear with obedience; while to those who do not thus hear it is not given. For it was not any one whatever in general, but Christ who said, "No man cometh unto me, except it were given him of my Father; " ^ and, "To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given." * And concerning continence He says, " Not all receive this saying, but tliely to whom it is given." ^ And when the apostle would exhort married people to conjugal modesty, he says, " I would that all men were even as I myself; but every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, another after that;"^ where he plainly shows, not only that continence is a gift of God, but even the chastity of those who are married. And although these things are true, we jiU exhort to them as much as is given to any one of us to be able to exhort. Jieceause this also is His gift in whose hand are both ourselves and our discourses. ^ "Whence also says the apostle, " According to this grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise architect, I have laid the foundation." ^ And in another place he says, " Even as the Lord hath given to every man: I have planted, Apollos has watered, but God has given the increase. Therefore neither is he that planteth anything, nor he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase." * And thu.s as only he preaches and exhorts rightly who has received this gift, so assuredly he who obediently hears him who rightly exhorts and preaches is he who has received this gift.' Hence is what the Lord said, when, speaking to those who had their fleshly ears open. He nevertheless told them, " He that hath ears to hear let him hear;"^ which beyond a doubt He knew that not all had.

3 John vi. 66. * Matt. xiii. 11.

206 OI^ THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE. [CHAP. 27.

And from whom they have, whosoever they be that have them, the Lord Himself shows when He says, " I will give them a heart to know me, and ears to hear." Â® Therefore, having ears is itself the gift of obeying, so that they who had that came to Him, to whom " no one comes unless it were given to him of His Father." Therefore we exhort and preach, but they who have ears to hear obediently hear us, w^hile they who have them not, in them it comes to pass that is written, that hearing they do not hear, â€” hearing, to wit, with the bodily sense, they do not hear with the assent of the heart. ' But why these should have ears to hear, and twse have them not, â€” that is, why to these it should be given by the Father to come to the Son, while to those it should not be given, â€” who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been His counsellor? Or who art thou, man, that repliest against God? Must that which is manifest he denied, because that which is hidden cannot be comprehended?

Shall we, I say, declare that what we see to be so is not so, because we cannot find out why it is so?"

Chap. 38. [xv.] â€” Against the preaching of predestination the same objections may be alleged as against predestination.

But they say, as you write: "That no one can be aroused i] by the incentives of rebuke if it be said in the assembly of the Church to many hearers: The definite judgment of God's will concerning predestination stands in such wise, that some of you will receive the will to obey, and wiU come out of unbeHeH unto the faith, as you w^ill receive perseverance and abide in the faith; but others who are lingering in the delight of sins have not yet arisen, for the reason that the aid of pitying grace has not yet indeed raised you up. But yet, if there are any who are not yet called, whom by His grace He has predestinated, ye shall receive that grace by which you may will and be elected; and if any obey, if ye are predestinated to be rejected, the strength to obey shall be withdrawn from you, so that you may cease to obey." Although these things may be saidij they ought not _so to deter jis from confessing the^'frue grace of God, â€” that is, the grace which is nSr^ven1Eo"us"irr respect of our merits, â€” and from confessing the predestination of the saints in accordance therewith, even as we are not deterred from confessing God's foreknow->i ledg"e, although one should thus speak to the people concerning it, and say:
Whether you are now living righteously or unrighteously, you shall be such by and by as the Lord has , foreknown that you will be, â€” either good, if He has foreknown \ you as good, or bad, if He has foreknown you as bad. For if J onthe" hearing of this some should be turned to torpor and slothfulness, and from striving should go headlong to lust after their own desires, is it therefore to be counted that what has been said about the foreknowledge of God is false?
If God has foreknown that they will be good, will they not be good, whatever be the depth of evil in which they are now engaged? And if He has foreknown them evil, will they not be evil, whatever goodness may now be discerned in them?

208 ON THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE. [CHAP. 40.

There was a man in our monastery, who, when the brethren rebuked him for doing some things that ought not to be done, and for not doing some things that ought to be done, replied, "Whatever I may now be, I shall be such as God has foreknown that I shall be."
And this man certainly both said what was true, and took no advantage by this truth, but so far made way in evil as to desert the society of the monastery, and become a dog returned to his vomit; while, nevertheless, it is uncertain what he might yet become. Tor the sake of souls of this kind, then, is the truth which is spoken about God's foreknowledge either to be denied or to be kept back, â€” at such times, for instance, when, if it is not spoken, other errors are incurred?
Chap. 39. [xvi.] a€“ Prayer and exhortation.

There are some, moreover, who either do not pray at all, or pray coldly, because, from the Lord's words, they have learnt that God knows what is necessary for us before we ask it of Him. Must the truth of this declaration be given up, or shall it be regarded as to be erased from the gospel because of such people? Nay, since it is manifest that God has prepared some things to be given even to those who do not pray for them, such as the beginning of faith, and other things not to be given except to those who pray for them, such as perseverance even unto the end, certainly he who thinks that he has this latter from himself does not pray to have it (from God). Therefore we must take care lest, while we are afraid of exhortation growing lukewarm, prayer should 'be stifled and arrogance stimulated.'

Chap. 40. a€“ WMn the truth must bespoken, when kept back.

Therefore let the truth be spoken, especially when any question impels us to declare it; and let them receive it who can receive it, lest, perchance, while we are silent on account of those who cannot receive it, they be not only defrauded of the truth, but be taken captive by falsehood, who are able to receive the truth, whereby falsehood may be avoided. For it is easy, nay, and it is useful, that some truth should be kept back because of those who are incapable of apprehending it.

CHAP. 40.] REASONS AGAINST RESERVE, 209

For whence is that word of our Lord: " I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now " ?

And that of the apostle: " I could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal: as if unto babes in Christ I have given you to drink milk, and not meat, for hitherto ye were not able, neither yet indeed now are ye able " ?

Although, in a certain manner of speaking, it might happen that what is said should be both milk to infants and meat for grown-up persons. As " in the beginning was the "Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God," what Christian can keep it back? "What Christian can receive it? or what in sound doctrine can be found more comprehensive?

And yet this is not kept back either from infants or from grown-up people, nor is it hidden from infants by those who are mature. But the reason of keeping back the truth is one, the necessity of speaking the truth is another. It would be a tedious business to inquire into or to put down all the reasons for withholding the truth; of which, nevertheless, there is this one, a€“ that" we may not make those who do not understand worse, while we wish to make those who do understand more wise; since they, indeed, although the} do not become wiser when we withhold anything of the kind, certainly do not become worse. "When, however, a truth is of such a nature that he who cannot receive it is made worse by our speaking it, and he who can receive it is made worse by our withholding it, what do we think is to be done?
Iust we not say the truth, that he who can receive it may receive it, rather than withhold it, so that not only neither may receive it, but that even he who is more intelligent should himself be made worse? ' For if he should hear and receive it, by his means also many might learn. For in proportion as he is more capable of learning, he is the more fitted for teaching others. The enemy of grace presses on and urges in all ways that we should believe that grace is given in respect of our deservings, and that thus grace is no more grace; and are we unwilling to say what we can say by the testimony of Scripture? Do we fear, forsooth, to offend by our speaking him who is not able to receive the truth? and

' John xvi 12, ^ 1 Cor, iiL 1, 3 John i. j.

XT.

210 ON THE GIFT OF FERSEVEEANCE. [CHAP. 41.

are we not afraid lest by our silence he who can receive the truth may be involved in falsehood? ^

Chap. 41. â€” He ijroves that what is alleged against ike preaching of predestination may be said against God's grace.

For either predestination must be in such wise preached, in the way and degree in which the Holy Scripture plainly declares it, that in the predestinated the gifts and calling of God are without repentance; or it must be avowed that God's grace is given in respect of our merits, â€” which is the opinion of the Pelagians; although that opinion of theirs, as I have often said already, may be read in the doings of the Eastern bishops to have been condemned by the lips of Pelagius himself. Further, from the heretical perversity of the Pelagians, those on whose account I am discoursing are only removed, inasmuch as, although they will not confess that they who by God's grace become obedient and so abide are predestinated, they stiU confess, nevertheless, that this grace prevents their will to whom it is given; in such a way certainly as that grace may not be thought to be given freely, as the truth declares, but rather according to the merits of a preceding will, as the Pelagian error says, in contradiction to the truth. Therefore, also, grace precedes faith; otherwise, if faith precedes grace, beyond a doubt will also precedes it, because there cannot be faith without wiU. But if grace precedes faith because it precedes will, certainly it precedes all obedience; it also precedes charity, by which alone God is truly and pleasantly obeyed. And all these things grace works in him to whom it is given, and in whom it precedes all these things, [xvii.] Among these benefits there remains perseverance unto the end, which is daily asked for in vain from the Lord, if the Lord by His grace does not effect it in him whose prayers He hears. See now how foreign it is from the truth to deny that perseverance even to the end of this life is the gift of God; since He Himself puts an end to this life when He wills, and if He puts an end before a fall that is threatening. He makes the man to persevere even unto the end. But more marvellous and more manifest to believers is the liberality of God's goodness, that even to infants, although there is no possibility of giving obedience to that age, this grace is given. To whomsoever, therefore, God gives those gifts of His, beyond a doubt He has foreknown that He will bestow them on him, and in His foreknowledge He has prepared them for him. Therefore, those whom he predestinated, them He also called with that calling which I am not reluctant often to make mention of, of which it is said, "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance." For in His foreknowledge, which cannot be deceived and changed, the ordering of His future doings is absolutely, and is nothing but, predestination. But, as he whom God has foreknown as being chaste, although he may regard it as uncertain, so acts as that he may be chaste, so he whom He has predestinated to be chaste, although he may regard that as uncertainty, does not, therefore, not act in such a manner as to be chaste because he hears that he will be what he will be by the gift of God. Nay, rather, his love rejoices, and he is not puffed up as if he had not received it. Not only, therefore, is he not hindered from this work by the preaching of predestination, but he is even assisted to it, so that although he glories he may glory in the Lord.

CHAP. 42] PREDESTINATION XO HINDU ANCE TO ACTION. 211

Chap. 42. â€” The adversaries cannot deny predestination to those gifts of grace which they themselves acknowledge, and their exhortations are not hindered by this predestination nevertheless.

And what I have said of charity may be said also of faith, of piety, of charity, of perseverance, and, not to enumerate single virtues, it may be said with the utmost truthfulness of all the obedience with which God is obeyed. But those who place only the beginning of faith and perseverance to the end in such wise in our power as not to regard them as God's gifts, nor to think that God works on our thoughts and wills that we may have and retain them, grant, nevertheless, that He gives other things, since they are obtained from Him by the faith of the believer, why are they not afraid that exhortation to these other things, and the preaching of these other things, should be hindered by the limitation of predestination?

Or, perchance, do they say that such things are not predestinated? Then they are not given by God, or He has not known that He would give them. Because, if they are given,

1 Rom. xi, 24,

212 ^ ON THE GIFT OF PERSEVEEANCE, [CHAP. 43.
and He has foreknown that He would give them, assuredly He has predestinated them. As, therefore, they themselves also exhort to chastity, charity, piety, and other things which they confess to be God's gifts, and cannot deny that they are also foreknown by Him, and therefore predestinated; nor do they say that their exhortations are hindered by the preaching of God's predestination, that is, by the preaching of God's foreknowledge of those future gifts of His: thus they may see that neither are their exhortations to faith or to perseverance hindered, even although those very things may be said, as is the truth, to be gifts of God, and that those things are foreknown, that is, predestinated to be given; but let them rather see that by this preaching of predestination only that most pernicious error is hindered and overthrown, whereby it is said that the grace of God is given in respect of our deservings, so that he who glories may glory not in the Lord, but in himself.

Chap. 43. â€” Further development of the foregoing argument.

And in order that I may more openly unfold this for the sake of those who are somewhat slow of apprehension, let those who are endowed with an intelligence that flies in advance bear with my delay. The Apostle James says, " If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him," ^ It is written also in the Proverbs of Solomon, " Because the Lord giveth wisdom" ^ And of continency it is read in the book of Wisdom, whose authority has been used by great and learned men who have commented upon the divine utterances long before us; there, therefore, it is read, "When I knew that no one can be continent unless God gives it, and that this was the very part of wisdom, to know whose gift this was." ^ Therefore these are God's gifts, â€” that is, to say nothing of others, wisdom and continency. Let those also acquiesce: for they are not Pelagians, to contend against such a manifest truth as is with hard and heretical perversity. " But," say they, " that these things be given to us of God is obtained by faith, which has its beginning

CHAP. 44.] PREACHING CONSISTENT WITH PREDESTINATION. 213

from us; " â€”whicli faith also to begin to have, and to abide in it even to the end, they contend is our own doing, as if we received it not from the Lord. This, beyond a doubt, is in contradiction to the apostle when he says, " For what hast thou that thou hast not received ? " ^^ It is in contradiction also to the saying of the martyr Cyprian, " That we must boast in nothing, since nothing is our own."^ When we have said this, and many other things which it is wearisome to repeat, and have shown that both the commencement of faith and perseverance to the end are gifts of God; and that it is impossible that God should not foreknow any of His future gifts, as well what should be given as to whom they should be given; and that thus those whom He delivers and crowns are predestinated by Him; they think it well to reply, " that the assertion of predestination is opposed to the advantage of preaching, for the reason that when this is heard no one can be stirred up by the incentives of rebuke." When they say this, " they are unwilling that it should be declared to men, that coming to the faith and abiding in the faith are God's gifts, lest despair rather than exhortation should appear to be suggested, insomuch as they who hear think that it is the uncertainty of human ignorance on which God bestows, or on which He does not bestow, these gifts." Why, then, do they themselves also preach with us that wisdom and continency are God's gifts?
But if, when these things are declared to be God's gifts, there is no hindrance of the exhortation with which we exhort men to be wise and continent; what is after all the reason for their thinking that the exhortation is hindered wherewith we exhort men to come to the faith, and to abide in it to the end, if these also are said to be God's gifts, as is proved by the Scriptures, which are His witnesses?

Chap. 44. â€” Exhortation to wisdom, though wisdom is God's gift.

Now, to say nothing more of continency, and to argue in this place of wisdom alone, certainly the Apostle James above mentioned says, " But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, modest, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, 21-i ON THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE. [CIIAP. 44.

Do you not see, I beseech you, how this wisdom descends from the Father of Lights, laden with many and great benefits? Because, as the same apostle says, " Every excellent gift and every perfect gift is from above, and comes down from the Father of Lights." ^ Why, then â€” to set aside other matters â€” do we rebuke the impure and contentious, to whom we nevertheless preach that the gift of God is wisdom, pure and peaceable; and are not afraid that they should be influenced, by the uncertainty of the divine will, to find in this preaching more of despair than of exhortation; and that they should not be stirred up by the incentives of rebuke rather against us than against themselves, because we rebuke them for not having those things which we ourselves say are not produced by human will, but are given by the divine liberality? Finally, why did the preaching of this grace not deter the Apostle James from rebuking restless souls, and saying, " If ye have bitter envying, and contentions are in your hearts, glory not, and be not liars against the truth.
This is not the wisdom that cometh down from above, but is earthly, animal, devilish; for where envying and contention are, there are inconstancy and every evil work." ^ As, therefore, the restless are to be rebuked, both by the testimony of the divine declarations, and by those very impulses of ours which they have in common with ourselves; nor is it any argument against this rebuke that we declare that peaceful wisdom whereby the conten tions are corrected and healed to be the gift of God; unbelievers are in such wise to be rebuked, as those who do not abide in the faith, without any hindrance to that rebuke from the preaching of God's grace, although that preaching commends that very grace and the continuance in it as the gifts of God. Because, although wisdom is obtained from faith, even as James himself, when he had said, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him;" * immediately added, "But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering." It is not, however, because faith is given before it is asked for by him to whom it is given

1 Jas. iii. 17. ^ Jas. iii. 17.

* Jas. iii. 14. * Jas. i. 5.

CHAP. 46.} EXHORTATION TO PERSEVERANCE. 215

that it must therefore be said not to be the gift of God, but to be of ourselves, because it is given to us without our asking for it. For the apostle very plainly says, "Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." ^ From whom, therefore, are peace and love, from Him also is faith; wherefore, from Him we ask not only that it may be increased to those that possess it, but also that it may be given to those that possess it not.

Chap. 45. â€” Exhortation to other gifts of God in like manner.

Nor do those on whose account I am saying these things, who cry out that exhortation is checked by the preaching of predestination and grace, exhort to those gifts alone which they contend are not given by God, but are of ourselves, such as are the beginning of faith, and perseverance in it even to the end; which certainly they ought to do, in the way only of exhorting unbelievers to believe, and believers to continue to believe. But those things which with us they do not deny to be God's gifts, so as with us to demolish the error of the Pelagians, such as modesty, continence, patience, and other virtues that pertain to a holy life, and are obtained by faith from the Lord, they ought to show as needing to be besought, and to pray for only, either for themselves or others, but not to exhort any one to strive after them and retain them. But when they exhort to those things, â€” as they can, and confess that men ought to be exhorted, â€” certainly they show plainly enough that exhortations are not hindered by that preaching, whether they are exhortations to faith or to perseverance to the end, because we also preach that such things are God's gifts, and are not given by any man to himself, but are given by God.

Chap. 46. â€” A man who does not persevere fails by his own fault.
But it is said, "A man by his own fault forsakes the faith, when he yields and consents to that temptation which is the cause of his desertion of the faith." Who denies it? But because of this, perseverance in the faith is not to be said not to be God's gift. For it is this that a man daily asks for when he says, "Lead us not into temptation; "^ and if he is heard, it is this that he receives. And thus, as he daily asks for perseverance, he assuredly places the hope of his perseverance not in himself, but in God.
1 Eph. vi. 23.

216 ON THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE. [CHAP. 47.

I, however, am loth to exaggerate the case with my words, but I rather leave it to them to consider, and see what it is of which they have persuaded themselves â€” to wit, " that by the preaching of predestination, more of despair than of exhortation is impressed upon the hearers." For this is to say that a man then despairs of his salvation when he has learned to base his hope not in himself, but in God, although the prophet cries, " Cursed is he who has his hope in man." ^'

Chap. 47. â€” Predestination is sometimes signified under the name of foreknowledge.

These gifts, therefore, of God, which are given to the elect who are called according to God's purpose, among which gifts is both the beginning of belief and perseverance in the faith to the termination of this life, as I have proved by such a concurrent testimony of reasons and authorities, â€” these gifts of God, I say, if there is no such predestination as I am maintaining, are not foreknown by God; but they are foreknown. This, therefore, is the predestination which I maintain, [xviii.] Whence sometimes the same predestination is signified also under the name of foreknowledge; as says the apostle, " God has not rejected His people whom He foreknew." ^

Here, when he says, " He foreknew," the sense is not rightly understood except as " He predestinated," as is shown by the context of the passage itself. For he was speaking of the remnant of the Jews which were saved, while the rest perished. For above he had said that the prophet had declared to Israel, " All day long I have stretched forth my hands to an unbelieving and a gainsaying people," * And as if it were answered. What, then, has become of the promises of God to Israel? he added in continuation, " I say, then, has God cast away His people? God forbid! for I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin." Then he added

1 Matt. vi. 13. 2 jer, xvii. 5.

2 Eom. xi. 2. * Rom. x. 21 et seq.
the words of which I am now treating: "God hath not cast away His people whom He foreknew." And in order to show that the remnant had been left by God's grace, not by any merits of their works, he went on to add, "Know ye not what the Scripture saith in [respect of] Elias, in what way he maketh intercession with God against Israel?"^ and the rest. "But what," says he, "saith the answer of God unto him? 'I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee before Baal.'"^ For He says not, "There are left to me," but, "I have reserved to myself."

"Even so, then, at this present time also there is made a remnant by the election of grace. And if of grace, then it is no more by works; otherwise grace is no more grace." And connecting this with what I have above quoted, "What then?"^ and in answer to this inquiry, he says, "Israel hath not obtained that which he was seeking for, but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded." Therefore, in the election, and in this remnant which were made so by the election of grace, he wished to be understood the people which God did not reject, because He foreknew them. This is that election by which He elected those whom He willed in Christ before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy and without spot in His sight, in love, predestinating them unto the adoption of sons. No one, therefore, who understands these things is permitted to doubt that, when the apostle says, "God hath not cast away His people whom He foreknew," he intended to signify predestination.

For He foreknew the remnant which He should make so according to the election of grace. That is, therefore. He predestinated them; for without doubt He foreknew if He predestinated; but to have predestinated is to have foreknown that which He should do.'

Chap. 48. [xix.] â€“ Practice of Cyprian and Ambrose.

What, then, hinders us, when we read of God's foreknowledge in some commentators on God's word, and they are treating of the calling of the elect, from understanding the same predestination? For they would perchance have rather used in this matter the word which, moreover, is better understood, and which is not inconsistent with, nay, is in accordance with, the truth which is declared concerning the predestination of grace. This I know, that no one

HAS BEEN ABLE TO DISPUTE, EXCEPT ERRONEOUSLY, AGAINST THAT PREDESTINATION which I am maintaining in accordance with the Holy Scriptures. Yet I think that they who ask for the opinions of commentators on this matter ought to be satisfied with men so holy and so laudibly celebrated everywhere in the faith and Christian doctrine as Cyprian and Ambrose, of whom I have given such clear testimonies; and that for both doctrines â€“ that is, that they should both believe absolutely and preach everywhere that the grace of God is gratuitous, as we must believe and declare it to be; and that they should not think that preaching opposed to the preaching whereby we exhort the indolent or rebuke the evil; because these celebrated men also, although they were preaching God's grace in such a manner as that one of them said, " That we must not boast in nothing, because nothing is our own; " and the other, " Our heart and our thoughts are not in our own power; " yet ceased not to exhort and rebuke, in order that the divine commands might be obeyed. If either were they afraid of its being said to them," " Why do you exhort us, and why do you rebuke us, if our part is to have no good thing, and if our hearts are not in our own power? " These holy men could by no means fear that such things should be said to them, since they were of the mind to understand that it is given to very few to receive the teaching of salvation through God Himself, or through the angels of heaven, without any human preaching to them; but that it is given to many to believe in God through human agency. Yet, in whatever manner the word of God is spoken to man, beyond a doubt for man to hear it in such a way as to obey it, is God's gift.'

Chap. 49. â€” Farther references to Cyprian and Ambrose.

Whence the above-mentioned most excellent commentators on the divine declarations both preached the true grace of God

CHAP. 49.] TESTIMONY OF AMBROSE, 219

as it ought to be preached, â€” that is, as a grace preceded by no human doings, â€” and urgently exhorted to the doing of the divine commandments, that they who might have the gift of obedience should hear what commands they ought to obey.

For if any merits of ours precede grace, certainly it is the merit of some deed, or word, or thought, wherein also is understood a good will itself. But he very briefly comprehended the kinds of all deservings who said, " We must glory in nothing, because nothing is our own." And he who says, " Our heart and our thoughts are not in our own power," did not pass over acts and words themselves also, for there is no act or word of man which does not proceed from the heart and the thought. But what more could that most glorious martyr and most luminous doctor Cyprian say concerning this matter, than when he impressed upon us that it behoves us to pray, in the Lord's Prayer, even for the adversaries of the Christian faith, when he showed what he thought of the beginning of the faith, that it also is God's gift, and showed that the Church of Christ prays daily for perseverance unto the end, because none but God gives that perseverance to those who have persevered? Moreover, the blessed Ambrose, when he was expounding the passage where the Evangelist Luke says,

" It seemed good to me also," ^ says, " What he declares to have seemed good to himself cannot have seemed good to him alone. For not alone by human will did it seem good, but as it pleased Him who speaks in me as Christ, who effects that which is good may also seem good to us: for on whom He has mercy He also calls. And therefore he who follows Christ may answer, when he is asked why he wished to become a Christian, 'It seemed good to me also.' And when he says this, he does not deny that it seemed good to God; for the will of men is prepared by God. For it is God's grace that God should be honoured by the saint."^ Moreover, in the same work, â€” that is, in the exposition of the same Gospel, when he had come to that place where the Samaritans would not receive the Lord when His face was as of one going to Jerusalem, â€” he says, "Learn at the same time that He could not be received by those who were not converted in simpleness of mind. For if He had been willing, He would have made them devout who were undevout. And why they would not receive Him, the evangelist himself mentioned, saying, 'Because His face was as of one going towards Jerusalem.'^ But the disciples earnestly desired to be received into Samaria. But God calls those whom He makes worthy, and makes religious whom He will."^ What more evident, what more manifest do we ask from commentators on God's word, if we are delighted to hear from themselves what is clear in the Scriptures? But to these two, who ought to be enough, let us add also a third, the holy Gregory, who testifies that it is the gift of God both to believe in God and to confess what we believe, saying, "I beg of you confess the Trinity of one godhead; but if ye wish otherwise, say that it is of one nature, and God will be besought that a voice shall be given to you by the Holy Spirit;" that is, God will be besought to allow a voice to be given to you by which you may confess what you believe. "For He will give, I am certain. He who gave what is first, will give also what is second."^ He who gave the faculty of belief, will also give the power of confession.

Chap. 50. â€” Obedience not discouraged by preaching God's gifts.

Such doctors, and so great as these, saying that there is nothing of which we may boast as if of our own which God has not given us; and that our very heart and our thoughts are not in our own power, and thus giving the whole to God; and confessing that from Him we receive that we are converted to Him in such wise as to continue, so that that which is good appears also to us to be good; and we wish for it, so that we may honour God and receive Christ, so as from undevout people to be made devout and religious; so that we may believe in the Trinity itself, and also confess with our voice what we believe; â€” all these things they certainly attribute to God's grace, they acknowledge as God's gifts, they testify that from Him they come to us, and are not from ourselves. But will any one say of these, that they in such wise confessed that grace of God as to dare to deny His

' Greg, of Nazianz. Orat. 44 in Penicostcn, foreknowledge, which not only learned but unlearned men also confess? Again, if they had in such wise known that God gives these things as not to be ignorant that He foreknew that He would give them, and could not have been ignorant to whom He would give them, beyond a doubt they had known the predestination which, as preached by the apostles, we laboriously and diligently maintain against the modern heretics. Nor would it be with any manner of justice said, nevertheless, to those who preach obedience, and who fervently exhort, to the extent of the ability of each one, to its practice. If you do not wish that the obedience to which you are stirring us up should grow cold in our heart, forbear to preach to us that grace of God by which you confess that God gives what you are exhorting us to do.'

Chap. 51. [xx.] â€” Predestination must be preached.

Wherefore, if both the apostles and the teachers of the Church who succeeded them and imitated them did both these things, â€” that is, both truly preached the grace of God which is not given according to our merits, and inculcated by wholesome precepts a pious obedience, â€” what is it which these people of our time think themselves rightly bound by the invincible force of truth to say, " Even if what is said of the predestination of God's benefits be true, yet it must not be preached to the people " ? ^ It must absolutely be preached, so that he who has ears to hear, may hear. And who has them if he has not received them from Him who says, " I will give them a heart to know me, and ears to hear " ? ^ Assuredly, he who has not received may reject; although, nevertheless, he who receives may take and drink, may drink and live. For as piety must be preached, that, by him who has ears to hear, God may be rightly worshipped; modesty must be preached, that, by him who has ears to hear, no illicit act may be perpetrated by his fleshly nature; charity must be preached, that, by him who has ears to hear, God and his neighbours may be loved;â€” so also must be preached such a predestination of God's benefits that he who has ears to hear may glory, not in himself, but in the Lord.'

â– â–  In the letter of Prosper and Hilary. 3 Baruch ii. 31.

222 ON THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE. [CHAP. 53.

Chap. 52. â€” Previous writings anticipated the Pelagian heresy.

But in respect of their saying " that it was not necessary that so many hearts of people of little intelligence should be disquieted by the uncertainty of disputation of this kind, since the Catholic faith has been defended for so many years, with no less advantage, without this definition of predestination, as well against others as especially against the Pelagians, in so many books that have gone before, as well of Catholics and others as our own; "^â€”I much wonder that they should say this, and not observe "^â€”to say nothing of other writings in this place "^â€”that those very treatises of mine were both composed and published before the Pelagians had begun to appear; and) that they do not see in how many passages of those treatises 'I was unawares cutting down a future Pelagian heresy, by preaching the grace by which God delivers us from evil errors and from our habits, without any preceding merits of ours, "^â€”doing this according to His gratuitous mercy. And this I began more fully to apprehend in that disputation which I wrote to Simplicianus, the bishop of the Church of Milan, of blessed memory, in the beginning of my episcopate, when, moreover, I both perceived and asserted that the beginning of faith is God's gift.

Chap. 53. â€”Augustine's "Confessions."

I And which of my smaller works could be more generally and more agreeably known than the books of my Confessions ? And although I published them before the Pelagian heresy had come into existence, certainly in them I said to my God, and said it frequently, "Give what Thou commandest, and command what Thou wiliest." ^ Which words of mine, Pelagius at Ptome, when they were mentioned in his presence by a certain brother and fellow-bishop of mine, could not bear; and contradicting somewhat too excitedly, nearly came to a quarrel with him who had mentioned them. And what, indeed, does God primarily and chiefly command, but that we believe on Him? And this, therefore. He Himself gives, if it is well said to Him, "Give what Thou commandest." And,

^ The Epistle of Hilary, 8. * Confessions, lib. x. c. 19, 31, and 37.

CHAP. 54.] GOD GIVES THE BEGINNING AND END OF FAITH. 223

moreover, in those same books, in respect of what I have related concerning my conversion, when God converted me to that faith which, with a most miserable and raging talkativeness, I was destroying, do you not remember that it was so narrated how I showed that I was granted to the faithful and daily tears of my mother, that I should not perish? ^ Where certainly I declared that God by His grace converted the wills of men to the true faith, not only when they had been turned away from it, but even when they were opposed to it.

Further, in what manner I besought God concerning my growth in perseverance, you know, and you are able to review if you wish it. Therefore, that all the gifts of God which in that work I either asked for or praised, who can dare, I will not say to deny, but even to doubt, were foreknown by God that He would give, and that He could never be ignorant of the persons to whom He would give them? This is the manifest and assured predestination of the saints, which subsequently necessity compelled me more carefully and laboriously to defend when I was already disputing against the Pelagians.
For I learnt that certain special heresies introduced certain questions peculiar to the Church, which the sacred Scripture might be more carefully defended than if no such necessity compelled their defence. And what compelled those passages of Scripture in which predestination is commended to be defended more abundantly and clearly by that labour of mine, than the fact that the Pelagians say that God's grace is given according to our merits; for what else is this than an absolute denial of grace?

Chap. 54. [xxi.] การนั้น การเริ่มต้นและการสิ้นสุดของความเชื่อมั่นเป็นของพระเจ้า.

Therefore that this opinion, unpleasing as it is to God, and hostile to those gratuitous benefits of God whereby we are delivered, may be destroyed, I maintain that both the beginning of faith and the perseverance therein according to the Scriptures even to the end, of which Scriptures I have already quoted many are God's gifts. Because if we say that the beginning of faith is of ourselves, so that by it we deserve to receive other gifts of God, the Pelagians conclude to deny grace.

’Confessions, lib. iii. c. 11 and 12, lib. ix. c. 8.

224 ON THE GIFT OF PERSEVERANCE. [CHAP. 55.

that God's grace is given according to our merits. And this the Catholic faith held in such dread, that Pelagius himself, in fear of condemnation, condemned it. And, moreover, if we say that our perseverance is of ourselves, not of God, they answer that we have the beginning of our faith of ourselves in such wise as the end, thus arguing that we have that beginning of ourselves much more, if of ourselves we have the continuance unto the end, since to perfect is much greater than to begin; and thus repeatedly they conclude that the grace of God is given according to our merits. But if both are God's gifts, and God foreknew that He would give these His gifts (and who can deny this?), predestination must be preached, that God's true grace, that is, the grace which is not given according to our merits, may be maintained with insuperable defence.

Chap. 55.  การนั้น การยืนยันของความถูกต้องของข้อความที่ricula.

And, indeed, in that treatise of which the title is, Of Behueke and Grace, which could not satisfy all my lovers, I think that I have so established that it is the gift of God also to persevere to the end, as I have either never before or almost never so expressly and evidently maintained this in writing, unless my memory deceives me. But I have now said this in a way in which no one before me has said it.

Certainly the blessed Cyprian, in the Lord's Prayer, as I have already shown, so explained our petitions as to say that in its very first petition we were asking for perseverance, asserting that we pray for it when we say, "Hallowed be Thy name," "^ although we have been already hallowed in baptism, â€” so that we may persevere in that which we have begun to be. Let those, however, to whom, in their love for me, I ought not to be ungrateful, who profess that they embrace, over and above that which comes into the argument, all my views, as you write, â€” let those, I say, see whether, in the latter portions of the first book of those two which I wrote in the beginning of my episcopate, before the appearance of the Pelagian heresy, to Simplicianus, the bishop of Milan,\(^\text{1}\) there remained anything whereby it might be called in question that God's grace is not given according to our merits; and whether I have not there sufficiently argued that even the beginning of faith is God's gift; and whether from what is there said it does not by consequence result, although it is not expressed, that even perseverance to the end is not given, except by Him who has predestinated us to His kingdom and glory.' Then, did not I many years before publish the same letter which I had already written to the holy Paulinus,\(^\text{2}\) bishop of Nola, against the Pelagians, which letter they have lately begun to contradict? Let them also look into that letter which I sent to Sixtus, the presbyter of the Eoman Church,\(^\text{3}\) when we contended in a very sharp conflict against the Pelagians, and they will find it such as is that one to Paulinus. Whence they may gather that the same sort of things were already said and written some years ago against the Pelagian heresy and that it is to be wondered at that these should now displease them; although I should wish that no one would so embrace all my views as to follow me, except in those things in which he should see me not to have erred. For I am now writing treatises in which I have undertaken to retract my smaller works, for the purpose of demonstrating that even I myself have not in all things followed myself; but I think that, with God's mercy, I have written progressively, and that I have not begun from perfection; since, indeed, I speak more arrogantly than truly, if even now I say that I have at length in this age of mine arrived at perfection, without any error in what I write. But the difference is in the extent and the subject of an error, and in the facility with which any one corrects it, or the pertinacity with which one endeavours to defend his error. Certainly there is good hope of that man whom the last day of this life shall find so progressing that whatever was wanting to his progress may be added to him, and that he should be adjudged rather to need perfecting than punishment.

Chap. 56. â€” God gives means as well as end.
Wherefore if I am unwilling to appear ungrateful to men who have loved me, because some advantage of my labour has attained to them before they loved me, how much rather am I unwilling to be ungrateful to God, whom we should not love unless He had first loved us and made us to love Him ! since love is of Him,^ as they have said whom He made not only His great lovers, but also His great preachers. And what is more ungrateful than to deny that very grace of God, by saying that it is given to us according to our merits ? And this the Catholic faith shuddered at in the Pelagians, and this it objected to Pelagius himself as a capital crime; and this Pelagius himself condemned, not indeed from love of God's truth, but yet for fear of his own condemnation. And whoever as a faithful Catholic shrinks from saying that the grace of God is given according to our merits, let him not withdraw that very faith of God's grace, whereby he obtained mercy that he should be faithful; and then let him attribute to God's grace the perseverance also to the end, whereby he obtains the mercy which he daily asks for, of not being led into temptation. But between the beginning of faith and the perfection of perseverance there are those means whereby we live righteously, which they themselves are agreed in regarding as given by God to us at the prayer of faith. And all these things â€” the beginning of faith, to Avit, and His other gifts even to the end â€” God foreknew that He would bestow on His called. It is a matter, therefore, of too excessive contentiousness to contradict predestination, or to doubt concerning predestination.

Chap. 57. [xxn.] â€” How predestination must be preached without giving offence.

And yet this doctrine must not be preached to congregations in such a way as to seem to an unskilled multitude, or a people of slower understanding, to be in some measure confuted by that very preaching of it. As, moreover, the foreknowledge of God, which certainly men cannot deny, seems to be refuted if it be said to them, " Whether you run or sleep, you shall be that which He who cannot be deceived has foreknown you to be." And it is the part of a deceitful or an unskilled physician so to compound even a useful medicament, that it either does no good or does harm. But it must

^ 1 John iv. 7.

CHA.P. 59.] DISCUMINATION IN PREACHING. 227
be said, "So run that you may lay hold; and thus by your very running you may know yourselves to be foreknown as those who should run lawfully:" and if in any other manner the foreknowledge of God may be preached, so that the slothfulness of man may be repulsed.

Chap. 58. â€” The doctrine to be applied with discrimination.

Although, therefore, the definite decree of God's will concerning predestination is of such a kind that some from unbelief receive the will to obey, and are converted to the faith or persevere in the faith, while others who abide in the delight of damnable sins, if even they have been predestinated, have not yet arisen, because the aid of pitying grace has not yet lifted them up; â€” for if any are not yet called whom by His grace He has predestinated to be elected, they will receive that grace whereby they may wIU to be elected, and may be so; and if any obey, but have not been predestinated to His kingdom and glory, they are [obedient] for a season, and will not abide in the same obedience to the end; â€” although, therefore, these things are true, yet they must not be said to the multitude of hearers in such a way as that the address may be applied to themselves also, and those words of such may be said to them which you have set down in your letter, and which I have above introduced: "The definite decree of God's will concerning predestination is of such a kind that some of you from unbelief shall receive the will to obey, and come to the faith." What need is there for saying, "Some of you"? For if we speak to God's Church, if we speak to believers, why do we say that "some of them" had come to the faith, and seem to do a wrong to the rest, when we may more fittingly say the definite decree of the will of God concerning predestination is of such a kind that from unbelief you shall receive the will to obey, and come to the end, and shall receive perseverance, and abide in the faith?

Chap. 59. â€” Offence to be avoided.

Neither is what follows by any means to be said, â€” that is, "But others of you who abide in the delight of sins have not yet arisen, because the aid of pitying grace has not yet lifted you up; "when it may be and ought to be well and conveniently said, "But if any of you are still delaying in the delightfulness of damnable sins, lay hold of the most wholesome discipline; and yet when you have done this be not lifted up, as if of your own works, nor boast as if you had not received this. For it is God who worketh in you both to will and to do for His good will,^ and your steps are directed by the Lord, so that you choose His way.^ But of your own good and righteous course, learn carefully that it is attributable to the predestination of divine grace."

Chap. 60. ã€’ The application to the Church in general.

Moreover, what follows where it is said, " But yet if any of you are not yet called, whom by His grace He has predestinated to be called, you shall receive that grace whereby you shall will to be, and be, elected," is said more hardly than it could be said if we consider that we are speaking not to any men in general, but to the Church of Christ. For why is it not rather said thus: " And if any of you are not yet called, let us pray for them that they may be called. For per chance they are so predestinated as to be granted to our prayers, and to receive that grace whereby they may will, and be made elected " ? For God, who fulfilled all that He predestinated, has willed us also to pray for the enemies of the faith, that we might hence understand that He himself also gives to the unbelievers the gift of faith, and makes men willing out of those that were unwilling.

Chap. 61. ã€’ Use of the third person rather than the second.

But now I marvel if any weak brother among the Christian congregation can hear in any way with patience what is connected with these words, when it is said to them, " And if any of you obey, if you are predestinated to be rejected, the power of obeying will be withdrawn from you, that you may cease to obey." For what does saying this seem, except to curse, or in a certain way to predict evils ? But if, however, it is desirable or necessary to say anything concerning are only for a season, and shall not continue in that obedience unto the end "? Is not the same thing said both more truly and more fittingly, so that we may seem not as it were to be desiring so much the evil for them, as to relate it of others, which they hate, and think that it does not belong to them, by hoping and praying for better things? But in that manner in which they think that it must be said, the same judgment may be pronounced almost in the same words also of God's foreknowledge, which certainly they cannot deny, so as to say, "And if any of you obey, if you are foreknown to be rejected you shall cease to obey." Doubtless this is very true, assuredly it is; but it is very monstrous, very inconsiderate, and very unsuitable, not by its false declaration, but by its declaration not wholesome ly applied to the health of human infirmity.

1 Phil. i. 13. - Ò Ps. xxxvii. 23.

Chap. 62. â€” Prayer to be inculcated nevertheless.

But I do not think that that manner which I have said should be adopted in the preaching of predestination ought to be sufficient for him who speaks to the congregation, except he adds this, or something of this kind, saying, "You, therefore, ought also to hope for that perseverance in obedience from the Father of Lights, from whom cometh down every excellent gift and every perfect gift," and to ask for it in your daily prayers; and in doing this ought to trust that you are not aliens from the predestination of His people, because it is He Himself who bestows even the power of doing this. And far be it from you to despair of yourselves, because you are bidden to have your hope in Him, not in yourselves. For cursed is every one who has hope in man; and it is good rather to trust in the Lord than to trust in man, because blessed are all they that trust in Him. Holding this hope, serve the Lord in fear, and rejoice unto Him with trembling. Because no one can be certain of the life eternal which a God who does not lie has promised to the children of promise before the times of eternity, "no one, unless that life of his, which is a state of trial upon the earth, is completed." But He will make us to persevere in Himself unto the end of that life, since we daily say to Him, 'Lead us not into temptation.' When these things and things of this kind are said, whether to few Christians or to the multitude of the Church, why do we fear to preach the predestination of the saints and the true grace of God, "that is, the grace which is not given according to our merits, as the Holy Scripture declares it? Or, indeed, must it be feared that a man should then despair of himself when his hope is shown to be placed in God, and should not rather despair of himself if he should, in his excess of pride and unhappiness, place it in himself?

' Jas. i. 17.

Chap. 63. [xxiii.] â€” The testimony of the whole Church in her prayers.
And I wish that those who are slow and weak of heart, who cannot, or cannot as yet, understand the Scriptures or their explanations, would so hear or not hear in this question our arguments as to consider more carefully their prayers, which the Church has always used and will use, even from its beginnings, until this age shall be completed. For of this matter, which I am now compelled not only to mention, but absolutely to protect and defend against these new heretics, the Church has never been silent in its prayers, although in its discourses it has not thought that it need be put forth, as there was no

'Jas. xvii. 5, "Ps. cxviii. 8. ^Ps. ii. 12.

CHAP. 64.] TENOR OF THE CHURCH'S PRAYERS. 231

adversary compelling it. For when was not prayer made in the Church for unbelievers and its opponents that they should believe? When has any believer had a friend, a neighbour, a wife, who did not believe, and has not asked on their behalf from the Lord for a mind obedient to the Christian faith? And who has there ever been who has not prayed for himself that he might abide in the Lord? And who has dared, not only with his voice, but even in thought, to blame the priest who invokes the Lord on behalf of believers, if at any time he has said, "Give to them, Lord, perseverance in Thee to the end!" and has not rather responded, over such a benediction of his, as well with confessing lips as believing heart, "Amen"?

Since in the Lord's Prayer itself the believers do not pray for anything else, especially when they say that petition, "Lead us not into temptation," save that they may persevere in holy obedience. As, therefore, the Church has both been born and grows and has grown in these prayers, so it has been born and grows and has grown in this faith, by which faith it is believed that God's grace is not given according to the merits of the receivers. Since, indeed, the Church would not pray that faith should be given to unbelievers, unless it believed that God converts the wills of men, both averse from and adverse to Himself. Nor would the Church pray that it might persevere in the faith of Christ, not deceived nor overcome by the temptations of the world, unless it believed that the Lord has our heart in His power, in such wise as that the good which we do not hold save by our own will, we nevertheless do not hold except He worketh in us to will also.

For if the Church indeed asks these things from Him, but thinks that the same things are given to itself by itself, it makes use of prayers which are not true, but perfunctory, â€” which be far from us! For who truly groans, desiring to receive what he prays for from the Lord, if he thinks that he receives it from himself, and not from the Lord?

Chap. 64. â€” In what sense the Holy Spirit solicits for us, crying, Abba, Father.

Especially since "we know not what to pray for as we ought," says the apostle, "but the Spirit Himself maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered; and
He that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because He maketh intercession for the saints according to [the will of] God," \( ^{\wedge} \) " what is " the Spirit Himself maketh intercession," but, " causes to make intercession," " with groanings that cannot be uttered," but " truthful," since the Spirit is truth ? For He it is of whom the apostle says in another place, " God hath sent the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father ! " \( ^{\wedge} \) And here what is the meaning of "crying," but, "making to cry," by that figure of speech whereby we call a day that makes people glad, a glad day ? And this he makes plain elsewhere when he says, " For you have not received the spirit of bondage again in fear, but you have received the Spirit of the adoption of sons, in whom we cry, Abba, Father." \( ^{\wedge} \) He there said, " crying," but here, " in whom we cry; " opening up, that is to say, the meaning with which he said " crying," \( ^{\wedge} \) that is, as I have already explained, " causing to cry," when we understand that this is also itself the gift of God, that with a true heart and spiritually we cry to God. Let them, therefore, observe how they are mistaken who think that our seeking, asking, knocking is of ourselves, and is not given to us; and say that this is the case because grace is preceded by our merits; that it follows them when we ask and receive, and seek and find, and it is opened to us when we knock. And they will not understand that this is also of the divine gift, that we pray; that is, that we ask, seek, and knock. For we have received the spirit of adoption of sons, in which we cry, Abba, Father. And this the blessed Ambrose also said.*

For he says, " To pray to God also is the work of spiritual grace, as it is written. No one says, Jesus is the Lord, but in the Holy Spirit."

Chap. 65. \( ^{\wedge} \) The Church's prayers imply the Church's faith.

These things, therefore, which the Church asks from the Lord, and always has asked from the time she began to exist, God so foreknew that He would give to His called, as He has already given them in predestination itself; as the apostle declares without any ambiguity. For, writing to Timothy, he says, " Labour with the gospel according to the power of God, who saves us, and calls us with His holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the times of eternity, but is now made manifest by the coming of our Saviour Jesus Christ." \( ^{\wedge} \) Let him, therefore, say that the Church at any time has not had in its belief the truth of this predestination and grace, which is now maintained with a more careful heed against the late heretics; let him say this who dares to say that at any time it has not prayed, or not truthfully prayed, as well that unbelievers might believe, as that believers might persevere. And if the Church has always prayed for these benefits, it has always believed them to be certainly God's gifts; nor was it ever right for it to deny that they were foreknown by Him. And thus Christ's Church has never failed to hold the faith of this predestination, which is now being defended with new solicitude against these modern heretics.

Chap. 66. [xxix.]â€”Recapitulation and exhortation.

But what more shall I say? I think that I have taught sufficiently, or rather more than sufficiently, that both the beginning of faith in the Lord, and continuance in the Lord unto all the Lord's gifts. And other good things which pertain to a good life, whereby God is rightly worshipped, even they themselves on whose behalf I am writing this treatise concede to be God's gifts. Further, they cannot deny that God has foreknown all His gifts, and the people on whom He had been about to bestow them. As, therefore, other things must be preached so that he who preaches them may be heard with obedience, so predestination must be preached so that he who hears these things with obedience, may glory not in man, and therefore not in himself, but in the Lord; for this also is God's precept, and to hear this precept with obedience â€” to wit, that he who glories should glory in the Lord â€” in like manner as the rest is God's gift. And he who has not this gift, â€” I shrink not from saying it, â€” whatever others he has, has Jhem in vain. That the Pelagians may have this we pray, and that our own brethren may have it

! more abundantly. ' Let us not, therefore, be prompt in argu-

'Imeuts and indolent in prayers. Let us pray, dearly beloved, let us pray that the God of grace may give even to our enemies, and especially to our brethren and lovers, to understand and confess that after that great and unspeakable destruction wherein we have all fallen in one, no one is delivered save by God's grace, and that that grace is not repaid according to the merits of the receivers as if it were due, but is given freely as true grace, with no merits preceding.

Chap. 67. â€” The most eminent instance of predestination is Christ Jesus.

But there is no more illustrious instance of predestination than Jesus Himself, concerning which also I have already argued in the former treatise; ^ and in the end of this I have chosen to insist upon it. There is no more eminent instance, I say, of predestination than
The Mediator himself. If any believer wishes thoroughly to understand this doctrine, let him consider Him, and in Him he will find himself also. The believer, I say; who in Him believes and confesses the true human nature that is our own, however specially elevated by the taking up of God the Lord into the only Son of God, so that He who undertook, and what He undertook, should be one person in Trinity. For it was not a Quaternity that resulted from the assumption of man, but it remained a Trinity, inasmuch as that assumption ineffably made the truth of one person in God and man. Because we say that Christ was not only God, as the Manichaean heretics contend; nor only man, as the Photinian heretics assert; nor in such wise man as to have less of anything which of a certainty pertains to human nature, “whether a soul, or in the soul itself a rational mind, or flesh, not taken of the woman, but made from the Word converted and changed into flesh, “all which three false and empty notions have made the three various and diverse parties of the Apollinarian heretics; but we say that Christ was true God, born of God the Father without any beginning.

CHAP. 68. — PEEDESTINATION OF CHRIJST. 235

of time; and that He was true or very man, "born of human mother in the certain fulness of time; and that His humanity, Awhereby He is less than the Father, does not diminish aught from His divinity, whereby He is equal to the Father. For both of them are One “are Christ “who, moreover, most truly said in respect of God, " I and the Father are one; " and most truly said in respect of the man, "My Father is greater than I." ^ He, therefore, who made of the seed of David this righteous man, who never should be unrighteous, without any merit of His preceding will, is the same who also makes righteous men of unrighteous, without any merit of their will preceding; that He might be the head, and they His members. He, therefore, who made that man with no precedent merits of His, neither to deduce from His origin nor to commit by His will any sin which should be remitted to Him, the same makes believers on Him with no preceding merits of theirs, to whom He forgives all sin. He who made Him such that He never had or should have an evil will, the same makes in His members a good will out of an evil one. Therefore, He predestinated both Him and us, because both in Him that He might be our head, and in us that we should be His body. He foreknew that our merits would not precede, but that His doings should.

Chap. 68. “Conclusion.

Let those who read this, if they understand, give God thanks, and let those who do not understand, pray that they may have the inward Teacher, from whose presence comes knowledge and understanding. ^ But let those who think that I am in error, consider again and again carefully what is here said, lest perchance they themselves may be mistaken. And when, by means of those who read my writings, I become not only wiser, but even more perfect, I acknowledge God's favour to me; and this I especially look for at the hands of the teachers of the Church, if what I write comes into their hands, and they condescend to acknowledge it.

Then follow four books which I wrote to Boniface, bishop of the Eoman Church, in opposition to two letters of the Pelagians, because when they came into his hands he had sent them to me, finding in them an artful mention of my name. BOOK I.

AUGUSTINE REPLIES TO A LETTER SENT BY JULIAN, AS IT WAS SAID, TO ROME; AND FIRST OF ALL VINDICATES THE CATHOLIC DOCTRINE FROM HIS CALUMNIES; THEN DISCOVERS AND CONFUTES THE HERETICAL SENSE OF THE PELAGIANS HIDDEN IN THAT PROFESSION OF FAITH WHICH THE AUTHOR OF THE LETTER OPPOSED TO THE CATHOLICS.

Chap. 1. â€” Introduction.

I HAD indeed known you by the very frequent announcement of fame; and by very numerous and veracious messengers I had learned how you were filled with the grace of God, most blessed and venerable Pope Boniface! But after my brother Alypius saw you even in bodily presence, and, being received by you with all kindness and sincerity, enjoyed at the bidding of affection conversations with you, and living with you, and, although only for a short time, united with you in earnest affection, poured out to your mind both himself and me, and brought back you also to me in his mind, the more assured was your friendship, the greater became in me the conviction of your holiness. For you, who mind not high things, however loftily you are placed, did not disdain to be a friend of the lowly, and to return the love bestowed upon you. For what else is Friendship [cimicitia], which has its name from no other source than love [amore], AND IS NOWHERE FAITHFUL BUT IN Christ, in whom alone it can be as well eternal as happy? Whence, also, having received a greater assurance by means of that brother, through whom I have learned to know you more familiarly, I have ventured to write something to your blessedness concerning those things which at this juncture are claiming by a later stimulus the episcopal attention to vigilance, as far as we are able, on behalf of the Lord's flock.

Chap. 2. â€” Why heretical writings must he answered.

For later heretics, enemies of the grace of God, which is given by Jesus Christ our Lord to small and great, although they are already shown as needing more openly to be avoided by a manifest disapprobation, still do not cease by their writings to try the hearts of the less cautious and less learned. And these must certainly be answered, lest they should confirm themselves or their friends in that wicked error; even if we were not afraid that they might deceive any of the Catholics by their plausible discourse. But since they do not cease to growl at the entrances to the Lord's fold, and from every side to tear open approaches with a view to tear in pieces the sheep redeemed at such a price; and since the pastoral watch-tower is common to all of us who discharge the office of the episcopate (altho_ugh^j`ouâ€žarfi,..prQittuaÂ£Jit therein on a loftier height), I do what I can in respect of my small portion of the charge, as the Lord condescends by the aid of your prayers to grant me power, to oppose to their pestilent and crafty writings, healing and defensive writings, so that the madness with which they are raging may either itself be cured, or may be prevented from hurting others.

Chap. 3. â€” Why he addresses his book to Boniface.

But these words which I am answering to their two letters, â€” the one, to wit, which Julian is said to have sent to Rome, that by its means, as I believe, he might find or make as many allies as he could; and the other, which eighteen so-called bishops, sharers in his error, dared to write to Thessalonica, not to any body in general, but to the bishop of that very place, with a view of tempting him by his craftiness and bringing him over, if it could be done, to his views; â€” these words which, as I said, I am writing in answer to those two letters of theirs in respect of that argument, I have determined to address especially to your sanctity, not so much for your learning as for your examination, and, if perchance anything should displease you, for your correction. For my brother intimated to me that you yourself condescended to give those letters to him, which could not come into your hands except by the most watchful diligence of my brethren, your sons. And I thank your most sincere kindness to me that you have been unwilling that those letters of the enemies of God's grace should be hidden from me, seeing that in them you have found my name calumniously as well as plainly expressed. But I hope from my Lord God that not without the reward which is in heaven do they tear me with their scurrilous teeth to whom I oppose myself on behalf of the little ones, that they may not be left to be destroyed to the deceitful flatterer Pelagius, but may be presented to be delivered to the truthful Saviour Christ.

Chap. i. [ii.] â€” The calumny of Julian concerning the free-will in us taken away by Adam's sin. 21ie Pelagians, as formerly Jovinian, call the Catholics Manichceans.

Let us now, therefore, reply to Julian's letter. " Those Manichseans say," says he, " with whom now we do not communicate, â€” that is, the whole of them with whom we differ, â€” that by the sin of the first man, that is, of Adam, free-will perished; and that no one has now the power of living well, but that all are constrained to sin by the necessity of their flesh." He calls the Catholics Manicheans, after the manner of that Jovinian who a few years ago, as a new heretic, destroyed the virginity of the blessed Mary, and placed the marriage of the faithful on the same level as her sacred virginity. And he did not object this to the Catholics on any other ground than that he wished them to seem to be either accusers or condemners of marriage.

Chap. 5. â€” Free choice did not perish with Adam's sin. What freedom did perish.

But by defending free-will they are hastening to a confidence rather in doing righteousness of free-will than of God's aid, and so that every one may glory in himself, and not in the Lord. For which of us can say that by the sin of the first man free-will perished from the human race? Through sin liberty indeed perished, but it was that liberty which has in Paradise, of having a full righteousness with immortality; on account of which loss human nature is without divine grace, since the Lord says, "If the Son shall make you free, then shall ye be free indeed" certainly free to live well and righteously. For free-will did not so far perish in the sinner, but that by it all sin, especially they who sin with delight and with love of sin; they will what pleases them. Whence also the apostle says, "When ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness." Behold, they are shown to have been by no means able to serve sin except by the grace of the Saviour. For which reason the admirable Teacher also distinguished these very words: "For when ye were the servants," says he, "of sin, ye were free from righteousness." He called them free from righteousness, not freed; but from sin not free, lest they should attribute this to themselves; but most watchfully he preferred to say made free, referring this to that declaration of the Lord, "If the Son shall make you free, then shall ye be free indeed." Since, then, the sons of men do not live well unless they are made the sons of God, what is this but that He wills to give the power of good living to free-will, since this power is not given save by God's grace through Jesus Christ our Lord, as the gospel says: "And as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God." 1

CHAP. G.] TO RECEIVE CHRIST IS TO BELIEVE ON HIM. 241

Chap. 6. [m.] â€” Grace is not given according to merits.

But lest perchance they say that they are aided to the result of having power to become the sons of God, but that in order to deserve to receive this power they have first received Him by free-will with no assistance of grace, because this is the purpose of their endeavour to destroy grace, that they may contend that it is given according to our deservings; lest perchance, then, they so divide that evangelical statement as to refer merit to that portion of it wherein it is said, " But as many as received Him," and then say that in that which follows, grace is not given freely, but is repaid to this merit, " He gave them power to become the sons of God;" if it is asked of them what is the meaning of " received Him," will they say anything else than " believed on Him"? And in order, therefore, that they may know that this also pertains to grace, let them read what the apostle says: " And that ye be in nothing terrified by your adversaries, which indeed is to them a cause of perdition, but of your salvation, and that of God; for unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake."^ Certainly he said that both were given. Let them read what he said also:

" Peace be to the brethren, and love, with faith from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ."^ Let them also read what the Lord Himself says: " No man can come to me, except the Father who hath sent me shall draw him."^ Where, lest any one should suppose that anything else is said in the words " come to me " than " believe in me," a little after, when He was speaking of His body and blood, and many were offended at His discourse, He says, " The words which I have spoken unto you are spirit and life; but there are some of you which believe not."^ Then the Evangelist added, " For Jesus knew from the beginning who they were that believed, and who should betray Him. And He said. Therefore I said unto you that no man can come unto me except it were given him of my Father." Â® He repeated, to wit, the saying in which He had said, " No man can- come unto me, except the Father who hath sent me shall draw him." And He declared that He said this for the sake of believers and unbelievers, explaining what He had said, " except the Father who hath sent me shall draw him," by repeating the very same thing in other words in that which He said, " except it were given him of my Father." Because he is drawn to Christ to whom it is given to believe on Christ. Therefore the power is given that they who believe on Him should become the sons of God, since this very thing is given, that they believe on Him. And unless this power be given from God, of freewill there can be none, because it will not be free in good if the deliverer have not made it free; but in evil he has a free-will in whom a deceiver, either secret or manifest, has grafted the love of wickedness, or he himself has persuaded himself of it.

Chap. 7. â€” He concludes that he does not deprive the wicked of free-will.

It is not, therefore, true, as some affirm that we say, and as that correspondent of yours ventures moreover to write, that " all are forced into sin," as if unwillingly, " by the necessity of their flesh;" but if they are already of the age to use the ce of their own flesh they are retained in sin by their own will, and by their own will are hurried along from sin to sin. For even he who persuades and deceives does not act in them, except that they may commit sin by their will, either by ignorance of the truth or by delight in iniquity, or by both evils, â€” as well of blindness as of weakness. But this will, which is free in evil because it takes pleasure in evil, is not free in good, for the reason that it has not been made free. Nor can a man will any good thing unless he is aided by Him who cannot will evil, â€” that is, by the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. For "everything which is not of faith is sin."^ And thus the good will which withdraws itself from sin is faithful, because the just by faith lives.^ And it pertains to faith to believe on Christ. And no man can believe on Christ â€” that is, come to Him â€” unless it be given to him.^ No man, therefore, can have a righteous will, unless, with no foregoing merits, lie has received the true, that is, the gratuitous grace from above.

Chap. 8. [iv.] â€” The Pelagians demolish free-will.

These proud and haughty people will not have this; and yet they do not maintain free-will by purifying it, but demolish it by exaggerating it. For they are angry with us who say these things, for no other reason than that they disdain to glory in the Lord. Yet Pelagius feared the episcopal judgment of Palestine; and when it was objected to him that he said that the grace of God is given according to our merits, he denied that he said so, and condemned those who said this with an anathema. And yet nothing else is found to be defended in the books which he afterwards wrote, thinking that he had put a deceit upon the men who were his judges, by lying or by hiding his meaning, I know not how, in ambiguous words.

Chap. 9. [v.] â€” Another calumny of Julian, that it is said that marriage is not appointed by God.

But now let us see what follows. "They say also," he says, "that those marriages which are now celebrated were not appointed by God, which is read in Augustine's book,^ against which I replied in four pamphlets. And the words of this Augustine our enemies have taken up by way of hostility to the truth." To these most calumnious words I see that a brief answer must be made, because he repeats them afterwards when he himself wishes to insinuate that such men as they could say anything against my words. On that point, with God's assistance, I must contend with him as far as the matter shall seem to demand. Now, therefore, I reply that marriage was ordained by God both then, when it was said, "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be two in one flesh," ^ and now, in respect of what is written, " A woman is joined to a man by the Lord."^ For nothing else is even now done than that a man cleave to his wife, and they become two in one flesh. Because concerning that very marriage which is now contracted, the Lord was consulted by the Jews whether it was lawful for any cause to put away a wife.

And to the testimony of the law on that occasion mentioned, He added, "What, therefore, God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."^ The Apostle Paul also applied this witness of the law when he admonished husbands that their wives should be loved by them.^ Away, then, with the notion that in my book that man should read anything opposed to these divine testimonies ! But either from not understanding, or rather by calumniating, he seeks to twist what he reads into another meaning. But I wrote my book, against which he mentions that he replied in four pamphlets, after the condemnation of Pelagius and Coelestius. And this, I have thought, must be said, because that man avers that my words had been taken up by his enemies in hostility to the truth, lest any one should think that these new heretics were condemned as enemies of the grace of Christ on account of this book of mine. But in that book is found the defence rather than the censure of marriage.

Chap. 10. â€” The third calumny, â€” the assertion that conjugal intercourse is condemned.

" They say also," says he, " that sexual desire and the intercourse of married people were devised by the devil, and that therefore those who are born innocent are guilty, and that it is the work of the devil, not of God, that they are born of this diabolical intercourse. And this, without any ambiguity, is Manichseism." Nay, as I say that marriage was appointed by God for the sake of the ordinance of the begetting of children, so I say that the propagation of children to be begotten could not have taken place without sexual desire, and without intercourse of husband and wife, even in Paradise, if children were begotten there. But whether such desire and intercourse would have existed, as is now the case with shameful lust, if no one had sinned, here is the question concerning which I shall argue hereafter, if God will.

CHAP. 12.] CONJUGAL INTERCOUSE NOT DIABOLICAL. 245

Chap. 11. [vi.] â€” The purpose of the Pelagians in praising the innocence of conjugal intercourse.

Yet what it is they wish, what they purpose, to what result they are striving to bring the matter, the words that are added by that writer declare, when he asserts that I say, " that therefore they who are born innocent are guilty, and that it is the work of the devil, not of God, that they are born of this diabolical intercourse." Since, therefore, I neither say that this intercourse of husband and wife is diabolical, especially in the case of believers, which is effected for the sake of generating children who are afterwards to be regenerated; nor that any men are made by the devil, but, inasmuch as they are men, by God; and nevertheless that even of believing husband and wife are born guilty persons, as if a wild olive were produced from an olive, on account of original sin, and on this account are under the devil unless they are born again in Christ, because the devil is the author of the fault, not of the nature; what, on the other hand, are they labouring to bring about who say that infants inherit no original sin, and therefore are not under the devil, except that that grace of God in infants may be made of no effect, by which He has plucked us out, as the apostle says, from the power of darkness, and has translated us into the kingdom of the Son of His love ? ^ [vii.] â€” When, indeed, they deny that infants are in the power of darkness even before the help of the Lord the deliverer, they are in such Mdse praising in them the Creator's work as to destroy the mercy of the Eedeemer. And because I confess this both in grown-up people and in infants, he says that this is without any ambiguity Manichseism, although it is the most ancient Catholic dogma by which the new heretical dogma of these^in fs overturned. ~
Chap. 12. â€” The fourth calumny, â€” that the saints of the Old Testament are said to he not free from sins.

"They say," says he, "that the saints in the Old Testament were not without sins, â€” that is, that even by correction they were not free from crimes, but in their guilt they were seized by death." Nay, I say that either before the law, or in the time of the Old Testament, they were delivered from sins, â€” not 1 Cor. i. 13.

by their own power, because "cursed is every one that hath put his hope in man/ ^ and without any doubt they are under this curse whom also the sacred Psalm notifies, "who trust in their own strength; " ^ nor by the old covenant which gendereth to bondage,^ although it was divinely given by the grace of a sure dispensation; nor by that law itself, holy and just and good as it was, where it is written, "Thou shalt not covet," * since it was not given as being able to give life, but it was added for the sake of transgression until the seed should come to whom the promise was made; but [I say] that they were delivered by the blood of the Redeemer Himself, who is the one Mediator of God and man, the man Christ Jesus. But those enemies of the grace of God, which is given to small and great through Jesus Christ our Lord, say that the men of God of old were of a perfect righteousness, lest they should be supposed to have needed the incarnation, the passion, and resurrection of Christ, by the belief of whom they were saved.

Chap. 13. [viii.] â€” The fifth calumny, â€” that it is said that Paul and the rest of the apostles were polluted by lust.

He says, "They affirm that even the Apostle Paul, even all the apostles, were polluted by immoderate lust." What man, however profane he may be, would dare to say this? But doubtless this man thus misrepresents because they contend that what the apostle said, "I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing, for to will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good I find not," ^ and other such things, he said not of himself, but that he introduced the person of somebody else, I know not who, who was suffering these things. Wherefore that passage in his epistle must be carefully considered and investigated, that their error may not lurk in any obscurity of his. Although, therefore, the apostle is here arguing broadly, and with great and lasting conflict maintaining grace against those who were boasting in the law, yet we do come upon a few matters which pertain to the matter in hand. On which subject he says: "Because by the law there shall no flesh be justified in His sight.
For by the law is the knowledge of sin. But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets, even the righteousness of God by the faith of Jesus Christ unto all them that believe. For there is no difference. For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God, being justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." ^ And again: "Where is boasting? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? No; but by the law of faith. Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law." ^ And again: "For the promise that he should be the heir of the world was not to Abraham or to his seed through the law, but by the righteousness of faith. For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect. Because the law worketh wrath, for where no law is there is no transgression." And in another place: "Moreover, the law entered that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded grace did much more abound." * In stUl another place: "For sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under the law, but under grace." ^ And again in another place: "Know ye not, brethren (for I speak to them that know the law), that the law hath dominion over a man so long as he liveth? For the woman which is under a husband is joined to her husband by the law so long as he liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is freed from the law of her husband." ^ And a little after: "Therefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ, that ye should belong to another, who has risen from the dead that we should bring forth fruit unto God. For when we were in the flesh the passions of sins which are by the law did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death, but now we are delivered from the law of death in which we were held, so that we may serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter." ^ With these and such like testimonies that teacher of the heathen showed with sufficient evidence that the law could not take away sin, but rather increased it, and that grace takes it away; since the law

* Ex. XX. 7. * Eom. vii. IS.

CHAP. 13.] THE RELATION OF LAW TO SIN. 247

knew liow to command, to which command weakness gives way, while grace knows to assist, whereby love is infused.
And lest any one, on account of these testimonies, should reproach the law, and contend that it is evil, the apostle, seeing what might occur to those who ill understand it, himself proposed to himself the same question. "What shall we say, then?" said he. "Is the law sin? Far from it. But I did not know sin except by the law." He had already said before, "For by the law is the knowledge of sin." It is not, therefore, the taking away, but the knowledge of sin.

Chap. 14. â€” That the apostle is speaking in his own person and that of others who are under grace, not still under law.

And from this point he now begins the matter on account of which I undertook the consideration of these things, to introduce his own person, and, as it were, to speak about himself; where the Pelagians will not have it that the apostle himself is to be understood, but say that he has transfigured another person into himself, â€” that is, a man placed still under the law, not yet delivered by grace. And here, indeed, they ought at least to concede that in law no one is justified, as the same apostle says elsewhere;
but that the law is of force for the knowledge of sin, and for the transgression of the law itself, so that sin, being known and increased, grace may be sought for through faith. But they do not fear that those things should be understood concerning the apostle which he might also say concerning his past doings, but they fear those things which follow. For here he says:
"I had not known lust if the law had not said. Thou shalt not covet. But the occasion being taken, sin wrought in me by the commandment aU manner of lust. For without the law sin was dead. But I was alive without the law once, but when the commandment came sin revived, and I died, and the commandment which was for life was found to me to be death. For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it slew me. Therefore the law indeed is holy, and the commandment holy, just, and good. Was, then, that which is good made death unto me? By no means. But sin, that it might appear sin, worked death to me by that which is good† that

CHAP. 15.] THE WILL MUST BE CONFORMED TO THE LA.

the sinner or the sin might become by the commandment excessive." All these things, as I have said, the apostle may seem to have mentioned from his past life: as in respect of that which he says, "For I was alive without the law once," he may have wished his first age from infancy to be understood, before the years of reason; but when he added, "But when the commandment came, sin revived, but I died," he would fain show himself capable of the commandment, but not a doer of it, and therefore a transgressor of the law.

Chap. 15. [ix.] â€” He sins vnth his will who is only deterred from sinning by fear.

Nor let us be disturbed by what he wrote to the Philippians:
"Touching the righteousness which is in the law, one who is without blame." For he might have been within in evil affections a transgressor of the law, and yet fulfil the manifest works of the law, either by the fear of men or of God Himself; but by the terror of punishment, not by the love and by the delight of righteousness. For it is one thing to do good with the good will of doing good, and another thing to be so inclined by one's will to do evil, that one would even do it if it could be allowed without punishment. For thus assuredly he is sinning within in his will itself, who abstains from sin not by good will but by fear. And in these his internal affections, the apostle, knowing himself to have been such before the grace of God which is through Jesus Christ our Lord, elsewhere confesses this very plainly. For writing to the Ephesians, he says: "And you, though ye were dead in your trespasses and sins, wherein sometime ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, that spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience, in whom also we at one time had our conversation in the lusts of our flesh, doing the will of our flesh and our affections, and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others also. But God, who is rich in mercy, for His great love wherewith He loved us even when we were dead in sins, quickened us together with Christ, by whose grace we are saved." Again to Titus he says: "For we ourselves also were sometime foolish and unbelieving, erring, serving various lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and holding one another in hatred." Such was Saul when he says that he was, touching the righteousness which is in the law, without reproach. For since he had not profited in the law, and changed his character so as to be without reproach after this hateful life, he plainly shows to them what follows, when he says that he was not changed from these evils except by the grace of the Saviour. For adding also this very thing, here as well as to the Ephesians, he says: "But when the kindness and love of God our Saviour shone forth, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and of the renewal of the Holy Spirit, whom He shed on us most abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour, that being justified by His grace we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

Chap. 16. How sin died, and how it revived.
And what he says in that passage of the Epistle to the Romans, "Sin, that it might appear sin, wrought death to me by that which is good,"^ agrees with the former passages where he said, "But I had not known sin but by the law, for I had not known lust unless the law had said. Thou shalt not covet." * And previously, "By the law is the knowledge of sin," for he said this also here, "that it might appear sin;"

that we might not understand what he had said, "For without law sin was dead," except in the sense of being hidden as if it were not, â€” it does not appear, it is completely ignored, as if it were buried in I know not what darkness of ignorance.

And in that he says, "And I was alive once without the law," what does he say except, I seemed to myself to live? And with respect to what he added, "But when the commandment came sin revived," what else is it but sin shone forth, became apparent? Nor yet does he say lived, but revived. For it had lived formerly in Paradise, where it appeared sufficiently admitted in opposition to the given command; but when it is inherited by children coming into the world, it lies concealed, as if it were dead, until its evil, resisting righteousness, is felt by its prohibition. When one thing is commanded and approved, another thing delights and rules, then in some measure sin revives in the knowledge of the man that is born, although it had lived already for some time in the knowledge of the man as at first made.

Chap. 17, [s.] â€” "The law is spiritual, but I am carnal," to be understood of Paul.

But it is not so clear how what follows can be understood concerning Paul, "For we know," says he, "that the law is spiritual, but I am carnal." ^ He does not say, "I was," but, "I am." Was, then, the apostle when he wrote this carnal? or does he say this with respect to his body? For he was still in the body of this death, not yet made what he speaks of elsewhere: "It is sown an animal body, it shall be raised a spiritual body." ^ For then, of the whole of himself, that is, of both parts of which he consists, he shall be a spiritual man, when even the body shall be spiritual. For it is not absurd that in that life even the flesh should be spiritual, if in this life in those who still mind earthly things even the spirit itself may be carnal. Thus, then, he said, "But I am carnal," because the apostle had not yet a spiritual body, as he might say, But I am mortal, which assuredly he could not be understood to have said except in respect of his body, which had not yet been clothed with immortality. Moreover, in reference to what he added, "sold under sin," ^ lest any one think that he was not yet redeemed by the blood of Christ, this also may be understood in respect of that which he says: "And we ourselves, having the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." * For if in this respect he says that he was sold under sin, that as yet his body has not been redeemed from corruption, or that it was sold once in the first transgression of the commandment so as to have a corruptible body which drags down the soul, what hinders the apostle here from being understood to say about himself that which he says in such wise that it may be understood also in himself, even if in his person he wishes not himself alone, but all, to be received who had known themselves as struggling, without consent, in spiritual delight with the affection of the flesh ?

Chap. 18. â€” How the apostle said that he did the evil that he would not.

Or by chance do we fear what follows, " For that which I do I know not, for what I will I do not, but what I hate that I do," lest perhaps of these words any one should suspect that the apostle is consenting to the evil works of the lust of the flesh ? But we must consider what he adds: " But if I do that which I will not, I consent to the law that it is good." For he says that he rather consents to the law than to the lust of the flesh, because this he calls by the name of sin. Therefore he said that he acted and laboured not with the desire of consenting and fulfilling, but by the very impulse of lusting. Hence, then, he says, " I consent to the law that it is good." I consent because I do not will what it does not will. Afterwards he says, " Now, then, it is no more I that do it, but sin which dwelleth in me." ^ What does he mean by " now then," but, now at length, under the grace which has delivered the delight of my will from the consent of lust ? For, " it is not I that do it," cannot be better understood than that he does not consent to set forth his members instruments of unrighteousness unto sin. For if he lusts and consents and acts, how can he be said not to do a thing himself, even although he may grieve that he does it, and deeply groan at being overcome ?

Chap. 19. â€” What it is to accomplish what is good.

And now does he not most plainly show whence he says what follows, " For I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing " ? ^ For if he did not explain what he said by the addition of " that is, in my flesh," it might, perchance, be otherwise understood when he said, " in me." And thus he reflects as he repeats the same thing, and urges,
"For to will is present with me, but to perform that which is good is not." * For this is to perform that which is good, that a man should not even desire [otherwise]. For the good is incomplete when one lusts, even although a man does not consent to the evil of lust. " For the good that I would," says he, " I do not; but the evil that I would not, that I do. Now, if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me." ^ This he repeated impressively, and as it were to stir up the most slothful from slumber. " I find then a law," said he, " that when I would do good, evil is present with me." ^ That law, then, is present to one who would do good, while evil is present from lust, and he does not consent to this who says, " It is no longer I that do it."

Chap. 20. â€” In me, that is, in my flesh.

And he declares both more plainly in what follows: " For I delight in the law of God after the inward man; but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity in the law of sin which is in my members." ^ But in that he said, " bringing me into captivity," he can move if there is no consent. Whence, in respect of those three things, two, to wit, of which we have already argued, that he says, " But I am carnal, and sold under sin," and this third, " Bringing me into captivity in the law of sin, which is in my members," the apostle seems to be describing a man who is still living under the law, and is not yet under grace. But in that I have expounded the former two sayings in respect of the flesh still corruptible, so also this latter may be understood as if he had said, " bringing me into captivity," in the flesh, not in the mind; in movement, not by consent; and bringing me into captivity, because even in the flesh itself it is our own nature, not an alien one. As, therefore, he himself expounded what he had said, "For I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing," so also now out of the exposition of that we ought to learn the meaning of this passage, as if he had said, " Bringing me into captivity," that is, my flesh, " in the law of sin, which is in my members."

Chap. 21. â€” No condemnation in Christ Jesus.
Then he adds the reason why he said all these things: "

' Rom. vii. 20. ^ ^Mm. vii. 21. 3 Rom, yji^ 21, 22.

wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? The grace of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord! " And thence he concludes: " Therefore I myself with the mind serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin." ^ To wit, " with the flesh, the law of sin," by lusting; but " with the mind, the law of God," by not consenting to that lust: " For there is now no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus." ^ For he is not condemned who does not consent to the evil of the lust of the flesh. "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has made thee free from the law of sin and death, lest, to wit, the lust of the flesh should claim for itself thy consent." And what follows plainly more and more manifests the same meaning. But moderation must be used.

Chap. 22. â€“ Wht/ the passage referred to must he understood of a man established under grace.

\ And it had once appeared to me also that the apostle was , in this argument of his describing a man under the law. But \ afterwards I was constrained to give up the idea by those â€“ words where he says, " Now, then, it is no more I that do it."

For to this pertains what he says subsequently also: " There is, therefore, now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." And because I do not see how a man under the law should say, " I delight in the law of God after the inward man," since that very delight in good, by which, moreover, he does not consent to evil, not from fear of penalty, but from love of righteousness (for this is meant by " delighting "), can only be attributed to grace.

Chap. 28. [xi.] â€“ What it is to be delivered from the body of this death.

For when he says also, " Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" ^ who can deny that when the apostle said this he was still in the body of this death? And certainly the wicked are not delivered from this, to whom the same bodies are made eternal for the purpose of torment. Therefore, to be delivered from the body of this death is to be healed of all the weakness of the lust of the flesh, and to receive the body, not for penalty, but for glory. With this passage also those words are sufficiently in harmony: "Our selves also, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even "we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption â€” to wit, the redemption â€” of our body." For surely we groan with that groaning wherein we say, "wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" That also where he says, "For what I do, I know not;" what else is it than: I will not, I do not approve, I do not consent, I do not do? Otherwise it is contrary to what he said above, "By the law is the knowledge of sin," and, "I had not known sin but by the law," and, "Sin, that it might appear sin, worked death in me by that which is good." For how did he know sin, of which he was ignorant, by the law? How does sin appear which is not known? Therefore it is then said, I know not, I do not, because I myself commit that with no consent of mine, in the way in which the Lord will say to the wicked, "I know you not," — although, beyond a doubt, nothing can be hid from Him; and as it is said, "Him who had not known sin," which means who had not done sin, for He had not known what He condemned.

Chap. 24. â€” He concludes that the apostle spoke in his own person, and that of those who are under grace.

On the careful consideration of these things, and things of the same kind in the context of that apostolical Scripture, the apostle is rightly understood not, indeed, to have signified himself alone in his own person, but others also established under grace; and with himself, those who are not yet established in that perfect peace in which death shall be swallowed up in victory, of which he afterwards says, "But if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness.

H, then, the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwelleth in you. He that raised up Jesus from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth Therefore, our mortal bodies being quickened, not only will there be no consent to sinning, but not even the lust of the flesh itself, to which there is no consent, will remain. Not to have the resistance to the spirit of this in the mortal flesh was only possible to Him who came not by the flesh into humanity. And that the apostles, because they were men, and carried about in the mortality of this life a body which is corrupted and weighs down the soul, were, therefore, always polluted with excessive lust, as that man injuriously affirms, be it far from me to say. But I say that they were free from the consent of depraved lusts, but that they still groaned concerning the lust of the flesh, which they bridled by restraint with such humility and piety, that they desired rather not to have it than to overcome it.

Chap. 25. [xii.] â€” The sixth calumny, â€” that I assert that even Christ was not free from sins.

In like manner as to what he added, that I say, "that Christ even was not free from sins, but that, from the necessity of the flesh, he spoke falsely, and was stained with other faults," he should see from whom he heard these things, or in whose letters he read them; for that, indeed, he perchance did not understand them, and turned them by the deceitfulness of malice into calumnious meanings.

Chap. 26. [xiii.] â€” The seventh calumny, â€” that I assert that in baptism all sins are not remitted.

"They also say," says he, "that baptism does not give remission of all sins, nor take away crimes, but that it smooths them over, so that the roots of all sins are kept in an evil flesh." Who but an unbeliever can affirm this against the Pelagians? I say, therefore, that baptism gives all remission of sins, and takes away guilt, and does not trim them off in such wise that the roots of all sins may be preserved in an evil flesh, as if of hair trimmed on the head, whence the sins cut down may grow again. For it was I that found out that similitude for them to use for the purposes of their calumny, as if I thought and said this.

Chap. 27. â€” In what sense lust is called sin in the regenerate.
But concerning that lust of the flesh of which they speak, I believe that they are deceived, or that they deceive; for 1 Wisd, ix. 15.

CHAP. 2.:] CONCUPISCENCE IS NOT SIN. 25 Y

with this even he that is baptized must struggle with a pious mind, however carefully he profits and is led by the Spirit of God. But even if this is called sin, it is certainly so called not because it is sin, but because it is done by sin, as a writing is said to be the hand of anybody because the hand has written it. But they are sins which are done unlawfully, and spoken and thought according to the lust of the flesh, or in ignorance â€” things which, once done, keep their doers guilty if they are not forgiven. And that very lust of the flesh is in such wise put away in baptism, that although it is inherited by all that are born, it in no respect hurts those that are born anew. And yet from these, if they carnally beget children, it is again derived; and again it will be hurtful to those that are born, unless by the same form it is remitted to them as being born again, and remains in them in no way hindering the future life, because its guilt, derived by generation, has been put away by regeneration; and thus it is now no more sin, but is called so, whether that it became what it is by sin, or that it is stirred by the delight of sinning, although by the conquest of the delight of righteousness consent is not given to it.

Nor is it on account of that lust, whose guilt has already been taken away in the laver of regeneration, that the baptized people say in their prayer, " Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors;" ^ but on account of sins which are committed, whether in the consentings of lust, when what is right is overcome by that which pleases, or when by ignorance evil is accepted as if it were good. And they are done, whether by acting, or by speaking, or â€” and this is the easiest and the quickest â€” by thinking. From all which things what believer ever will boast that he has his heart pure? or who will boasts that he is pure from sin? " Certainly that which follows in the prayer is said with respect to this very lust:

" Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." " For every one," as it is written, "is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed; then, when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin." "

XV.

258 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. 29.
Chap. 28. [xiv.] Many without crime, none without sin.

All these products of lust, and the old guilt of lust itself, are put away by the washing of baptism. And whatever that lust now begets, if they are not those products which are called not only sins, but moreover crimes, are purified by that method of daily prayer when we say, "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive," and by the sincerity of almsgiving. For no one is so foolish as to say that that precept of our Lord does not refer to baptized people: "Forgive and it shall be forgiven you, give and it shall be given you." ^ But none could rightly be ordained a minister in the Church if the apostle had said, "If any is without sin," where he says, "If any is without crime;" ^ or if he had said, "Having no sin," where he says, "Having no crime." ^ Because many baptized believers are without crime, but I should say that no one in this life is without sin, â€” with whatever madness the Pelagians are inflated, and burst asunder against me because I say this: not because there remains anything of sin which is not remitted in baptism; but because by us who remain in the weakness of this life such sins do not cease daily to be committed, as are daily remitted to those who pray in faith and work in mercy. This is the soundness of the Catholic faith, which the Holy Spirit everywhere sows, â€” not the vanity and presumption of spirit of heretical pravity.

Chap. 29. [xv.] Julian opposes the faith of his friends to the opinions of Catholic believers. First of all, of free-will.

Now therefore let us see, concerning the rest, in what way â€” after thinking that he might maliciously object against me what I believe, and feign what I do not believe â€” he himself professes his own faith or that of the Pelagians. "In opposition to these things," he says, "we daily argue, and we are unwilling to yield our consent to transgressors, because we say that free-will is in all by nature, and that men could not perish by the sin of Adam; which assertion is confirmed by the authority of all Scriptures." This, if in any degree it is necessary to say, you should not say against the grace of God, â€” you should not give your consent to transgressors, but you should correct your opinion. But about this, as much as I could, and as far as it seemed to be sufficient, I have argued above.

Chap. 30. “Secondly, of marriage.

"We say," says he, "that that marriage which is now celebrated throughout the earth was ordained by God, and that married people are not guilty, but that fornicators and adulterers are to be condemned." This is true and catholic doctrine; but what you want to gather from this, to wit, that from the intercourse of male and female those who are born derive no sin to be put away by the laver of regeneration, this is false and heretical.

"We say," says he, "that the sexual impulse — that is, that the desire of procreation itself, without which there can be no intercourse — is ordained by God." To this I reply that the sexual impulse, and, to make use of the word, the desire of procreation, without which there can be no intercourse, was in such wise appointed by God that there was in it nothing to be ashamed of, for it was not fit that His creature should blush at the work of His Creator; but by a just punishment the disobedience of the members was the retribution to the disobedience of the first man, for which disobedience they blushed when they covered with fig leaves those shameful parts which previously were not shameful.

Chap. 32. [xvi.] “The girdles which Adam and Eve wore.

For they did not use for themselves tunics to cover their whole bodies after their sin, but aprons, which some of the less careful of our interpreters have interpreted as coverings. And this indeed is true; but covering is a general name, by which may be understood every kind of clothing and veil. And ambiguity ought to be avoided, so that, as the Greek called them Trepição/xara, by which only the shameful parts of the body are covered, so also the Latin should either use the Greek word itself, because now custom has come to use it instead of the Latin, or, as some do, use the word [mccinctoria] aprons, 260 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. S3.

’or, as others have better named them, [campestria] wrestling girdles. Because this name is taken from that ancient Eoman custom whereby the youth covered their shameful parts when they were exercised naked in the field; whence even at this day they are called [campestrati] clad with the campestre, or wrestling apron, with which they cover and bind those members. Although, if those members by which sin was committed had been to be covered after the sin, men ought not to have been clothed in tunics, but to have covered their hand and mouth, because they sinned by taking and eating. What, then, is the meaning, when the prohibited food was taken, and the transgression of the precept had been committed, of the look turned towards those members? What unknown novelty is felt there, and compels itself to be noticed, which is signified by the opening of the eyes? For their eyes were not closed, either when Adam gave names to the cattle and birds, or when Eve saw the trees to be beautiful and good; but they were made open — that is, attentive — to consider; as it is written of Agar, the handmaid of Sarah, that she opened her eyes and saw a well, although she certainly had not had them closed before. As, therefore, of their nakedness, which they were daily in the habit of looking upon, and were not confused by it, they were so suddenly ashamed that they could now no longer bear those members naked, but immediately took care to cover them; did not they — he in the open movement, she in the secret impulse — perceive those members to be disobedient to the choice of their will, which certainly they ought to have ruled like the rest by their will and pleasure? And this they deservedly suffered, because they themselves also were not obedient to their Lord. Therefore they blushed that they in such wise had not manifested service to their Creator, that they should deserve to lose dominion over those members by which children were to be procreated.

Chap, 33. The shame of nakedness.

This kind of shame — this necessity of blushing — is certainly born with every man, and in some measure is commanded by the very laws of nature; so that, in this matter,

' Gen. xxi. 19.

CHAP, 31.] WAS THEE LUST BEFORE THE FALL? 2G1

even modest married people are ashamed. Nor can any one go to such an extreme of evil and disgrace, as, because he knows God to be the author of nature and the ordainer of marriage, even to have intercourse with his wife in any one's sight, or not to blush at those impulses and seek secrecy, where he may shun the sight not only of strangers, but even of all his own relatives. Therefore let human nature be permitted to acknowledge the evil that happens to it by its own fault, lest it should be compelled either not to blush at those impulses of its own, which is most shameless, or to blush at the work of its Creator, which is most ungrateful; which evil, nevertheless, modest marriage makes good use of for the sake of the benefit of the begetting of children. But to consent to lust for the sake of carnal pleasure alone is sin, although it may be conceded to married people with pardon.

Chap. 34. Whether there could be lust in Paradise before the fall.

But, maintaining the Pelagian honourableness and fruitfulness of marriage, determine, if nobody had sinned, what you would wish to consider the life of those people in Paradise, and choose one of these four things. For beyond a doubt, either as often as ever they pleased they must have had intercourse; or they would bridle their desire when intercourse was not necessary; or desire would arise at the summons of will, just at the time when a chaste forethought would have some presentiment that intercourse was necessary; or, with no desire existing then at all, as every other member served for its own work, so for its own work the organs of generation also would obey the commands of those that willed, without any difficulty. Of these four suppositions, choose which you please; but I think you will reject the two former, in which lust is either obeyed or resisted. For the first one would not be in accordance with so great a virtue, and the second not in harmony with so great a happiness. For be the idea far from us, that the glory of so great a blessedness as that should either be most basely enslaved by always following a preceding desire, or, by resisting it, should not enjoy the most abounding peace. Away, I say, with the thought that that mind \scil. of our parents in Paradise\] should either be gratiified by consenting to satisfy the lust of the flesh, not occasionally arising for the sake of procreation, but with unregulated excitement, or that that quiet should find it necessary to restrain it by refusing.

Chap. 35. â€” Desire in Paradise was either none at all, or it was obedient to the impulse of the will.

But whichever you choose of the two other alternatives, there is no necessity for striving against you with any disputation. For even if you should refuse to elect the fourth, in which there is the highest tranquillity of all the members in obedience without any desire, since already the urgency of your arguments has made you hostile to it, that will doubtless please you which I have put in the third place, that that carnal concupiscence, whose excitement attains to the final pleasure which delights you, should never arise in Paradise at the bidding of the will except when it would be necessary for procreation. If it is agreeable to you to arrange this in Paradise, and if, by means of such a desire of the flesh which should neither anticipate, nor impede, nor exceed the bidding of the will, it appears to you that children could have been begotten, I have no objection. Nor, as far as I am concerned in this matter, it is enough for me that such a desire of the flesh is not now among men, as you concede there might have been in that place of happiness. For what it now is, the sense of all men certainly confesses, although with modesty, because it both solicits with excessive and importunate uneasiness the chaste, even when they are unwilling and checking it by moderation, and frequently withdraws itself from the willing and inflicts itself on the unwilling; so that, by its disobedience, it testifies that it is nothing else than the punishment of that first disobedience. Whence, reasonably, both then the first men when they covered their nakedness, and now whoever considers himself to be a man in respect of that concupiscence, every modest and immodest person is confounded â€” far be it from us to say by the work of God, but â€” by the penalty of the first and ancient sin. You, however, not for the sake of religious reasoning, but for excited contention, â€” not on behalf of human modesty, but for your own madness, that even the lust of the flesh itself should be thought to be corrupted, and original sin to be derived from it, â€” are endeavouring by your argument to recall it absolutely, such as it now is, into Paradise; and to contend that that desire could have been there which would either always be followed by a disgraceful consent, or would sometimes be restrained by a pitiably refusal. I, however, do not greatly care what it delights you to think of that desire. Still, whatever of men is born by its means, if it is not bom again, without doubt it is damned; and it must be under the dominion of the devil, if it is not delivered thence by Christ.

Chap. 36. [xvin.]-'Julia}i's fourth objection, that man is God's iverh, etc.

" We maintain," says he, " that men are God's work, and that no one is forced unwillingly by His power either into evil or good, but that man does good or ill of his own will; but that in doing good, he is always assisted by God's grace, while to evil he is always incited by the suggestions of the devil." To this I answer, that men, in so far as they are men, are the work of God; but in so far as they are sinners, they are under the devil, unless they are plucked from thence by Him who became the Mediator between God and man, for no other reason than because He could not be a sinner of men. And that no one is forced by God's power unwillingly either into evil or good, but that when God forsakes a man he deservedly goes to evil, and that"" when God assists, without deserving he is converted to good. For a man is not good if he is unwilling, but by the grace of God he is. even assisted to the point of being willing; because it is not vainly written, " For it is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do for His good pleasure," ^ and, " The will is prepared by God." ^

Chap. 37. [xix.] â€” The beginning of a good will is the gift of grace.

But you think that a man is so aided by the grace of God in a good work, that in stirring up his will to that very good work you believe that grace does nothing; for this your own words sufficiently declare. For why have you not said that a man is incited by God's grace to a good work, as you have said that he is incited to evil by the suggestions of 1 Phil. ii. 13. 2 prov. yij. 35.

264 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. 37.

the devil, but have said that in a good work he is always
') aided by God's grace? As if by his own will, and without any grace of God, he undertook a good work, and were then divinely assisted in the work itself, for the sake, that is to say, of the merits of his good will; so that grace is rendered as â– due, â€” not given as not due, â€” and thus grace is made no more grace,^ but is that which, in the Palestinian judgment, Pelagius with a deceitful heart condemned, â€” that the grace of God, namely, is given according to our merits. Tell me, I beseech you, what good Paul, while he was as yet Saul, willed, and not rather great evils, when breathing out slaughter he went, in horrible darkness of mind and madness, to lay waste the Christians? ^ For what merits of a good will did God convert him by a marvellous and sudden calling from those evils to good things? What shall I say, when he himself cries, " Not by works of righteousness that we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us "? ^ What is that which I have already mentioned as having been said by the Lord, " No one can come to me," â€” which is understood as " believe on me," â€” " unless it were given him of my Father" ? Whether is this given to him who is already willing to believe, for the sake of the merits of a good will? or rather is the will itself, as in the case of Saul, stirred up from above, that he may believe, even although he is so averse from the faith as even to persecute the believers? For how has the Lord commanded us to pray for those who persecute us? Do we pray thus that the grace of God may be recompensed them for the sake of their good will, and not rather that the evil will itself may be changed into a good one? As we believe that at that time the saints whom he was persecuting did not pray for Saul in vain, that his will might be converted to the faith which he was destroying. And indeed his conversion, effected from above, appeared even by a manifest miracle. But how many enemies of Christ are at the present day suddenly drawn by God's secret grace to Christ! And if I had not set down this word from the gospel, what things would that man have said in this behalf concerning me, since even now he is stirring, not against me, but against Him who cries, " No man can come to me, except the Father who hath sent me draw him "! ^ For He does not say, " except He lead him," so that we can thus in any way understand that his will precedes. For who is drawn, if he was already willing? And yet no man comes unless he is willing. Therefore he is drawn in wondrous ways to will, by Him who knows how to work within the very hearts of men. Not that men who are unwilling should believe, which cannot be, but that they should be made willing from being unwilling.

' Kom. xi. 6. ^ Acts ix. 1. 3 Tit. iii. 5. * John vi. 66.

CHAP. 38.] GOD WORKETH IN THE HEART. 265

Chap> 38. [xx.] â€” The power of God's grace is proved.
That this is true we do not surmise by human conjecture, but we discern by the most evident authority of the divine Scriptures. It is read in the books of the Chronicles: "Also in Judah, the hand of God was made to give them one heart, to do the commandment of the king and of the princes in the word of the Lord." ^ Also by Ezekiel the prophet the Lord says, "I will give them another heart, and a new spirit will I give them; and I will take away their stony heart out of their flesh, and I will give them an heart of flesh, that they may walk in my commandments and observe my judgments and do them." ^ And what is that which Esther the queen prays when she says, "Give me eloquent speech in my mouth, and enlighten my words in the sight of the lion, and turn his heart to hatred of him that fighteth against us " ? ^ How does she say such things as these in her prayer to God, if God does not work His will in men's hearts ? But perchance the woman was foolish in praying thus. Let us see, then, whether the desire of the petitioner was vainly sent on in advance, and whether the result did not follow as of one who heard. Lo, she goes in to the king. "We need not say much. "And because she did not approach him in her own order, under the compulsion of her great necessity, he looked upon her, as it is written, like a bull in the impulse of his indignation. And the queen feared, and her colour was changed through faintness, and she bowed herself upon the head of her maid, who went before her. And God changed him, and converted his indignation into mildness." ^ Now what need is there to relate what follows, where the divine Scripture testifies that God fulfilled what she had asked for by working in the heart of the king ? what else than the will by which he commanded, and it was done as the queen had asked of him ? And now God had heard her that it should be done, who changed the heart of the king by a most secret and efficacious power before he had heard the address of the woman beseeching him, and moulded it from indignation to mildness, â€” that is, from the will to hurt, to the will to favour, â€” according to that word of the apostle, " God worketh in you to will also." Did the men of God who wrote these things â€” nay, did the Spirit of God Himself, under whose guidance such things were written by them â€” assail the free-will of man ? Away with the notion ! But He recommended both the most righteous judgment and the most merciful aid of the Omnipotent in all cases. For it is enough for man to know that there is no unrighteousness with God. But how He dispenses those benefits, making some deservedly vessels of wrath, others graciously vessels of mercy, â€” who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been His counsellor ? If, then, we attain to the honour of grace, let us not be ungrateful by attributing to ourselves what we have received. " For what have we which we have not received ? " ^

We say, says he, " that the saints of the Old Testament, their righteousness being perfected here, passed to eternal life, â€” that is, that by the love of virtue they departed from all sins; because those whom we read of as having committed any sin, we nevertheless know to have amended themselves." Of whatever virtue you may declare that the ancient righteous men were possessed, nothing but the belief in the Mediator saved them, who shed His blood for the remission of their sins. For their own word is, " I believed, and therefore I spoke." ^ Whence the Apostle Paul also says, " And we having the same Spirit of faith, according as it is written, I believed, and therefore have I spoken; we also believe, and therefore speak." ^ What is " the same Spirit," but that Spirit whom these righteous men also had who said such things ?

1 Esther xv. 5 ff. - 1 Cor. iv. 7. ^ Ps. cxvi. 10.

CHAP. 40.] GKACE NEEDFUL FOR ALL ALIKE. 267

The Apostle Peter also says, " Why do ye wish to put a yoke upon the heathen, which neither we nor our fathers have been able to bear ? But, by the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, we believe that we shall be saved, even as they." ^ You who are enemies to this grace do not wish this, that the ancients should be believed to have been saved by the same grace of Jesus Christ; but you distribute the times according to Pelagius, in whose books this is read, and you say that before the law men were saved by nature, then by the law, lastly by Christ, as if to men of the two former times, that is to say, before the law and under the law, the blood of Christ had not been necessary; making void what is said: " For there is one God and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." ^

Chap. 40. [xxii.] â€” The sixth, objection, concerning the necessity of grace for all, and concerning the baptism of infants.

They say, " We confess that the grace of Christ is necessary to all, both to grown-up people and to infants; and we anathematize those who say that a child bom of two baptized people ought not to be baptized." I know in what way you say such things as these â€” not according to the Apostle Paul, but according to the heretic Pelagius; â€” to wit, that baptism is I necessary for infants, not for the sake of the remission of \ sins, but only for the sake of the kingdom of heaven; for j you give them outside the kingdom of heaven a place of I salvation and life eternal, even if they have not been baptized. Nor do you regard what is written, " Whosoever believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he who believeth

/not shall be condemned." * For which reason, in the church I of the Saviour, infants believe by means of other people, even I as they have derived those sins which are remitted them in baptism from other people. Nor do you think thus, that they cannot have life who have been without the body and blood of Christ, although He said Himself, "Unless ye eat my flesh and drink my blood, ye shall have no life in you." ^

'2Cor. iv. 13. Â« Acts xv. 10, 11. 3 1 Tim. ii. 5.

* Mark xvi. 16. " John vi. 34.

268 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. 42.

Or if you are forced by the words of the gospel to confess that infants departing from the body cannot have either life or salvation unless they have been baptized, ask why those who are not baptized are compelled to undergo the judgment of the second death, by the judgment of Him who condemns nobody undeserving, and you will find what you do not want, â€” original sin !

Chap. 41. [xxiii.] â€” The seventh objection, of the effect of baptism.

" We condemn," says he, " those who affirm that baptism does not do away all sins, because we know that full cleansing is conferred by these very mysteries." We also say this; but you do not say that infants are also by those same mysteries freed from the bonds of their first birth and of their hateful descent. On which account it behoves you, like other heretics also, to be separated from the Church of Christ, which holds this of old time. ~

Chap. 42. [xxiv.] â€” He rebuts the conclusion of Julian's letter.

But now the manner in which he concludes the letter by saying, " Let no one therefore seduce you, nor let the wicked deny that they think these things. But if they speak the truth, either let a hearing be given, or let those very bishops who now disagree with me condemn what I have above said that they hold with the Manichseans, as we condemn those things which they declare concerning us, and a full agreement shall be made; but if they will not, know ye that they are Manichseans, and abstain from their company;" â€” this is rather to be despised than rebuked. For which of us hesitates to pronounce an anathema against the Manichseans, who say that from the good God neither proceed men, nor was ordained marriage, nor was given the law, which was ministered to the Hebrew people by Moses ! But against the Pelagians also, not without reason, we pronounce an anathema, for that they are so hostile to God's grace, which comes through Jesus Christ our Lord, as to say that it is given not freely, but according to our merits, and thus grace is no more grace; ^ and determine so much in respect of the free-will by which man

, ' Kom. xi. 6.
is plunged into the abyss, as to say that by making good use of it man deserves grace; although no man can make good use of it except by grace, which is not repaid according to debt, but is given freely by God's mercy. And they so contend that infants are already saved, that they dare deny that they can be saved by the Saviour; and holding and disseminating their execrable dogmas, they still over and above constantly demand a hearing, when, as condemned, they ought to repent.

THE SECOND BOOK.

HE UNDERTAKES TO EXAMINE THE SECOND LETTER OF THE PELAGIANS, FILLED, LIKE THE FIRST, WITH CALUMNIES AGAINST THE CATHOLICS â€” A LETTER THAT WAS SENT BY THEM TO THESSALONICA IN THE NAME OF EIGHTEEN BISHOPS; AND, FIRST OF ALL, HE SHOWS, BY THE COMPARISON OF THE SAME HERETICAL WRITINGS WITH ONE ANOTHER, THAT THE CATHOLICS ARE BY NO MEANS FALLING INTO THE ERRORS OF THE MANICHÆANS IN DETESTING THE DOGMAS OF THE PELAGIANS. HE REPELS THE CALUMNY OF COLLUSION INCURRED BY THE ROMAN CLERGY IN THE LATER CONDEMNATION OF PELAGIUS AND COELESTIUS BY ZOSIMUS, SHOWING THAT THE PELAGIAN DOGMAS WERE NEVER APPROVED AT ROME, ALTHOUGH FOR SOME TIME, BY THE CLEMENCY OF ZOSIMUS, COELESTIUS WAS MERCIFULLY DEALT WITH, WITH A VIEW TO LEADING HIM TO THE CORRECTION OF HIS ERRORS. HE SHOWS THAT, UNDER THE NAME OF GRACE, CATHOLICS NEITHER ASSERT A DOCTRINE OF FATE, NOR ATTRIBUTE ACCEPTANCE OF PERSONS TO GOD; ALTHOUGH THEY TRULY SAY THAT GOD'S GRACE IS NOT GIVEN IN RESPECT OF HUMAN MERITS, AND THAT THE FIRST DESIRE OF GOOD IS INSPIRED BY GOD; SO THAT A MAN MAKES ABSOLUTELY NO BEGINNING OF A CHANGE FROM BAD TO GOOD, UNLESS THE UNBOUGHT AND GRATUITOUS MERCY OF GOD EFFECTS THAT BEGINNING IN HIM.
LET me now consider a second letter, not of Julian's alone, but common to him with several bishops, which they sent to Thessalonica; and let me answer it, with God's help, as I best can. And lest this work of mine become longer than the necessity of the subject itself requires, what need is there to refute those things which do not contain the insidious poison of their doctrine, but seem only to plead for the acquiescence of the Eastern bishops for their assistance? or, on behalf of the Catholic faith, against the profanity, as they say, of the Manicheans, with no other view than that a horrible heresy being presented to them, whose adversaries they professed themselves to be, they may lie hid as the enemies of grace in their praise of nature? For who at any time has stirred any question of these matters against them? or what Catholic is displeased because they condemn those whom the apostle foretold as departing from the faith, having their conscience seared, forbidding to marry, abstaining from meats that they think unclean, not considering that all things were created by God? ^ Who at any time constrained them to deny that every creature of God is good, and there is no substance which the supreme God has not made, except God Himself, who was not made by any? It is not such things as these, which it is plain are Catholic truths, that are rebuked and condemned in them; because not alone the Catholic faith holds in detestation the Manichsean impiety as exceedingly foolish and mischievous, but also all heretics who are not Manicheans. Whence even these Pelagians do well to utter an anathema against the Manichoeans, and to speak against their errors. But they do two evil things, for which they themselves must also be anathematized â€” one, that they impeach Catholics under the name of Manicheans, the other, that they themselves also are introducing the heresy of a new error. For it is not because they are not labouring under the disease of the Manichssans that they are therefore sound in the faith. The kind of pestilence is not always one and the same â€” as in the bodies, so also in the minds. As, therefore, the physician of the body would not have pronounced a man free from peril of death whom he might have declared free from dropsy, if he had seen him to be sick of some other mortal disease; so truth is not acknowledged in their case because they are not Manichseans, if they are râ€”ing in some other kind of perversity. Wherefore what we anathematize with them is one thing, what we anathematize in them is another. For we hold in abhorrence with them what is rightly offensive to them also; just as, nevertheless, we hold in abhorrence in them that for which they themselves are rightly offensive.

CHAP. 2.] MANICHŒAN EEROE CONDEMNED. 271

Chap. 2. [ii.] â€” The heresies of the Alanichceans and Pelagians are mutually opposed, and are alike reprobated by the Catholic Church.
The Manichseans say that the good God is not the Creator of all nature; the Pelagians say that God is not the Purifier, the Saviour, the Deliverer of all ages of men. The Catholic Church condemns both; as well maintaining God's creation

' 1 Tim. iv. ff.

272 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. 3.

against the Manichaeans, that no nature may be denied to be appointed by Him, as maintaining against the Pelagians that in all ages human nature must be sought after as ruined.
The Manichseans rebuke the lust of the flesh, not as an accidental vice, but as a nature bad from eternity; the Pelagians approve it moreover as no vice or fault, but as being a natural good. The Catholic faith condemns both, saying to the Manichseans, " It is not nature, but it is vice;"
saying to the Pelagians, " It is not of the Father, but it is of the world," in order that both may allow it as an evil state of health to be cured â€” the former by ceasing to believe it, as it were, incurable, the latter by ceasing to proclaim it as laudable. The Manichaeans deny that to a good man the beginning of evil was of free choice; the Pelagians say that even a bad man has free-will sufficiently to do a good commandment. The Catholic Church condemns both, saying to the former, " God made man upright," ^ and saying to the latter, " If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." ^ The Manichseans say that the soul, as a particle of God, has sin by the commixture of an evil nature; the Pelagians say that the soul is upright, not being indeed a particle, but a creature of God, and has not even in this corruptible life any sin. The Catholic Church condemns both, saying to the Manichceans, " Either make the tree good and its fruit good, or make the tree evil and its fruit evil," which would not be said to man who cannot make his own nature, unless because sin is not nature, but vice; saying to the Pelagians, " If we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." ^ In these diseases, opposed as they are to one another, the Manichseans and the Pelagians are at issue, with dissimilar will but with similar untruth, separated by different opinions, but close together by a perverse mind.

Chap. 3. â€” How far the Mankliceans and Pelagians are joined in error; how far they are separated.

Still, indeed, they alike resent the grace of Christ, they alike make His baptism of no account, they alike dishonour His flesh; but, moreover, they do these things in different ways and for different reasons. For the Manichteans assert that divine assistance is given to the merits of a good nature, but the Pelagians, to the merits of a good will. The former say, God owes this to the labours of His members; the latter say, God owes this to the virtues of His servants. In both cases, therefore, the reward is not imputed according to grace, but according to debt. The Manichseans contend, with a profane heart, that the washing of regeneration â€” that is, the water itself â€” is superfluous, and is of no advantage. But the Pelagians assert that what is said in holy baptism for the putting away of sins is of no avail to infants, as they have no sin; and thus in the baptism of infants, as far as pertains to the remission of sins, the Manichaeans destroy the visible element, and the Pelagians destroy also the visible sacrament.

The Manichseans, by blaspheming the birth of the Virgin, dishonour Christ's flesh; the Pelagians do as much by making the flesh of those to be redeemed equal to the flesh of the Redeemer, because Christ was born, not certainly in sinful flesh, but in the likeness of sinful flesh, because the flesh of the rest of mankind is born sinful. The Manichaeans, therefore, who absolutely abominate all flesh, take away the manifest truth from the flesh of Christ; but the Pelagians, who maintain that no flesh is born sinful, take away from Christ's flesh its special and proper dignity.

Chap. 4. â€” The two contrary errors.

Let the Pelagians, then, cease to object to the Catholics that which they are not, but let them rather hasten to amend what they themselves are; and let them not wish to be considered deserving of approval because they are opposed to the hateful error of the Manichseans, but let them acknowledge themselves to be deservedly hateful because they do not put away their own error. For two errors may be opposed to one another, although both are to be reprobated because both are alike opposed to the truth. For if the Pelagians are to be loved because they hate the Manichseans, the Manichseans should also be loved because they hate the Pelagians. But be it far from our Catholic mother to choose some to love on the ground that they hate others, when by the warning and Chap. 5. [ni.] â€” The calumny of the Pelagians against the clergy of the Roman Church.

Moreover, they accuse the Eoman clergy, -writing, " That, driven by the fear of a command, they have not blushed to be guilty of the crime of prevarication; ^ that, contrary to their previous judgment, wherein by their proceedings they had assented to the Catholic dogma, they subsequently pronounced that the nature of men is evil." Nay, but the Pelagians had conceived, with a false hope, that the new and execrable dogma of Pelagius or Coelestius could be made acceptable to the catholic intelligences of certain Romans, when those crafty spirits â€” however perverted by a wicked error, yet not contemptible, since they appeared rather to be deserving of considerate correction than of easy condemnation â€” were treated with somewhat more of lenity than the stricter discipline of the Church required. For while so many and such important ecclesiastical documents were passing and repassing between the Apostolical See and the African bishops, â€” and, moreover, when the proceedings in this matter in that see were completed, with Ccelestius present and making answer, â€” what sort of a letter, what decree, is found of Pope Zosimus, of venerable memory, wherein he prescribed that it must be believed that man is born without any taint of original sin ? Absolutely he never said this â€” never wrote it at all. But since Coelestius had written this in his pamphlet, among those matters merely on which he confessed that he was still in doubt and desired to be instructed, the desire of amendment in a man of the shrewdest intellect, who, if he could be put right, would assuredly be of advantage to many, and not the falsehood of the doctrine, was approved. And therefore his pamphlet was called catholic, because this also is the part of a catholic disposition, â€” if by chance in any matters a man thinks differently from what the truth demands, not with the greatest accuracy to define those matters, but, if detected and demonstrated, to reject them. For it was not to heretics, but to catholics, that the apostle was speaking when he said, " Let

CHAP. 5.] DOUBLE DEALING OF CCELESTITJS. 275

US, therefore, as many as are perfect, he thus minded; and if in anything ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you." ^ This was thought to have been the case in him [Ccelestius] when he replied that he consented to the letters of Pope Innocent of blessed memory, in which all doubt about this matter was removed. And in order that this might be made fuller and more manifest in him, matters were delayed until letters should come from Africa, in which province his craftiness had in some sort become more evidently known; and after these letters came to Rome containing this, that it was not sufficient for men of more sluggish and anxious minds that he confessed his general consent to the letters of Bishop Innocent, but that he ought openly to anathematize the mischievous statements which he had made in his pamphlet; lest if he did not do so, many people of better intelligence should rather believe that in his pamphlet those poisons of the faith had been approved by the Catholic See, because it had been affirmed by that see that that pamphlet was catholic, than that they had been amended because of his answer that he consented to the letters of Pope Innocent.
Then, therefore, when his presence was demanded, in order that by certain and clear answers either the craft of the man or his correction might plainly appear and remain doubtful to no one, he withdrew himself and refused the examination. Neither would it have been delayed already, as it had been for the advantage of others, if it could not be of advantage to the pertinacity and madness of those who were excessively perverse. But if, which be far from the case, it had so been judged in the Eoman Church concerning Ccelestius or Pelagius, that those dogmas of theirs, which in themselves and "with themselves Pope Innocent had condemned, should be pronounced worthy of approval and maintenance, the mark of apostasy would rather have to be branded on the Ptoman clergy for this. But now, when for the first time the letters of the most blessed Pope Innocent, in reply to the letters of the African bishops, would have equally condemned this error which these men are endeavouring to commend to us; and his successor, the holy Pope Zosimus, would never have said, never have written, that this dogma which these men think concerning infants is to be held; nay, would even have bound Ccelestius by a repeated dogma, when he endeavoured to clear himself, to a consent to the above-mentioned letters of the Apostolic See; â€” assuredly, whatever in the meanwhile was done more leniently concerning Ccelestius, provided the stability of the most ancient and robust faith were maintained, has the most merciful persuasion of correction, not the most pernicious approval of wickedness; and that afterwards, by the same priesthood, Ccelestius and Pelagius were condemned by repeated authority, was the proof of a severity, for a little while intermitted, at length of necessity to be carried out, not a denial of a previously - known truth or a new acknowledgment of truth.

Chap. 6, [iv.] â€” What was done in the case of Ccelestius before Zosimus.

But what need is there for us to delay longer in speaking of this matter, when there are extant here and there memorials and writings drawn up, where all those things just as they were transacted may be either learnt or recalled? For who I does not see in what degree Ccelestius was bound by the interrogations of your holy predecessor [Zosimus], and by the answers of Ccelestius, whereby he professed that he consented to the letters of Pope Innocent? And now, fastened by a most wholesome chain, he could not dare any further to maintain that the original sin of infants is not put away in baptism; because these are the words of the venerable Bishop Innocent concerning this matter to the Carthaginian Council: "For once," he said, "he endured free-will; but, using his advantage inconsiderately, and falling into the depths of apostasy, he was overwhelmed, and found no way whereby he could rise from thence; and, deceived for ever by his liberty, he would have lain under the oppression of this ruin, if the advent of Christ had not subsequently for his grace delivered him, who, by the purification of a new regeneration, purged all past sin by the washing of His baptism." What could be more clear or more manifest than jthat judgment of the Apostolic See? To this Coelestius professed that he assented, when, it being "Sacerdote."

CHAP. 7.] PROFESSION OF CCELESTIUS. 277

said to him by your holy predecessor [Zosimus], "Do you condemn all those things that are bandied about under your name?" he himself replied, "I condemn them in accordance with the judgment of your predecessor Innocent, of blessed memory." But among other things which had been uttered concerning his name, the deacon Paulinus had objected to Ccelestius that he said "that the sin of Adam was prejudicial to himself alone, and not to the human race, and that infants newly born were in the same condition in which Adam was before his sin." Accordingly, if he would condemn the views objected to by Paulinus with a truthful heart and tongue, according to the judgment of the blessed Pope Innocent, what could remain to him afterwards whence he could contend that there was no sin in infants resulting from the past transgression of the first man, which would be purged in holy baptism by the purification of the new regeneration? But he showed that he had answered deceitfully by the final event, when he withdrew himself from the examination, lest he should be compelled, according to the African rescripts, absolutely to mention and anathematize the very words themselves concerning this question which he wrote in his tractate.

Chap. 7. "He suggests a dilemma to Ccelestius.

What was that which the same pope replied to the bishop of Numidia concerning this very cause, because he had received letters from both Councils, as well from the Council of Carthage as from the Council of Milevi? does he not speak most plainly concerning infants? For these are his words: " For what your fraternity assert that they preach, that infants can be endowed with the rewards of eternal life even without the grace of baptism, is excessively silly; for unless they shall eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink His blood, they shall not have life in themselves. And they who maintain this as being theirs without regeneration, appear to me to wish to destroy baptism itself, when they affirm that those have that which we believe is not to be conferred on them without baptism." What does the ungrateful man say to this, when the Apostolic See had already spared him on his profession, as if he were corrected by its most benignant lenity?

278 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. 8

What does he say to this? Will infants after the end of their life, even if while they live they are not baptized in Christ, be in eternal life, or will they not? If he should say they will, how then did he answer that he had condemned what had been uttered under his name according to the judgment of Innocent, of blessed memory? Lo, Pope Innocent, of blessed memory, says that infants have not life without Christ's baptism, and without partaking of Christ's body and blood. If he should say they will not, how then, if they do not receive eternal life, are they certainly by consequence condemned in eternal death if they derive no original sin?

What do they say to these things who dare, moreover, to write his mischievous impieties, and dare to send them to the Eastern bishops? Ccelestius is held to have given consent to the letters of the venerable Innocent; the letters themselves of the prelate mentioned are read, who writes that infants who are not baptized cannot have life. And who will deny that, as a consequence, they have death, if they have not life? Whence, then, in infants, is so wretched a penalty as that, if there is no original fault? How, then, are the Eoman clergy charged with apostasy by those forsakers of the faith and opponents of grace under Bishop Zosimus, as if they had had any other view in the subsequent condemnation of Ccelestius and Pelagius than that which they had in the former one under Innocent? Because, certainly, since by the letters of the venerable Innocent concerning the abode of infants in eternal death unless they were baptized in Christ, the antiquity of the Catholic faith shone forth, assuredly he would rather be an apostate from the Roman Church who should deviate from that judgment; and since with God's blessing this did not happen, but that judgment itself was constantly maintained in the repeated condemnation of Cælestius and Pelagius, let them understand that they themselves are in the position wherein they accuse others of being, and let them hereafter be healed of their apostasy from the faith. Because the Catholic faith does not say that the nature of man is bad in respect of man's first appointment by the Creator; nor yet is this liis evil part which God creates in that nature when He makes men from men, but what he takes from that sin of the first man.

Chap. 9. [v.] â€” He npUes to the calumnies of the Pelagians.

And now we must look to those things which they objected to us in their letters, gaining a brief advantage. And to these this is my answer. We do not say that by the sin of Adam free-will perished out of the nature of men, but that it is of force for sinning in men subjected to the devil; while it is not of avail for pious living, unless the will itself of man should be made free by God's grace, and assisted to every good movement of action, of speech, of thought. We say that no one but the Lord God is the maker of those who are born, and that marriage was ordained not by the devil, but by God Himself; yet that all are born under sin on account of the fault of the race, and that, therefore, all are under the devil until they are born again in Christ. Nor are we maintaining fate under the name of grace, because we say that the grace of God is preceded by no merits of man. If, however, it is agreeable to any to call the will of the Almighty God by the name of fate, while we indeed shun profane novelties of words, we have no desire to contend about words.

Chap. 10. â€” Why the Pelagians falsely accuse Catholics of maintaining fate under the name of grace.

But, as I was somewhat more attentively considering for what reason they should think it well to object this to us, that we assert fate under the name of grace, I first of all looked into those words of theirs which follow. For thus they have thought that this was to be objected to us: "Under the name," say they, "of grace, they so assert fate as to say that unless God inspired man with the desire of good, unwilling and resisting, and that good imperfect, he would neither be able to decline from evil nor to lay hold of good." Then a letter after, where they themselves mention what they maintain, I gave heed to what was said by them about this matter.
"We confess," say they, "that baptism is necessary for all ages, and that grace, moreover, assists the good purpose of everybody; but yet that it does not infuse the love of virtue.

280 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. 11.]

Into a reluctant mind, because there is no acceptance of persons with God." From these words of theirs, I perceive that for this reason they either think, or wish it to be thought, that we assert fate under the name of grace, because we say that God's grace is not given in respect of our merits, but according to His own most merciful will, in that He said, "I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will show mercy on whom I will show mercy." Where, by way of consequence, it is added, "Therefore it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that meaneth, but of God that showeth mercy." Here any one might be equally foolish in thinking or saying that the apostle is an assertor of fate. But here these people sufficiently lay themselves open; for when they malign us by saying that we maintain fate under the name of grace, because we say that God's grace is not given in respect of our merits, beyond a doubt they confess that they themselves say that it is given in respect of our merits; thus their blindness could not conceal and dissimulate that they believe and think thus, although, when this view was objected to him, Pelagius, in the episcopal judgment of Palestine, with crafty fear condemned it. For it was objected to him from the words of his own disciple Coelestius, indeed, that he himself also was in the habit of saying that God's grace is given in respect of our merits. And he in abhorrence, or in pretended abhorrence of this, did not delay with his lips, at least, to anathematize it; but, as his later writings indicate, and the assertion of those followers of his makes evident, he kept in his deceitful heart until afterwards what the cunning of a denier had then hidden for fear, and moreover his boldness might put forth in letters. And still the Pelagian bishops do not dread, and at least are not ashamed, to send their letters to the Catholic Eastern bishops, in which they charge us with being assertors of fate because we do not say that even grace is given according to our merits; although Pelagius, fearing the Eastern bishops, did not dare to say this, and so was compelled to condemn it.

Chap. 11. [vi.] "The accusation of fate is thrown back upon the adversaries.

But is it thus, children of pride, enemies of God's grace,

CHAP. 11.] WHAT DOES BAPTISM DO FOR INFANTS? 281
new Pelagian heretics, that whoever says that all man's good deservings are preceded by God's grace, and that God's grace is not given to merits, lest it should not be grace if it is not given freely, but is repaid as due to those who deserve it, seems to you to assert fate? Do not you yourselves also say, whatever be your purpose, that baptism is necessary for all ages? Have you not written in this very letter of yours that opinion concerning baptism, and that concerning grace, side by side? Why did not baptism, which is given to infants, by that very juxtaposition admonish you what you ought to think concerning grace? For these are your words: "We confess that baptism is necessary for all ages, and that grace, moreover, assists the good purpose of everybody; but yet that it does not infuse the love of virtue into a reluctant mind, because there is no acceptance of persons with God." In all these words of yours, I for the meanwhile say nothing of what you have said concerning grace. But give a reason concerning baptism, why you should say that it is necessary for all ages; say why it is necessary for infants. Assuredly because it confers some good upon them; and that same something is neither small nor moderate, but of great account. For although you deny that they contract the original sin which is remitted in baptism, yet you do not deny that in that laver of regeneration they are adopted from the sons of men unto the sons of God; nay, you even preach this. Tell us, then, how the infants, whoever they are, that are baptized in Christ and have departed from the body, received so lofty a gift as this, and with what preceding merits. If you should say that they have deserved this by the piety of their parents, it will be replied to you, Why is this benefit sometimes denied to the children of pious people and given to the children of the wicked? For sometimes the offspring sprung from religious people, in tender age, and thus fresh from the womb, is forestalled by death before it can be washed in the laver of regeneration, and the infant born of Christ's foes is baptized in Christ by the mercy of Christians, â€” the baptized mother bewails her own little one not baptized, and the chaste virgin gathers in to be baptized a foreign offspring, exposed by an immodest mother. Here, certainly.

282 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS, [CIIAP. 12.

the merits of parents are wanting, and even by your own confession the merits of the infants themselves are wanting also. For we know that you do not believe this of the human soul, that it has lived somewhere before it inhabited this earthly body, and has done something either of good or of evil for which it might deserve such difference in the flesh. What cause, then, has procured baptism for this infant, and has denied it to that? Do they themselves hold fate because they do not hold merit? or is there in these things acceptance of persons with God? For you have said both, â€” first fate, afterwards acceptance of persons, â€” that, since both must be refuted, there may remain the merit which you wish to introduce against grace. Answer, then, concerning the merits of infants, why some should depart from their bodies baptized, others not baptized, and neither possess nor want so excellent a gift by the merits of their parents, that they should become sons of God from sons of men, by no deservings of their parents, by no deservings of their own? You are silent, forsooth, and you find yourselves rather in the same position which you object to us. For if when there is no merit you say that consequently there is fate, and on this account wish the merit of man to be understood in the grace of God, lest you should be compelled to confess fate, see, you rather assert a fate in the baptism of infants, since you avow that in them there is no merit. But if, in the case of infants to be baptized, you deny that any merit at all precedes, and yet do not concede that there is a fate, why do you cry out, when we say that the grace of God is therefore given freely, lest it should not be grace, and is not repaid as if it were due to preceding merits, that we are assertors of fate? Are not perceiving that in the justification of the wicked, as there are no merits because it is God's grace, so that it is not fate because it is God's grace, and so that it is not acceptance of persons because it is God's grace.

Chap. 12. What is meant under the name of fate.

Because they who affirm fate contend that not only actions and events, but, moreover, our very wills themselves depend on the position of the stars at the time in which one is conceived or born; which positions they call constellations. But the grace of God surpasses not only all stars and all heavens, but, moreover, all angels. Hence the assertors of fate attribute both men's good and evil doings and fortunes to fate, but in the ill fortunes of men God is following up their merits with due retribution; but He bestows benefits by undeserved grace with a merciful will, doing both the one and the other not according to a seasonable conjunction of stars, but according to the eternal and deep counsel of His severity and goodness. We see, then, that neither belongs to fate. Here, if you answer that this very benevolence of God, by which He follows not merits, but bestows undeserved benefits with gratuitous bounty, should rather be called fate, when the apostle calls this grace, saying, "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves, but it is the gift of God; not of works, lest perchance any one should be lifted up," do you not consider do you not perceive that it is not by us that fate is asserted under the name of grace, but it is rather by you that divine grace is called by the name of fate?

CHAP. 13. [vii.] NO ACCEPTANCE OF PERSONS. 283

Chap. 13. [vii.] Herepst te calumny concerning the acceptance of persons.

And, moreover, the acceptance of persons is rightly so called in the case where he who judges, neglecting the merit of the cause concerning which he is judging, favours the one against the other, because he finds something in his favour which is worthy of honour or of pity. But if any one have two debtors, and he choose to remit the debt to the one, to require it of the other, he gives to whom he will and defrauds nobody; nor is this to be called acceptance of persons, since there is no injustice. The acceptance of persons may seem otherwise to those who are of small understanding, where the lord of the vineyard gave to those labourers who had done work therein for one hour as much as to those who had borne the burden and heat of the day, making them equal in wages of whom there had been such a difference in their labour.
But what did he reply to those who murmured against the goodman of the house concerning this, as it were, acceptance of persons? "Friend," said he, "I do thee no wrong. Hast not thou agreed with me for a denarius? Take what thine

Â» Epb. ii. 8.

is, and go; but I choose to give to this last as to thee. Is it not lawful to me to do what I will? Is thine eye evil because I am good? " ^ Here, forsooth, is the whole justice:
" I choose." " To thee," he says, " I have repaid; on him I have bestowed; nor have I taken anything away from thee to bestow it on him; nor have I either diminished or denied what I owed to you. May I not do what I will? Is thine eye evil because I am good? " As, therefore, here there is no acceptance of persons, because one is honoured freely in such wise as that another is not defrauded of what is due to him, so also when, according to the purpose of God, one is called, another is not called, a gratuitous benefit is bestowed on the one that is called, of which benefit the calling itself is the beginning, an evil is repaid to him that is not called, because all are guilty, from the fact that by one man sin entered into the world. And in that parable of the labourers, indeed, where they received one denarius who laboured for one hour, as well as those who laboured twelve times as long, â€” though assuredly these latter, according to human reasonings, however vain, ought in proportion to the amount of their labour to have received twelve denarii, â€” both of them were put on an equality in respect of the benefit, it was not that some were delivered and others were condemned; because even those who laboured more had it from the goodman of the house himself, both that they were so called as to come, and that they were so fed as to have no want. But where it is said, " Therefore, on whom He will He has mercy, and whom He will He hardeneth," - who " maketh one vessel to honour and another to dishonour," ^ it is given indeed without deserving, and freely, because he is of the same mass to whom it is not given; but evil is deservedly and of debt repaid, since in the mass of perdition evil is not repaid to the evil unjustly. And to him to whom it is repaid it is evil, because it is his punishment; while to Him by whom it is repaid it is good, because it is His right to do it. Nor is there any acceptance of] persons in the case of two debtors equally guilty, if to the one is remitted and from the other is claimed that which is equally owed by both.

CHAP. 15.] SUPPOSED CASE OF TWINS. 285
Chap. 14. "He illustrates his argument by an example.

But that what I am saying may be made clear by the manifestation of an example, let us suppose certain twins, born of a certain harlot, and exposed that they might be taken up by others. One of them has expired without baptism; the other is baptized. What can we say was in this case the fate or the fortune, which are here absolutely nothing?

What acceptance of persons, although with God there is none, even if there could be any such thing in these cases, seeing that they certainly had nothing for which the one could be preferred to the other, and no merits of their own, "whether good, for which the one might deserve to be baptized; or evil, for which the other might deserve to die without baptism?"

Were there any merits in their parents, when the father was a fornicator, the mother a harlot? But of whatever kind those merits were, there were certainly not any that were different to those who died in so different a condition, but they were common to both. If, then, neither fate, since no stars made them to differ; nor fortune, since no fortuitous accidents produce these things; neither the diversity of persons nor of merits have done this, what remains, so far as it refers to the baptized child, save the grace of God, which is given freely to vessels made unto honour; but, as refers to the unbaptized child, the wrath of God, which is repaid to the vessels made for dishonour in respect of the deserving of the lump itself? But in that which is baptized we constrain you to confess the grace of God, and convince you that no merit of its own preceded; but of that one which died without baptism, why that sacrament should have been wanting to it, which even you confess to be needful for all ages, and what in that manner may have been punished in him, it is for you to see who will not have it that there is any original sin.

Chap. 15. "The apostle meets the question by leaving it unsolved.

As in the case of those two twins we have without a doubt one and the same cause, the difficulty of the question why the one died in one way, and the other in another, is solved by the apostle as it were by not solving it; since, when he had proposed something of the same kind about two twins, "on account of which, not of works, because they had not as yet done anything either of good or of evil, but of Him that calleth," it was said, "The elder shall serve the younger," and, "Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated," and had prolonged the dread of this profundity even to the point of saying, "Therefore hath He mercy on whom He will, and whom He will He harden eth," constantly perceived what impulse was at work, and opposed to himself the words of a gainsayer which he desired to check by apostolical authority.

For he says, "You say, then, unto me, Why doth He yet find fault? For who has resisted His will?" And to him who says this he answered, "O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Does the thing formed say to him that formed it. Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power of the clay of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour and another unto dishonour?" * Then, following on, he opened up so great and hidden a secret as far as he judged it fit that it should be disclosed to men, saying, "But if God, willing to show His wrath and to demonstrate His power, endured in much patience the vessels of wrath fitted for destruction, and that He might make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy which He has prepared for glory." ^ This is not only the assistance, but, moreover, the proof of God's grace â€” the assistance, namely, in the vessels of mercy, but the proof in the vessels of wrath; for in them He shows His anger and makes known His power, because His goodness is so mighty that He even uses the evil well; and in them He makes known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy, because what the justice of a punisher requires from the vessels of wrath, the grace of the Deliverer remits to the vessels of mercy. Nor would the kindness which is bestowed on some freely appear, unless to others equally guilty and from the same mass God showed what was really due to both, and condemned them with a righteous judgment. "For who maketh thee to differ?" ^ says the same apostle to a man as it were boasting concerning himself and his own benefits. "For who maketh thee to differ?" Certainly froia the vessels of wrath, from the masses of the perdition which has sent all by one into damnation. Who maketh thee to differ? And as if he had answered, INly faith maketh me to differ, â€” my purpose, my merit, â€” he says, "For what hast thou which thou hast not received? But if thou hast received it, why dost thou boast as if thou receivedst it not?" â€” that is, as if that whence thou art made to differ were of thine own. Therefore He maketh thee to differ who bestows that whence thou art made to differ by removing the penalty that is due, by conferring the grace which is not due. He maketh to differ, who, when the darkness was upon the face of the abyss, said, "Let there be light; and there was light, and divided " â€” that is, made to differ â€” "between the light and the darkness."^ For when there was only darkmess. He did not find what He should make to differ; but by making the light. He made to differ, as it may be said to the justified wicked, "For ye were sometime darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord." ^ And thus he who glories must glory not in himself, but in the Lord. He makes to differ who â€” of those who are not yet born, and who have not yet done any good or evil, that according to the election His purpose might stand not of works, but of Himself that calleth â€” said. The elder shall serve the younger, and commending that very purpose afterwards by the mouth of the prophet, said, "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated." ^ Because he said the election, in which God does not find made by another what He may choose, but Himself makes what He may find; as of the remnant of Israel it is written:

"There is made a remnant by the election of grace; but if by grace, then it is no more of works, otherwise grace is no more grace." ^ On which account you are certainly foolish who, when the Truth declares, "Not of works, but of Him that calleth, it was said," say that Jacob was loved on account of future works which God foreknew that he would do, and thus contradict the apostle when he says, "Not of works;" as if he could not have said, "Not of present, but of future works."
But he says, "Not of works, that He might commend grace; but if of grace, now is it no more of works, otherwise grace is no more grace." For grace, not due, but free, precedes, that by it good works may be done; but if good works should precede, grace should be repaid, as it were, to works, and thus grace should be no more grace.

^ Gen. i. 2. - Eph. v. 8. ^ n^i i 2. 4 Eom. xi. 5.

Chap. 16. â€” The Pelagians are refuted by the case of the twin infants dying, the one after, and the other without, the grace of baptism.

But that every lurking-place of your darkness may be taken away from you, I have proposed to you the case of such twins as were not assisted by the merits of their parents; and both died, the one baptized in the very beginning of infancy, the other without baptism; lest you should say that God foreknew their future works, as you say of Jacob and Esau, in opposition to the apostle. For how did He foreknow that those things should be, which, in those infants about to die in infancy, He rather foreknew as not future, since His foreknowledge cannot be deceived? Or what does it profit those who are taken away from this life that wickedness may not change their understanding, nor deceit beguile their soul, if even the sin which has not been done, said, or thought, is thus punished as if it had been committed? Because, if it is most absurd, silly, and senseless, that certain men should have to be condemned for those sins, the guilt of which they could neither derive from their parents, as you say, nor could incuir themselves, either by committing them, or even by conceiving of them, there comes back to you that unbaptized twin brother of the baptized one, and silently asks you for what reason he was made to differ from his brother in respect of happiness, â€” why he was punished with that infelicity, that, while his brother' was adopted into a child of God, he himself should not receive that sacrament which, as you confess, is necessary for every age, if, even as there is not a fortune or a fate, or an acceptance of persons with God, so there is no gift of grace without merits, and no original sin. To this dumb child you absolutely submit your tongue and voice; to this witness who says nothing, â€” you have nothing at all to say!
Chap. 17. [viii.] Even the desire of an imperfect good is a gift of grace, otherwise grace would he given according to merits.

Let us now see as we can the nature of this very thing which they will have to precede in man, in order that he may be regarded as worthy of the assistance of grace, and to the merit of which in him grace is not given as if it were not earned, but is given as if it were due; and thus grace is no more grace. Let us see, however, what this is. " Under the name," say they, " of grace, they so assert fate as to say that unless God should have infused the desire for good, and that, imperfect good, into unwilling and resisting man, he would neither be able to decline from evil nor to grasp after good."

I have already shown what empty things they speak about fate and grace. Now the question which I ought to consider is this, whether God infuses the desire of good into man unwilling and resisting, that he may be no longer unwilling, no longer resisting, but consenting to the good and willing the good. For those men will have it that the desire of good in man begins from man himself; that the merit of this beginning is, moreover, attended with the grace of completion

if, at least, they will allow this to be a grace. For Pelagius says that what is good is more easily fulfilled if grace assists.

By which addition he certainly signifies that he is of the opinion that, even if the aid of grace should be wanting, yet good might be accomplished, although with greater difficulty, by free-will alone. But let me prescribe to those opponents of mine what they should think in this matter, without speaking of that author of this heresy. Let us allow them, with their free-will, to be free even from Pelagius himself, and rather give heed to those words of theirs which they have written in this letter to which I am replying.

Chap. 18, â€“ The desire of good is God's gift.

For they have thought that it was to be objected to us that we say " that God infuses into man, unwilling and resisting, the desire," not of good, how great soever it be, but " even of imperfect good." Possibly, then, they themselves are keeping open a place at least for grace, as thinking that man may have the desire of good without grace, but only of imperfect good; while of perfect, he could not easily have the desire with it, but that except with it they could not have it at all.

Truly, even in this way, too, they are saying that God's grace is given according to our merits, which Pelagius, in the ecclesiastical meeting in the East, condemned, because he was afraid of being condemned. For if without God's grace the desire of good begins with ourselves, merit itself will have begun â€” to which, as if of debt, comes the assistance of grace; and thus God's grace will not be bestowed freely, but will be given according to our merit. But that he might furnish a reply to the future Pelagius, the Lord does not say, "Without me you can with difficulty do anything," but He says, "Without me ye can do nothing." And, that He might also furnish an answer to these future heretics, in that very same evangelical saying He does not say, "Without me you can perfect nothing," but "do nothing. For if He had said "perfect," they might say that God's aid is necessary not for beginning good, which is of ourselves, but for perfecting it. But let them hear also the apostle. For when the Lord says, "Without me ye can do nothing," in this one word He comprehends both the beginning and the ending. The apostle, indeed, as if he were an expounder of the Lord's saying, distinguished both very clearly when he says, "Because He who hath begun a good work in you will perfect it even to the day of Christ Jesus." But in the Holy Scriptures, in the writings of the same apostle, we find more about that of which we are speaking. For we are now speaking of the desire of good, which, if they will have to begin of ourselves and to be perfected by God, let them see what they can answer to the apostle when he says, "Not that we are sufficient to think anything as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God." "To think anything," he says, â€” he certainly means, "to think anything good;" but it is less to think than to desire. Because we think all that we desire, but we do linot desire all that we think; because sometimes also we think what we do not desire. Since, then, it is a smaller thing to think than to desire, â€” for a man may think good which he does not yet desire, and by advancing may afterwards desire what before without desire he thought of, â€” how are we not sufficient as of ourselves to that which is less, that is, to the desire of something good, but our sufficiency is of God; while to that which is greater, â€” that is, to the desire of some good thing without the divine help, â€” we are sufficient of free-will ? For what the apostle says here is not, "Not that we are sufficient as of ourselves to think that which is perfect;" but he says, "to think anything," to which nothing is the contrary. And this is the meaning of what the Lord says, "Without me ye can do nothing."

1 John XV. 5. - Phil. i. 6. ^2 Cor. iii. 5.

CHAP. 20 J THE PEEPAHATION OF THE HEAKT FROM GOD, 291

Chap. 19. [ix. ] â€” He interprets the Scriptures which the Peiagiaiis malce ill use of.

But assuredly, as to what is written, " The preparation of the heart is man's part, and the answer of the tongue is from the Lord," ^ they are mistaken by an imperfect understanding, so as to think that the preparation of the heart â€” that is, the beginning of good â€” pertains to man without the aid of God's grace. Be it far from the children of promise thus to understand it! As if, when they heard the Lord saying, " Without me ye can do nothing," ^ they would convict Him by saying, " Behold, without Thee we can prepare the heart; " or when they heard from Paul the apostle, " Not that we are sufficient to think anything as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God," ^ as if they would also convict him, saying,

" Behold, we are sufficient of ourselves to prepare our heart, and thus also to think some good thing; for who can without good thought prepare his heart for good? " Be it far from any thus to understand the passage, except the proud maintainers of free-will and forsakers of the Catholic faith!

Therefore, since it is written, " It is man's part to prepare the heart, and the answer of the tongue is from the Lord," [it means] that man prepares his heart, not, however, without the aid of God, who so touches the heart that man prepares the heart. ^ But in the answer of the tongue â€” that is, in that which the divine tongue answers to the" prepared heart â€” 'man has no part; but the whole is from the Lord God.

Chap. 20. â€” God's agency is needful even in man's doings.

For as it is said, " It is man's duty to prepare his heart, and the answer of the tongue is from the Lord; " so also is it said, " Open thy mouth, and I will fill it." ^ For although,

" Prov. xvi. 1 [Vulg.]. ^ John xv. 5. ' 2 Cor. iii. 5.

* But see English Bible in loc. ^ Ps. Ixxxii. 10^ mouth, and God opens man's lips? Although God restrains them from even that absurdity where He says to Moses His servant, " I will open thy mouth, and I will instruct thee what thou oushest to speak."

In that clause, therefore, where He says, " Open thy mouth and I will fill it," it seems, as it were, that one of them pertains to man, the other to God. But in this, where it is said, " I will open thy mouth and will instruct thee," both belong to God. Why is this, except that in one of these cases He cooperates with man as the agent, in the other He does it alone?

Chap. 21. "Man does no good thing which God does not cause him to do.

Wherefore God does many good things in man which man does not do; but man does none which God does not cause that 'man may do. Accordingly, there would be no desire of good in man from the Lord if it were not a good; but if it is a benefit, we have it not save from Him who is supremely and incomunicably good. For what is the desire for good but love, of which John the apostle speaks without any ambiguity, and says, " Love is of God "? Nor is its beginning of ourselves, and its perfection of God; but if love is of God, we have the whole of it from God. Let God by aU means turn away this folly of making ourselves first in His gifts, 1 Prov. viii. [LXX.] ^ ps. li, jg, s e^. iv. 12. * 1 John iv. 7.

CHAP. 22.] GOD BEGINS AND PERFECTS GOOD IN HAN. 293

Himself last, "because " His mercy shall prevent me," And it is He to whom is faithfully and truthfully sung, " For Thou hast prevented him with the blessings of sweetness." And what is here more fitly understood than that very desire of good of which we are speaking? For good then begins to be longed for when it has begun to grow sweet. But when good is done by the fear of penalty, not by the love of righteousness, good is not yet well done. Nor is that done in the heart which seems to be done in the act, when a man would rather not do it if he could evade it with impunity. Therefore the blessing of sweetness is Grod's grace, by which is caused in us that what He prescribes to us delights us, and we desire it, " because we love it; in which if God does precede us, not only is it not perfected, but it is not even begun, from us. For, if without Him we are able to do nothing actually, we are able neither to begin nor to perfect, " because to begin, it is said, " His mercy shall prevent me; " to finish, it is said, " His mercy shall follow me."

Chap. 22. [s..]" According to whose purpose the elect are called.

What, then, is that which, in what follows, they say that they confess when they mention what they themselves think,

" That grace also assists the good purpose of every one, but that yet it does not infuse the desire of virtue into a reluctant heart "? Because they say this in such a way as if man of himself, without God's assistance, has a good purpose and a desire of virtue; and this precedent merit is worthy to be assisted by the subsequent grace of God. For they think, perchance, that the apostle thus said, " For we know that He worketh all things for good to them that love God, to them who are called according to the purpose," * so as to wish the purpose of man to be understood, which purpose, as a good merit, the mercy of the God that calleth might follow; being ignorant that it is said, " Who are called according to the purpose," so that the purpose of God, not man, may be understood; by which those whom He foreknew and predestinated, conformed to the image of His Son, He elected before the foundation of the world. For not all are called; since " many are called, few are chosen." ^ They, therefore, are called according to the purpose, who were elected before the foundation of the world. Of this purpose of God, that also was said which I have already mentioned concerning the twins Esau and Jacob, " That according to the election the purpose of God might stand, not of works, but of Him that calleth; it was said, that the elder shall serve the younger." ^ This purpose of God is also mentioned in that place where, writing to Timothy, he says, " Labour with the gospel according to the power of God, who saves us and calls us with this holy calling; not according to our works, but according to His purpose and grace, which was given to us in Christ Jesus before the eternal ages, but is now made manifest by the coming of our Saviour Jesus Christ." ^ This, then, is the purpose of God, whereof it is said, " He worketh together all things for good for those who are called according to the purpose." But subsequent grace indeed assists man's good purpose, but the purpose would not itself exist if grace did not precede. The desire of man, also, which is called good, although in beginning to exist it is aided by grace, yet does not begin without grace, but is inspired by Him of whom the apostle says, " But thanks be to God, who has given the same love for you in the heart of Titus." * If God gives the love that every one has for others, who else will give love that a man may have it for himself ?

Chap. 23. â€” Nothing Is commanded to man which is not given by God.

Since these things are so, I see that nothing is commanded to man by the Lord in the Holy Scriptures, for the sake of testing his free-will, which is not found either to begin by His goodness, or to be asked on account of the aid of grace to be shown; nor does man at all begin to be changed by the I' beginning of faith from evil to good, unless the unbought and ? gratuitous mercy of God effects this in him. Of which one recalling his thought, as we read in the Psalms, says, " Shall God forget to be gracious ? or will He restrain His mercies in His anger ? And I said, Now have I begun; this is the change of the right hand of the Most High," ^ When, therefore, he had said, "Now have I begun," he does not say. This is the changing of my will, but, "of the right hand of the Most High." Thus, therefore, let God's grace be thought upon, so that from the beginning of his good changing, even to the end of his completion, he who glorieth may glory in the Lord; because, as no one can perfect good without the Lord, so no one can begin it without the Lord. But let this be the end of this book, that the purpose of the reader may be refreshed and strengthened for what follows.

^ Matt. XX. 16. 2 Rom. ix. IL ^ 2 Tim. i. 8.

THE THIED BOOK

AUGUSTINE GOES ON TO REFUTE OTHER MATTERS WHICH ARE MALICIOUSLY OBJECTED BY THE PELAGIANS IN THE SAME LETTER SENT TO THESSALONICA; AND EXPOUNDS, IN OPPOSITION TO THEIR HERESY, "WHAT THOSE WHO ARE TRULY CATHOLIC SAY CONCERNING THE ADVANTAGE OF THE LAW; WHAT THEY TEACH OF THE EFFECT AND VIRTUE OF BAPTISM; WHAT OF THE DISCREPANCY BETWEEN THE TWO TESTAMENTS, THE OLD AND THE NEW; WHAT CONCERNING THE RIGHTEOUSNESS AND PERFECTION OF THE PROPHETS AND APOSTLES; WHAT OF THE NAMING OF SIN IN CHRIST, WHEN HE IS SAID IN THE LIKENESS OF SINFUL FLESH CONCERNING SIN TO HAVE CONDEMNED SIN, OR, HE BECAME SIN; AND FINALLY, WHAT THEY PROFESS CONCERNING THE FULFILMENT OF THE COMMANDMENTS IN THE FUTURE LIFE.

Chap. 1. ã€” Statement.

THERE still follow those things which they calumniously object to us; they do not yet begin to work out those things which they themselves think. But lest the prolixity of these writings should be an offence, I have divided those matters which they object into two Books, â€” the former of which being completed, which is the Second Book of this entire work, I am here commencing the other, and joining it as the Third to the First and Second.
Chap. 2. [ii.] â€” The misrepresentation of the Pelagians concerning the use of the old law; the Catholic judgment concerning law and grace.

They declare "that we say that the law of the Old Testament was given not for the sake of justifying the obedient, but that it might become the cause of greater sin." Certainly, they do not understand what we say concerning the law; because we say what the apostle says, whom they do not understand. For who can say that they are not justified who are obedient to the law, when, unless they were justified, they could not be obedient? But we say, that by the law is effected that what God wills to be done is heard, but that by grace is effected that the law is obeyed. "For not the hearers of the law," says the apostle, "are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified." ^ Therefore the law makes hearers of righteousness, grace makes doers. "For what was impossible to the law," says the same apostle, "in that it was weak through the flesh, God sent His son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin condemned sin in the flesh: that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit." ^ This is what we say; â€” let them pray that they may one day understand it, and not dispute so as never to understand it. For it is impossible that the law should be fulfilled by the flesh, â€” that is, by carnal presumption, â€” in which the proud, who are ignorant of the righteousness of God, â€” â€” that is, which is of God to man, that he may be righteous, â€” and desirous of establishing their own righteousness, â€” as if by their own will, unassisted from above, the law could be fulfilled, â€” are not subjected to the righteousness of God. ^ Therefore the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in them who walk not according to the flesh â€” that is, according to man ignorant of the righteousness of God and desirous of establishing his own â€” but walk according to the Spirit. But who walks according to the Spirit, except whosoever is led by the Spirit of God? "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God." *

Therefore "the letter killeth, but the Spirit maketh alive." ^ And the letter is not an evil because it killeth; but it convicts the wicked of transgression. "For the law is holy, and the commandment holy and just and good. Was, then," says he, "that which is good made death unto me? By no means; but sin, that it might appear sin, worked death in me by that which is good, that it might become above measure a sinner or a sin by the commandment." Â® This is what is the meaning of "the letter killeth." "For the sting of death is sin, but the strength of sin is the law; " ^ because by the prohibition it increases the desires of sin, and thence slays a man unless grace by coming to his assistance makes him alive.

298 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. 4.

Chap. 3.  å€“ Scriptural confirmation of the Catholic doctrine.

This is what we say; this is that about which they object to us that we say " that the law was so given as to be a cause of deeper sin." They do not hear the apostle saying, " For the law worketh wrath; for where no law is, there is no transgression; "  and, " The law was added for the sake of transgression until the seed should come to whom the promise was made; "  and, " If there had been a law given which could have given life, righteousness should altogether have been by the law; but the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe."  Hence it is that the Old Testament, from the Mount Sinai, where the law was given, gendereth to bondage, which is Agar. " Now we," says he, " are not children of the bondmaid but of the freewoman."  Therefore they are not children of the freewoman who have accepted the law of the letter, whereby they can be shown to be not only sinners, but moreover transgressors; but they who have received the Spirit of grace, whereby the law itself, holy and just and good, may be fulfilled. This is what we say: Let them attend and not contend; let them seek enlightenment and not bring false accusations.

Chap. 4. [iii.]  å€“ Misrepresentation concerning the effect of baptism.

" They assert," say they, " that baptism, moreover, does not make men new å€“ that is, does not give full remission of sins; but they contend that they are partly made children of God and partly remain children of the world å€“ that is, children of the devil."  They lie; they lay traps; they shuffle; we do not say this. For we say that all men who are children of the devil are also children of the world; but not that all children of the world are also children of the devil. Far be it from us to say that the holy fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and others of this kind, were children of the devil when they were begetting in marriage, and those believers who until now and still hereafter continue to beget. And yet we cannot contradict the Lord when He says, "The children of this world marry and give in marriage."  Some, therefore, are children of this world, and yet are not children of the devil. For although the devil is the author and source of all sins^ yet it is marry and give in marriage."  ^ Some, therefore, are children of this world, and yet are not children of the devil. For although the devil is the author and source of all sins^ yet it is

CHAP. 4.] CHILDREN OF THE WORLD. 299

2 Cor. iii. 6. Â« p^o^, vii. 12, 13. " 1 Cor. xv. 56.
not every sin that makes children of the devil; for the children of God also sin, since if they say they have no sins they deceive themselves, and the truth is not in them. But they sin in virture of that condition by which they are still children of this world; but by that grace wherewith they are the children of God they certainly sin not, because every one that is born of God sinneth not. But unbelief makes children QJL the devil; and unbelief is specially called sin, as if it were the only one, if it is not expressed what is the nature of the sin.
As when the apostle is spoken of, if it be not expressed what apostle, none is understood but Paul; because he is better known by his many epistles, and he laboured more than they all For which reason, in what the Lord said of the Holy Spirit, " He shall convict the world of sin," * He meant to be understood unbelief; for He said this when He was explaining, " Of sin because they believed not on me," ^ and when He says, " If I had not come and spoken to them, they should not have sin." ^ For He meant not that before they had no sin, but He wished to indicate that very want of faith by which they neither believed Him when He was present to them and speaking to them; since they belonged to Him of whom the apostle says, " According to the prince of the power of the air, who now worketh in the children of unbelief."' Therefore they in whom there is not faith are the children of the devil, because they have not in the inner man any reason why there should be forgiven them whatever is committed either by human infirmity, or by ignorance, or by any evil will whatever. But those are the children of God who certainly, if they should " say that they have no sin, deceive themselves, and the truth is not in them, but immediately (as it continues) "when they confess their sins" (which the children of the devil do not do, or do not do according to the faith which is peculiar to the children of God), " He is faithful and just to forgive them their sins, and to cleanse them from all unrighteousness."^ And in order that what we say may be more fully understood, let Jesus Himself be heard, who certainly was speaking to the children of God when He said:

" And if ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask Him." ^ For if these were not the children of God, He would not say to them, " Your Father which is in heaven," And yet He says that they are evil, and that they know how to give good gifts to their children. Are they, then, evil in that they are the children of God ? Away with the thought ! But they are thence evil because they are still the children of this world, although now made children of God by the pledge of the Holy Spirit.

Chap. 5. â€” Baptism puis away all sins, but it does not at once heal all infirmities.
Baptism, therefore, washes away indeed all sins absolutely all sins, whether of what are done or said or thought, whether original or added, whether such as are committed in ignorance or allowed in knowledge; but it does not take away the infirmity which the regenerate man resists when he fights the good fight, but to which he consents when as man he is overtaken in any fault; on account of the former, rejoicing with thanksgiving, but on account of the latter, groaning in the utterance of prayers. In respect of the former, saying, "What shall I render to the Lord for all which He has given me?" ^ On account of the latter, saying, "Forgive us our debts," * On account of the former, saying, "I will love Thee, Lord, my strength." ^ On account of the latter, saying, "Have mercy on me, Lord; for I am weak," ^ On account of the former, saying, "Mine eyes are ever towards the Lord; for He shall pluck my feet out of the net," ^ On account of the latter, saying, "Mine eye is troubled with wrath." ^ And innumerable passages with which the divine writings are filled, which alternately, either in exultation over God's benefits or in lamentation over our own evils, are uttered by children of God by faith as long as they are still children of this world in respect of the weakness of this life; whom, nevertheless, God distinguishes ^ Ps. cxviii. 1. ^ Ps. vi. 2. ^ Ps. xxv. 15. Â® Ps. xxxi. 9.

CHAP. 5.] SALVATION ONLY BEGUN IN BAPTISM. 301

from the children of the devil, not only by the laver of regeneration, but moreover by the righteousness of that faith which worketh by love, because the just lives of faith. And this "weakness with which we contend, with alternating failure and progress, even to the death of the body, and which is of great importance as to what it can overcome in us, shall be consumed by a second regeneration, of which the Lord says, "In the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones," ^ etc. Certainly in this passage He calls without doubt the last resurrection the regeneration, which Paul the Apostle also calls both the adoption and the redemption, where he says, "But even we ourselves, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit oursels, also groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption scil. the redemption of our body." ^ Have we not been regenerated, adopted, and redeemed by the holy washing? And yet there remains a regeneration, an adoption, a redemption, which we ought now patiently to be waiting for as to come in the end, that we may then be in no degree any longer children of this world. Whosoever, then, takes away from baptism that which we only receive by its means, corrupts the faith; but whosoever attributes to it now that which we shall receive by its means indeed, but yet hereafter, cuts off hope. For if any one should ask of me whether we have been saved by baptism, I shall not be able to deny it, since the apostle says, "He saved us by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost." ^

But if he should ask whether by the same washing He has already absolutely in every way saved us, I shall answer: It is not so. Because the same apostle also says, "For we are saved by hope; but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, we with patience wait for it." *
Therefore the salvation of man is effected in baptism, because whatever sin he has derived from his parents is remitted, or whatever, moreover, he himself has sinned on his own account before baptism; but his salvation will hereafter be such that he cannot sin at all.

Chap. 6. [iv.] â€” The calumny concerning the Old Testament and the righteous men of old.

Now if these things are so, out of these things are rebutted those which they subsequently object to us. For what Catholic would say that which they charge us with saying, " that the Holy Spirit was not the assister of virtue in the Old Testament, unless when we so understand the Old Testament in the manner in which the apostle spoke of it as gendering from the Mount Sinai to bondage " ? But because in it was prefigured the New Testament, the men of God who at that time understood this according to the ordering of the times, were indeed the stewards and bearers of the Old Testament, but are shown to be the heirs of the New. Shall we deny that he pertains to the New Testament who says, " Create in me a clean heart, God; and renew a right spirit within me " ? ^ or he who says, " He hath set my feet upon a rock, and directed my goings; and he hath put a new song in my mouth, even a hymn to our God " ? ^ or that father of the faithful before the Old Testament which is from the Mount Sinai, of whom the apostle says, " Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; yet even a man's covenant confirmed, no man disannulleth or addeth thereto. To Abraham and to his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many, but as of one; and to thy seed, which is Christ. And this I say," said he, " that the Testament confirmed by God, the law, which was made four hundred and thirty years after, does not weaken, so as to make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise." ^

Chap. 7. â€” The Neiv Testament is more ancient than the Old; but it was subsequently revealed.

Here, certainly, if we ask whether this Testament, which, he says, being confirmed by God was not weakened by the law, which was made four hundred and thirty years after, is to be understood as the New or the Old one, who can hesitate to answer the New, but it was hidden in the prophetic ciphers until the time should come wherein it should be revealed in Christ?
For if we should say the Old, what will that be which genders ' Ps. li. 10. 2 Ps. xl. 2, a 3 Q^[_ iii_ 15 ff from Mount Sinai to bondage? For there was made the law four hundred and thirty years after, by which law he asserts that this Testament of the promise of Abraham could not be weakened; and he will have this which was made by Abraham to pertain rather to us, whom he will have to be children of the freewoman, not of the bondwoman, heirs by the promise, not by the law, when he says, "For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise." That, because the law was made four hundred and thirty years after, it might enter that the offence might abound; since by sin the pride of man presuming on his own righteousness is convinced of transgression, and where sin abounded grace much more abounded, by the faith of the man now humble failing in the law and taking refuge in God's mercy. Therefore, when he had said, "For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no longer of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise," as if it might be said to him, Why then was the law made afterwards?" he added and said, "What then is the law?" To which interrogation he immediately replied, "It was added because of transgression, until the seed should come to which the promise was made." This he says again, thus: "For if they who are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise is made of none effect: because the law worketh wrath: so where there is no law, there is no transgression." What he says in the former testimony: "For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise," this he says in the latter: "For if they who are of the law be heirs, faith is made void; and the promise is made of none effect," sufficiently showing that to our faith (which certainly is of the New Testament) pertains what God gave to Abraham by promise. And what he says in the former testimony, "What then is the law?" and answered, "It was added for the sake of transgression," this he instantly added in the latter testimony, "For the law worketh wrath: so where there is no law, there is no transgression."

304 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. P.

Chap. 8. â€” All righteous men be/ore and after Abraham are children of the promise and of grace.

Whether, then, Abraham, or righteous men before him or after him, even to Moses himself, by whom was given the Testament gendering to bondage from Mount Sinai, or the rest of the prophets after him, and the holy men of God till John the Baptist, they are all children of the promise and of grace according to Isaac the son of the freewoman, not of the law, but of the promise, heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ.
Far be it from us to deny that righteous Noah and the righteous men of the earlier times, and whoever from that time till the time of Abraham could be righteous, either manifest or secret, belong to the Jerusalem which is above, who is our mother, although they are found to be earlier in time than Sarah, who bears the prophecy and figure of the free mother herself. How much more evidently, then, after Abraham, to whom that promise was declared, that he should be called the father of many nations, must all, whoever have pleased God, be esteemed the children of the promise! For not from Abraham, and the righteous men who followed him, is the generation more true; but the prophecy is found to be more plain.

Chap. 9. Who are the children of the old covenant.

But those belong to the Old Testament, which is gendering from Mount Sinai to bondage, which is Agar, who, when they have received a law which is holy and just and good, think that the letter can suffice them for life; and that they may become doers of the law, do not seek the divine mercy, but, being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and wishing to establish their own righteousness, are not subject to the righteousness of God.
Of this kind was that multitude which murmured against God in the wilderness, and made an idol; and that multitude which even in the very land of promise committed fornication after strange gods. But this multitude, even in the Old Testament itself, was strongly rebuked. They, moreover, whoever they were at that time who followed after those earthly promises alone which God promises there, and who are ignorant of that which those very promises signify under the New Testament, and kept God's commandments with the desire of gaining and with the fear of losing those promises, certainly did not observe them, but they seemed to observe themselves. For it was not faith in them that worked by love, but earthly cupidity and carnal fear. But he who thus fulfils the commandments beyond a doubt fulfils them unwillingly, and then does not do them in his heart; for he would rather not do them at all, if in respect of those things which he desires and fears he might be allowed to neglect them with impunity.

And thus, in the will itself within him, he is guilty; and it is here where God, who gives the command, looks. Such were the children of the earthly Jerusalem, concerning which the apostle says, " For she is in bondage with her children," ^ in reference to the Old Testament gendering to bondage from Mount Sinai, which is Agar. Of that same kind were they who crucified the Lord, and continued in the same unbelief. Thence there are still their children in the great multitude of the Jews, although now the New Testament as it was prophesied is made plain and confirmed by the blood of Christ; and the gospel is made known from the river where He was baptized and began His teachings, even to the ends of the earth.

And these Jews, according to the prophecies which they read, are dispersed everywhere over all the earth, that even from their writings may not be wanting a testimony to Christian truth.

Chap. 10. Æ” The old law) also given by God. The present purpose of the sacrament of the old law and the Decalogue.

And therefore God established the old covenant, because it pleased God to veil the heavenly promises in earthly promises, as if established in reward, until the fulness of time; and to give to a people which longed for earthly blessings, and therefore had a hard heart, a law, which, although spiritual, was yet written on tables of stone. Because, with the exception of the sacraments of the old books, which were only enjoined for the sake of their significance (although in them also, since they are to be spiritually understood, the law is rightly called spiritual), the other matters certainly which pertain to piety and to good living must not be referred by any interpretation

1 GaL iv. 25.

XV. u
to any significance, but are absolutely to be done as they are spoken; assuredly no one will doubt that that law of God was necessary not alone for that people at that time, but also is now necessary for us for the right ordering of our life. For if Christ took away from us that heaviest yoke of many observances, so that we are not circumcised according to the flesh, that we do not immolate victims of the cattle, that we do not rest even from necessary works on the Sabbath, retaining the seventh in the revolution of the days, and other things of this kind; but keep them as spiritually understood, and, the symbolizing shadows being removed, we are awake in the light of those very things which are signified by them; shall we therefore say, that when it is written that whoever finds another man's property of any kind that has been lost, should return it to him who has lost it,\(^1\) it does not pertain to us; and many other like things whereby people learn to live piously and uprightly; and especially the Decalogue itself, which is contained in those two tables of stone, except the carnal observance of the Sabbath, which signifies spiritual sanctification and rest? For who can say that Christians ought not to observe to obey the one God with religious obedience, not to worship an idol, not to take the name of the Lord in vain, to honour one's parents, not to commit adulteries, murders, thefts, false witness, not to covet another man's wife, or anything at all that belongs to another man? Who is so impious as to say that he does not keep those precepts of the law because he is a Christian, and is established not under the law, but under grace?

Chap. 11. Distinction between the children of the old and of the new covenant.

But there is plainly this great difference, that they who are established under the law, whom the letter killeth, do those things either with the desire of gaining, or with the fear of losing earthly happiness; and that thus they do not truly do them, since fleshly desire, by which sin is rather changed or increased, is not healed by desire of another kind. These pertain to the Old Testament, which genders to bondage; because carnal fear and desire make them servants, gospel faith and hope and love do not make them children. But they who are placed under grace, whom the Spirit quickens, do these things of faith which worketh by love in the hope of good things, not carnal but spiritual, not earthly but heavenly, not temporal but eternal; especially believing on the Mediator, by whom they do not doubt but that a Spirit of grace is ministered to them, so that they may do these things well, and that they may be pardoned when they sin. These pertain to the new covenant, are the children of promise, and are regenerated by God the Father and a free mother. Of this kind were all the righteous men of old, and Moses himself, the minister of the old covenant, the heir of the new; because of the faith whereby we live, of one and the same they lived, believing the incarnation, passion, and resurrection of Christ as future, which we believe as already accomplished; even until John the Baptist himself, as it were a certain limit of the old dispensation, who, signifying that the Mediator Himself would come, not with any shadow of the future or allegorical intimation, or with any prophetical announcement, but pointing Him out with his finger, said:

"Behold the Lamb of God; behold Him who taketh away the sin of the world." ^ As if saying, Whom many righteous men have desired to see, on whom, as about to come, they have believed from the beginning of the human race itself; concerning whom the promises were spoken to Abraham, of whom Moses wrote, of whom the law and the prophets are witnesses:

"Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world." From this John and afterwards, all things concerning Christ began to become past or present, which by all the righteous men of the previous time were believed, hoped for, desired, as future. Therefore the faith is the same as well in those who, although not yet in name, were in fact previously Christians, as in those who not only are so but are also called so; and in both there is the same grace by the Holy Spirit. Whence says the apostle: " We having the same Spirit of faith, according as it is written, I believed, therefore have I spoken; we also believe, and therefore speak." ^

' John i. 29. = 2 Cor. iv. 13.

308 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. 12.

Chap. 12. â€” The Old Testament is properly one thing â€” an instrument another.

Therefore, by a custom of speech already prevailing, the Old Testament is in one way called the law and all the prophets who prophesied until John; which is more definitely called the Old Instrument than the Old Testament; but otherwise as the apostolical authority calls it, whether expressing or implying this name. Tor when the apostle says, " Until this day, as long as Moses is read, remaineth the same veil in the reading of the Old Testament," ^ he express ses what is not revealed, because it is made of no effect in Christ. For thus certainly the Old Testament referred to the ministry of Moses. Moreover, he says, " That we should serve in the newness of the Spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter," ^ signifying that same Testament under the name of the letter. In another place also,

"Who also hath made us able ministers of the New Testament; not of the letter, but of the Spirit: for the letter killeth, but the Spirit maketh alive." ^ And here, by the mention of the New, he certainly meant the former to be understood as the Old. But much more evidently, although he did not say either old or new, he distinguished the two Testaments and the two sons of Abraham, the one of the bondwoman, the other of the free, as I have above mentioned.

For what can be more express than his saying, " Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, have ye not heard the law ?
Eor it is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a freewoman. But he who was of the bondwoman was born after the flesh; but he of the freewoman was by promise. Which things are in allegory; for these are the two covenants; the one in the Mount Sinai, gendering to bondage, which is Agar. For Sinai is a mountain in Arabia, which is associated with Jerusalem which now is, for it is in bondage with her children. But Jerusalem that is above is free, which is our mother "? ^ What is more clear, what more certain, what more remote from all obscurity and ambiguity to the children of the promise? And a little after,
" Now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise." Â® Also a little after, " But we, brethren, are not

CHAP. 13.] WHY THE COVENANTS ARE CALLED OLD AND NEW. 309

children of the bondwoman, but of the free," ^ with the liberty with which Christ has made us free. Let us, therefore, choose whether to call the righteous men of old the children of the bondwoman or of the free. Be it far from us to say, of the bondwoman; therefore if of the free, they pertain to the new covenant in the Holy Spirit, whom, as making alive, the apostle opposes to the killing letter. For on what ground do they not belong to the grace of the new covenant, from whose words and looks we convict and rebut such most frantic and ungrateful enemies of the same grace as these?

Chap. 13. â€” Why one of the covenants is called old, the other new.

But some one will say. In what way is that called the old which was given by Moses four hundred and thirty years after; and that called the new which was given so many years before to Abraham? Let him who on this subject is disturbed, not litigiously but earnestly, first understand that when from its earlier time one is called old and the other new, it is their revelation that is considered in their names, not their institution. Because the Old Testament was revealed through Moses, by whom the law was given, holy and just and good, whereby should be effected not the doing away but the knowledge of the sin, by which the proud might be convicted who were desirous of establishing their own righteousness, as if they had no need of divine help; and being made guilty of the letter, might flee to the Spirit of grace, not to be justified by their own righteousness, but by that of God â€” that is, by the righteousness which was given to them of God. For as the same apostle says, " By the law is the knowledge of sin. But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and by the prophets." ^ Because the law, by the very fact that in it no man is justified, affords a witness to the righteousness of God. For that in the law no man is justified before God is manifest, because "the just by faith lives." Thus, therefore, although the law does not justify the wicked convicted of transgression, it sends to the God who justifieth, and thus affords a testimony to the righteousness of God. Moreover, the prophets offer the testimony to 1 Gal. iv. 31. Rom. iii. 20, 21. gI. iii. 11.

God’s righteousness by fore-announcing Christ, "who is made unto us wisdom from God, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: that, as it is written, he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." For that law was kept hidden from the beginning, when nature itself could convict wicked men, who did to others what they would not have done to themselves. But the revelation of the New Testament in Christ was made when He was manifested in the flesh, wherein appeared the righteousness of God â€” that is, which is to men from God. For hence he says, "But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested." This is the reason for which the former is called the Old Testament, because it was revealed in the earlier time; and the latter the New, because it was revealed in the later time. Again, because the Old Testament pertains to the old man, from which it is necessary that a man should make a beginning; but the New to the new man, when a man ought to pass from his old state. Thus, in the former are earthly promises, in the latter heavenly promises; because this pertained to God’s mercy, that no one should think that even earthly felicity of any kind whatever could be conferred on anybody, save from the Lord, who is the Creator of all things. But if God is worshipped for the sake of that earthly happiness, the worship is that of a slave, pertaining to the children of the bondmaid; but if for the sake of God Himself, that in the life eternal God may be all things in all, it is a liberal service pertaining to the children of the freewoman, who is our mother eternal in the heavens â€” who first appeared, as it were, barren, when she had not any children manifest; but now we see what was prophesied concerning her: "Eejoice, thou barren, that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not: for there are many children of the desolate more than of her who has an husband," that is, more than of that Jerusalem, who in a certain manner is married in the bond of the law, and is in bondage with her children. In the time, then, of the Old Testament, we say that the Holy Spirit, in those who even then were the children of promise according to Isaac, was not only an assistant, which these men think is sufficient for their opinion, but also a bestower of virtue; and this they deny, attributing it rather to their free-will, in contradiction to those fathers who knew how to cry unto God with truthful piety,

"I will love Thee, Lord, my strength." ^
Chap. 14. [v.] â€” Calumny concerning the righteousness of the prophets and apostles.

They say, moreover, "that all the apostles or prophets are not absolutely defined as holy by us, but that we say that they were less wicked in comparison of those that were worse, and that this is the righteousness to which God affords His testimony; that, as the prophet says that Sodom was justified in comparison of the Jews, so also we say that the saints exercised some goodness in comparison of blameworthy men." Be it far from us to say such things; but either they are not able to understand, or they are unwilling to observe, or, for the sake of misrepresentation, they pretend that they do not know what we say. Let them hear, therefore, either themselves, or rather those whom, as inexperienced and unlearned persons, they are striving to deceive. Our faith — that is, the Catholic faith — distinguishes the righteous from the unrighteous not by the law of works, but by the law itself of faith, because the just by faith lives. By which distinction it results that the man who leads his life without murder, without theft, without false-witness, without coveting other men's goods, giving due honour to his parents, chaste even to continence from all carnal intercourse whatever, even conjugal, most liberal in almsgiving, most patient of injuries; who not only does not deprive another of his goods, but does not even ask again for what has been taken away from himself; or even who has sold all his own property and appropriated it to the poor, and possesses nothing which belongs to him as his own; â€” yet with such a character as this, laudable as it seems to be, if he has not a true and catholic faith in God, must depart from this life to condemnation. But another, who has good works of a true faith which worketh by love, who — yet not as the former wisely restraining â€” maintains his continency in the respectability of wedlock; pays and repays the debt of carnal connection not only for the sake of offspring, but solely for the sake of pleasure has intercourse, although only with his wife, which the apostle allows to those that are married as pardonable; does not receive injuries with so much patience, but is raised into anger with the desire of vengeance, although, in order that he may say, "As we also forgive our debtors," he forgives when he is asked; who possesses property, giving thence indeed some alms, but not as the former so liberal; who does not take away what belongs to another, but, although by ecclesiastical, not by civil judgment, yet contends for his own: certainly such a man, who seems so inferior to the former in character, on account of the true faith which he has in God, by which he lives, and according to which in all his wrong-doings he himself praises God in all his good works, giving to himself the shame, to God the glory, and receiving from Him both forgiveness of sins and love for whatever is rightly done, he shall be delivered for this life, and depart to be received.

into the company of those who shall reign with Christ. Wherefore, if not on account of his faith? Which, although without works it saves no man (for it is itself not a spurious faith which worketh by love), yet by it even sins are loosed, because the just by faith liveth; but without it, even those things which seem good works are turned into sins: "For every thing which is not of faith is sin." And it is so on account of this great difference, that although with no possibility of doubt a persevering integrity of virginity is preferable to conjugal chastity, yet a woman even twice married, if she be a Catholic, is preferred to a professed virgin that is a heretic; nor is she in such wise preferred as being better in God's kingdom, but as being there, while the other is not there at all. For both the former, whom we have described as being of better character if a true faith be his, surpasses that second one, although both will be in heaven; yet if the faith be wanting to him, he is so surpassed by him that he himself is not there at all.

Chap. 15. â€” The perfection of apostles and prophets.

Since, then, all righteous men, both the more ancient and the apostles, lived of a right faith which is in Christ Jesus

1 Rom. xiv. 23.

CHAP. 16.] QUALIFIED PERFECTION TO BE SOUGHT. 313

our Lord, and had with their faith lives so holy, that although they might not be of such perfect virtue in this life as that which should be after this life, yet whatever of sin might creep in from human infirmity might be constantly done away by the piety of their faith itself; whence it results that, in comparison of the wicked whom God will condemn, it must be said that these were righteous, since by their pious faith they were so far removed apart from those wicked men that the apostle cries out, "What part hath he that believeth with an infidel?" But it is plain that the Pelagians, these modem heretics, seem to themselves to be religious lovers and praisers of the saints, if they do not dare to say that they were of an imperfect virtue; although that elected vessel confesses this, who, considering in what state he still was, and that the body which is corrupted drags down the soul, says, "Not that I liave already attained or am yet perfect; brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended." And yet a little after, he who had denied himself to be perfect says, "Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded," in order that he might show that, according to the measure of this life, there is a certain perfection, and that to that perfection this also is to be attributed, even although any one may know that he is not yet perfect. For what is more perfect, or what was more excellent, than the holy priests among the ancient people? And yet God prescribed to them to offer sacrifice first of all for their own sins. And what is more holy among the new people than the apostles? And yet the Lord prescribed to them to say in their prayer, "Forgive us our debts." For all the pious, therefore, who lie under this burden of a corruptible flesh, and groan in the infirmity of this life of theirs, there is one hope: "We have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: and He is the propitiation for our sins." *

Chap. 16. [vi.] â€” Misrepresentation concerning si7i in Christ.

They have not a righteous advocate, who are (even if that were the only difference) distinguished absolutely and widely from the righteous. Be it far from us to say, as they themselves slanderously affirm, that this just Advocate "spoke falsely by the necessity of the flesh; " but we say that He, in the likeness of sinful flesh and in respect of sin, condemned sin.

And they, perchance not understanding this, and being blinded by the desire of misrepresentation, and ignorant of the number of ways in which the name of sin is accustomed to be used in the Holy Scriptures, declare that we affirm sin of Christ. Therefore we assert that Christ both had no sin, neither in soul nor in the body; and that, by taking upon Him flesh in the likeness of sinful flesh, concerning sin He condemned sin.
And this assertion, somewhat obscurely made by the apostle, is explained in two ways, â€” either that the likenesses of things are accustomed to be called by the names of those things to which they are like, so that the apostle may be understood to have intended to call the likeness itself of sinful flesh by the name of sin; or that the sacrifices for sins were under the law called sins, all which things were a figure of the flesh of Christ, which is the true and only sacrifice for sins, â€” not only for those which are all washed away in baptism, but also for those which afterwards creep in from the weakness of this life, on account of which the universal Church daily cries in prayer to God, " Forgive us our debts; " and they are forgiven us by means of that singular sacrifice for sins which the apostle, speaking according to the law, did not hesitate to call sin. Whence, moreover, is that much plainer passage of his, and not uncertain by any twofold way of ambiguity, " We beseech you in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God. He made Him to be sin for us, who had not known sin; that we might be the righteousness of God in Him."^ For the passage which I have above mentioned, "He condemned sin in respect of sin," because it was not said, "In respect of his sin," may be understood by any one of them as if He said that He condemned sin in respect of the sin of the Jews; because in respect of their sin who crucified Him, it happened that He shed His blood for the remission of sins. But this passage, where God is said to have made Christ Himself sin, who had not known sin, does not seem to me to be more fittingly understood than that Christ was made a sacrifice for sins, and on this account was called sin.

1 2 Cor. V. 20, 21.
Chap. 17. [vii.] â€” Their calumny about the fulfilment of precepts in the life to come.

And who can bear their objecting to us, " that we say that after the resurrection such shall be our progress, that there men can begin to fulfil God's commands, which they would not do here; " since we say that there there will be no sin at all, no struggle with any desire of sin; as if they themselves would dare to deny this ? That wisdom also, and the knowledge of God, is then perfected in us, and that in the Lord there is such rejoicing that it is a full and a true security, who will deny, unless he is so averse from the truth that on this very account he cannot attain unto it ? But these things will not be in precepts, but in the shape of a reward of those precepts which should here be observed; the neglect of which precepts, indeed, does not lead thither to the reward. But here the grace of God gives the desire of keeping His commandments; and if anything in these commandments is less perfectly observed. He forgives it on account of what we say in prayer, as well "Thy will be done," as "Forgive us our debts." Here, then, it is prescribed that we sin not; there, the reward is that we cannot sin. Here, the precept is that we obey not the desires of sin; there, the reward that we have no desires of sin. Here is the precept, " Understand, ye senseless among the people; and ye fools, be at some time wise; " ^ there, the reward is full wisdom and perfect knowledge. " For we see now through a glass in an enigma," says the apostle, " but then face to face: now I know in part; but then I shall know even as also I am known." ^ Here, the precept is, " Exult unto the Lord, our helper," ^ and, " Rejoice, ye righteous, in the Lord; " * there, the reward is to rejoice with a perfect and unspeakable joy. Lastly, in the precept it is written, " Blessed are they which hunger and thirst after righteousness; " but in the reward, " Because they shall be filled." ^ Whence, I ask, shall they be filled, except with what they hunger and thirst after ? Who, then, is so abhorrent, not only from the divine perception, but also from the human perception, as to say that in man there can be such righteousness while he is hungering and thirsting for it, as there will be when he shall be filled with it ? But when we are hungering and thirsting after righteousness, if the faith of Christ is watchful in us, what is it to be believed that we are hungering and thirsting for, save Christ ? " For He is made \ unto us wisdom from God, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption; that, as it is written. He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." ^ And because we only believe on Him not seeing Him, therefore we thirst and hunger after righteousness. For as long as we are in the body, we wander from the Lord; for we walk by faith, not by appearance. But when we shall see Him, and attain certainly to the appearance, we shall rejoice with joy unspeakable; and then we shall be filled with righteousness, since now we say to Him with pious longing, " I shall be satisfied when Thy glory shall be manifested." ^

Chap. 18. â€” Perfection of righteousness and full security was not even in Paul in tlds life.

But how impudent I do not say, but how insane, is the pride which, not yet being equal to the angels of God, thinks itself already able to have a righteousness equal to the angels of God, and does not consider so great and holy a man, who assuredly hungered and thirsted after that very perfection of righteousness itself, when he was unwilling to be lifted up by the greatness of his revelations, and was not left that he might not be lifted up to his own choice and will, but received " the thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan, to buffet him; on which account he besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from him, and the Lord said unto him. My grace is sufficient for thee, for strength is made perfect in weakness," ^ What strength, save that to which it pertains not to be lifted up ? And who doubts that this belongs to righteousness ? The angels of God, then, are endowed with this perfection of righteousness, since they always behold the face of the Father, and thus of the entire Trinity, because they see through the Son, in the Holy Spirit, But nothing is more lofty than that revelation, nor yet does any of the angels in that contemplation of rejoicing ones find a messenger of Satan needful that he may be buffetted by him, lest so great a magnitude of revelation should lift him up. The Apostle Paul certainly had not yet that perfection of virtue, nor yet was he equal to the angels of God; but there was in Him the weakness of lifting himself up, which also had to be checked by the angel of Satan, lest he should be lifted up by the magnitude of his revelations. However, then, the first lifting up may have cast down Satan, yet that great Physician, who well knew how to make use of even evil things against the mischief of elation, applied from the angel of Satan a wholesome, although a painful, medicament as an antidote, used to be made even of serpents against the poisons of serpents. What, then, is the meaning of " My grace is sufficient for thee," except that you may not by giving way succumb to the buffet of the messenger of Satan ? And what is " Strength is made perfect in weakness," except that in that place of weakness hitherto may be the perfection of virtue, so that in the very presence of infirmity lifting up may be repressed ? Which infirmity assuredly shall be healed by future immortality. For how is that soundness to be called perfect where medicine is still needful, even from the buffet of an angel of Satan?

1 1 Cor. i. 30, 31. ^ Ps. xvii. 15. ^ 2 Cor. xii. 7,

CHAP. 10.] EVEN PAUL'S RIGHTEOUSNESS NOT PERFECT. 317

Chap. 19. "In what sense the righteousness of man in this life is said to be perfect.

From this it results that the virtue which is now in the righteous man is named perfect up to this point, that to its perfection pertains even both the acknowledgment in truth of imperfection, and its confession in humility. For, in respect of this infirmity, that little righteousness of man's is perfect

according to its measure, when it, moreover, understands what is wanting to it. And therefore the apostle calls himself both perfect and imperfect," imperfect, to wit, in the thought of how much is wanting to him for the righteousness for whose fulness he is still hungering and thirsting, but perfect in that he does not blush to confess his own imperfection, and goes forward in good that he may attain. As we can say that the wayfarer is come to his end whose approach is well forwarded, although his intention is not carried out unless his arrival be actually effected. Therefore, when he had said, " According to the righteousness which is in the law, I am one who has been blameless," he immediately added, " What things were gain to me, those I counted but loss for Christ's sake. Yea, doubtless, and I count all things to be loss for the sake of the excellent knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord: for whose sake I have believed all things not only to be losses, but I have thought them to be even as dung, that I might gain Christ and be found in Him, not having my own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is by the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God in faith." ^ See ! the apostle does not certainly say falsely, that according to the righteousness which is of the law he was without reproach; and yet those things which were gain to him, he casts away for Christ's sake, and thinks them losses, injuries, dung. And not only these things, but all other things which he mentioned previously; on account of the knowledge, not of any kind, but, as he himself says, the excellent knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord, which, beyond a doubt, he had as yet in faith, but not yet in sight. For then the knowledge of Christ will be excellent, when He shall be so revealed that what is believed is seen. Whence, in another place, he thus says, " For ye have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God, When Christ, your life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory." ^ Hence, also, the Lord Himself says, " He who loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him." ^ Hence John the Evangelist says, " Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it has not yet appeared what we shall be: but we know, that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is." * Then shall the knowledge of Christ be excellent. For now it is, as it were, hidden away in faith; but it does not yet appear excellent in sight.

Chap. 20. â€“ Why the righteousness which is of the law is undervalued by Paul.

Therefore the blessed Paul casts away those past attainments of his righteousness, as disadvantages and dung, that he may win Christ and be found in Him, not having his own righteousness, which is of the law. Wherefore his own, if it is of the law ? For that law is the law of God. Who has denied this, save Marcion and Manichseus, and such like pests ? Since, then, that is the law of God, he says it is his own righteousness which is of the law; and this righteousness of his own he would not have, but cast it forth as dung. Why so, except that it is this which I have above demonstrated, that those are under the law who, being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and going about to establish their own, are not subject to the righteousness of God ? For they think that, by the strength of their own will, they will fulfil the commands of the law; and wrapped up in that pride of theirs, they are not converted to the assistance of grace. Thus the letter killeth them either openly, as being guilty to themselves, by not doing what the law commands, or by thinking that they do it, although they do it not with love of the Spirit, which is of God. Thus they remain either plainly wicked or deceitfully righteous, â€“ manifestly cut off in open unrighteousness, or foolishly elated in deceitful righteousness. And by this means â€“ marvellous indeed, but yet true â€“ the righteousness which is in the law, even of the law, does not fulfil the righteousness of the law, but that which is in the Spirit of grace. Because the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in those, as it is written, who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit. But, according to the righteousness which is in the law, the apostle says that he was blameless in the flesh, not in the Spirit; and he says that the righteousness which is of the law was his, not God's. It must be understood, therefore, that the righteousness of the law is not fulfilled according to the righteousness which is in the law or of the law, that is, according to the righteousness of man, but according to the righteousness which is in the Spirit of grace, therefore according to the righteousness of God, that is, which man has from God. Which may be thus more clearly and briefly stated: That the righteousness of the law is not fulfilled when the law commands, and man as it were of his own strength obeys; but when the Spirit aids, and man's free-will, but freed by the grace of God, performs. Therefore the righteousness of the law is to command what is pleasing to God, to forbid what is displeasing; but the righteousness in the law is to obey the letter, and beyond it to seek for no assistance of God for holy living. For when he had said, " Not having my own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is by the faith of Christ," he added, "Which is from God." That, therefore, is itself the righteousness of God, which the proud being ignorant of, they go about to establish their own; for it is not called the righteousness of God because by it God is righteous, but because man has it from God.

Chap. 21. â€” That the righteousness is never perfected in this life.

Now, according to this righteousness of God, that is, which we have from God, faith now worketh by love. But it worketh that, in what way man can attain to Him on whom now, not seeing, he believes; and when he shall see Him, then shall be perfected even love itself. Because it is said with excessive folly, that God is loved as much before He is seen, as He will be loved when He is seen. Further, if in this life, as no religious person doubts, the more we love God, so much the more righteous we certainly are, who can doubt that pious and true righteousness will then be perfected when the love of God shall be perfect? Then the law, therefore, shall be fulfilled; so that nothing at all is wanting to it, of which law, according to the apostle, the fulfilling is Love. And thus, when he had said, " Not having my own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is by the faith of Jesus Christ, which is the righteousness from God in faith," he then added, "â– That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings." ^ All these things were not yet full and perfect in the apostle; but, as if he were placed on the way, he was running towards their fulness and perfection. For how had he already perfectly known Christ, who says in another place, " Now I know in part; but then I shall know even as I am known " ? ^ And how had he already perfectly known the power of His resurrection, to whom it remained to know it yet more fully by experience

1 Phil. iii. 9, 10. n Cor. xiii. 12.
CHAP. 22.] HUMAN RIGHTeousNESS AND PERFeCTION. 821

at the time of the resurrection of the flesh? And how had he perfectly known already the fellowship of His suffering, if he had not yet experienced for him the suffering of death?

Finally, he adds and says, "If in any manner I may attain unto the resurrection of the dead." ^ And then he says, "Not that I have already received or am already perfected."

What, then, does he confess that he has not yet received, and in what is he not yet perfected, except in that righteousness which is of God, which he desired, not willing to have his own righteousness, which is of the law? For hence he was speaking, and such was the reason for his saying these things in resistance to the enemies of the grace of God, for the bestowal of which Christ was crucified, and of which race of enemies are also these.

Chap. 22. ã€” Nature of human righteousness and perfection.

For from the place in which he undertook to say these things, he thus began, "Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers, beware of the concision. For we are the circumcision, who serve God in the Spirit," ã€” or, as some codices have it, "who serve God the Spirit," or "the Spirit of God," ã€” "and glory in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." ^

Here it is manifest that he is speaking against the Jews, who, observing the law carnally, and going about to establish their own righteousness, were slain by the letter, and not made alive by the Spirit, and gloried in themselves while the apostles and all the children of the promise were glorying in Christ. Then he added, "Although I may have confidence in the flesh. If any one else thinks that he has confidence in the flesh, I more." ^ And enumerating all things which have glory according to the flesh, he ended at that point where he says,

"According to the righteousness which is in the law, blameless." And when he had said that he regarded all these things as altogether loss and disadvantage and dung that he might gain Christ, he added the passage which I am treating about, "And be found in Him, not having my own righteousness, but that which is by the faith of Christ, which is from God." He confessed that he had not yet received the perfection of this righteousness, which will not be except in that excellent knowledge of Christ, on account of which he said that all things were loss to him; and he confessed, therefore, that he was not yet perfect. "But I follow on," said he, "if I may apprehend that in which I also am apprehended of Christ Jesus." "I may apprehend that in which I also am apprehended," is much the same as, "I may know, even as I also am known." "Brethren," says he, "I count not myself to have apprehended: but one thing, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forward to those which are before, I follow on according to the purpose to the reward of the supreme calling of God in Christ Jesus." The order of the words is, "But I follow one thing." Of which one thing the Lord also is well understood to have admonished Martha, where he says, "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: but one thing is needful." The apostle, wishing to apprehend this as if established on the way, said that he followed on to the reward of the lofty calling of God in Christ Jesus. For who can delay when he would apprehend that which he declares that he is following, that he shall then have a righteousness equal to the righteousness of the holy angels, none of whom certainly does any messenger of Satan buffet lest he should be lifted up with the greatness of his revelations? Then, admonishing those who might think themselves already perfect with the fulness of that righteousness, he says, "Let as many of us, therefore, as are perfect, be thus minded." As if he should say, If, according to the capacity of mortal man for the little measure of this life, we are perfect, let us understand that this also pertains to that very perfection, that we perceive that we are not yet perfected in that angelical righteousness which we shall have in the manifestation of Christ. And if in anything," he said, "ye be otherwise minded, God shall also reveal even this unto you." How, save to those that are walking and advancing in the way of the faith, until that wandering be finished and they come to the actual vision? Whence following on, he added, "Nevertheless, whereunto we have already attained,

CHAP. 23.] ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF IMPERFECTION. 323

let US walk therein." Then he concludes that they should be bewared of, of whom this passage resumed the beginning of his address. "Brethren, be imitators of me, and mark them which so walk as ye have our example. For many walk, of whom I have spoken often, and now tell you even weeping, whose end is destruction," and the rest. These are the very ones of whom, in the beginning, he had said, "Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers," and what follows. Therefore all are enemies of the cross of Christ who, going about to establish their own righteousness, which is of the law, â€” that is, where only the letter commands, and the Spirit does not fulfil, â€” are not subject to the law of God. For if they who are of the law be heirs, faith is emptied of its meaning. "If righteousness is by the law, then Christ has died in vain: then is the offence of the cross done away." And thus those are enemies of the cross of Christ who say that righteousness is by the law, to which it pertains to command, not to assist. But the grace of God through Jesus Christ the Lord in the Holy Spirit helpeth our infirmity.
Chap. 23. â€” There is no true righteousness without the faith of the grace of Christ.

Wherefore he who lives according to the righteousness which is in the law, without the faith of the grace of Christ, as the apostle declares that he lived blameless, must be accounted to have no true righteousness; not because the law is not true and holy, but because to wish to obey the letter which commands, without the Spirit of God which quickens, as if of the strength of free-will, is not true righteousness.

But the righteousness according to which the righteous man lives of faith, since man has it from God by the Spirit of grace, is true righteousness. And although this is not undeservedly said to be perfect in some righteous men, according to the capacity of this life, yet it is but little to that great righteousness which the equality of the angels receives. And he who had not yet possessed this, on the one hand, in respect of that which was already in him, said that he was perfect; and in respect of that which was still wanting to him, said that he was imperfect. But manifestly that lower degree of righteousness makes deserving, that higher kind becomes a reward. Whence he who does not strive after the former does not attain unto the latter, "Wherefore, after the resurrection of man, to deny that there will be a fulness of righteousness, and to think that the righteousness in the body of that life will be such as it can be in the body of this death, is characteristic of special folly. But it is most true that men do not there begin to fulfil those commands of God which here they have been unwilling to obey. For there will be the fulness of the most perfect righteousness, yet not of men striving after what is commanded, and making gradual endeavours after that fulness; but in the twinkling of an eye, even as shall be that resurrection of the dead itself, because that greatness of perfect righteousness will be given as a reward to those who here have obeyed the commandments, and will not itself be commanded to them as a thing to be accomplished. But I should in such wise say they have done the commandments, that we might remember that to these very commandments belongs the prayer in which the holy children of promise daily say with truth, "Thy will be done," ^ and "Forgive us our debts." ^

Chap. 24. [viii.] â€” There are three principal heads in the Pelagian heresy.

When, then, the Pelagians with these testimonies and words of truth of this kind are pressed, not to deny original sin; not to say that the grace of God whereby we are justified is not given freely, but according to our merits; nor to say that in mortal man, however holy and well doing, there is so great righteousness that even after the washing of regeneration, until he finishes this life of his, forgiveness of sins is not necessary to him, â€” therefore when they are pressed not to make these three assertions, and by their means alienate men who believe therein from the grace of the Saviour, and persuade the lifted-up unto pride to go headlong unto the judgment of the devil, they introduce the clouds of other questions in which their impiety "in the sight of men more simple minded, whether that they are more slow or less instructed in the sacred writings " may be concealed. These are the misty questions of the praise of the creature, of the praise of marriage, of the praise of the law, of the praise of free-will, of the praise of the saints; as if any one of our people were in the habit of disparaging those things, and not rather of announcing all things with due praises to the honour of the Creator and Saviour. But even the creature does not desire in such wise to be praised as to be unwilling to be healed. And the more marriage is to be praised, the less is to be attributed to it the shameful lust of the flesh, which is not of the Father, but of the world; and which assuredly marriage found and did not make in men; because, moreover, it is actually in very many without marriage, and if nobody had sinned marriage itself might be without it. And the law, holy and just and good, is neither grace itself, nor is anything rightly done by it without grace; because the law is not given that it may give life, but it was added because of transgression, that it might conclude all persons convicted under sin, and that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe."

And the free-will taken captive does not avail, except for sin; but for righteousness, unless divinely set free and aided, it does not avail. And thus, also, all the saints, whether from that ancient Abel to John the Baptist, or from the apostles themselves up to this time, and henceforth even to the end of the world, are to be praised in the Lord, not in themselves. Because the word, even of those earlier ones, is, "In the Lord shall my soul be praised." ^ And the word of the later ones is,

"By the grace of God I am what I am." ^ And to all pertains,

"That he that glorieth may glory in the Lord." And it is the common confession of all, "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." *

Chap. 25. [ix.] "He shows that the opinion of the Catholics is the mean between that of the Manichceans and Pelagians, and refutes both.

But since, in these five particulars which I have set forth, in which they seek lurking-places, and from which they weave misrepresentations, they are forsaken and convicted by the divine writings, they have contrived to deter those whom they could by the hateful name of Manichceans, lest in opposition to their most perverse teachings their ears should be

conformed to the truth; because doubtless the Manichseans blasphemously condemn the three former of those five dogmas, saying that neither the human creature, nor marriage, nor the law was ordained by the supreme and true God. But they do not receive what the truth says, that sin took its origin from free-will, and that from it is all evil, whether of angel or man; because they prefer to believe, in their turning aside from God, that the nature of evil was always evil, and coeternal with God. They, moreover, attack the holy patriarchs and prophets with as many execrations as they can. This is the way in which the modern heretics think, that by objecting the name of Manichaæans, they evade the force of truth. But they do not evade it; because it follows them up, and overturns at once the Manichseans and Pelagians. For in that a man is born, because there is something good, so far as he is a man, he condemns the Manichean, and praises the Creator; but in so far as he derives original sin, he condemns the Pelagian and has need of a Saviour. For even because that nature of his is said to be healable, it repels both teachings; because it would not, on the one hand, have need of medicine if it were sound, which is opposed to the Pelagian, nor could it be healed at all if the evil in it were eternal and immutable, which is opposed to the Manichsean. Moreover, in that to marriage, which we praise as ordained of God, we do not say that the lust of the flesh is to be attributed, this is both contrary to the Pelagians, who make this lust itself a matter of praise, and contrary to the Manichseans, who attribute it to a foreign and evil matter, when it really is an evil accidental to our nature, not to be separated by the disjoining of God, but to be healed by the mercy of God. Moreover, in that we say that the law, holy and just and good, was given not for the justification of the wicked, but for the conviction of the proud, for the sake of transgressions, this is, on the one hand, opposed to the Manichseans, that according to the apostle the law is praised; and on the other opposed to the Pelagians, in that, in accordance with the apostle, no one is justified by the law; and therefore, for the sake of making alive those whom the letter has killed, that is, whom the law, enjoining good, makes guilty by transgressions, the Spirit of grace freely brings aid.

Also in that we say that the will is free in evil, but for doing good it must be made free by God's grace, this is opposed to the Pelagians; but that we say it originated from that which previously was not evil, this is opposed to the Manichaeans. Again, that we honour the holy patriarchs and prophets with praises due to them in God, is in opposition to the Manicheans; but that we say that even to them, however righteous and pleasing to God they might have been, the propitiation of the Lord was necessary, this is in opposition to the Pelagians.

The Catholic faith, therefore, finds them both, as it does also other heretics, in opposition to it, and convicts both by the authority of the divine testimonies and by the light of truth.
Chap. 26. [x.] “The Pelagians still strive after a hiding-place, by introducing the needless question of the origin of the soul.

The Pelagians, indeed, add to the clouds which envelop their lurking-places the unnecessary questions concerning the origin of the soul, for the purpose of erecting a hiding-place by disturbing manifest things by the obscurity of other matters. For they say "that we observe the continuous propagation of souls with the continuous propagation of sin."

And where and when they have read this, either in the addresses or in the "writings of those who maintain the Catholic faith against this, I do not know; because, although I find something written by Catholics on the subject, yet the defence of the truth had not yet been undertaken against those men, neither was there any anxiety to answer them. But this I say, that according to the Holy Scriptures original sin is so manifest, and that this is put away in infants by the laver of regeneration is confirmed by such antiquity and authority of the Catholic faith, notorious by such a clear concurrent testimony of the Church, that what is argued by the inquiry or affirmation of anybody concerning the origin of the soul, if it is contrary to this, cannot be true. Wherefore, whoever builds up, either concerning the soul or any other obscure matter, any edifice whence he may destroy this, which is true, best founded, and best known, whether he is a son or an enemy of the Church, must either be corrected or avoided. But let this be the end of this Book, that the things which follow may have another beginning.

THE FOURTH BOOK.

STATEMENT THAT THE SAINTS IN THIS LIFE HAD NOT SIN. AUGUSTINE SHOWS BOTH HERESIES, THAT OF THE MANICHIEANS AND OF THE PELAGIANS, FROM BOTH SIDES, TO BE OPPOSED AND EQUALLY ODIOUS TO THE CATHOLIC FAITH, WHEREBY WE PROFESS, FIRST OF ALL, THAT THE NATURE CREATED BY A GOOD GOD WAS GOOD, BUT THAT, NEVERTHELESS, IT IS IN NEED OF A SAVIOUR BECAUSE OF ORIGINAL SIN, WHICH PASSED INTO ALL MEN FROM THE TRANSGRESSIONS OF THE FIRST MAN, THEN AGAIN, THAT MARRIAGE IS GOOD, TRULY INSTITUTED BY GOD, BUT THAT THAT VERY LUST IS EVIL WHICH WAS ASSOCIATED WITH MARRIAGE BY SIN; ALSO THAT THE LAW
OF GOD IS GOOD, BUT IN SUCH WISE AS ONLY TO MANIFEST SIN, NOT TO TAKE IT AWAY; THAT FREE-WILL IS ASSUREDLY IMPLANTED INTO THE NATURE OF MAN, BUT THAT NOW, HOWEVER, IT IS SO ENSLAVED THAT IT DOES NOT AVAIL TO THE DOING OF RIGHTEOUSNESS, UNLESS WHEN IT SHALL HAVE BEEN MADE FREE BY GRACE; BUT THAT THE SAINTS, WHETHER OF THE OLD OR NEW TESTAMENT, WERE INDEED ENDUED WITH TRUE RIGHTEOUSNESS, BUT NOT PERFECT, NOT SO FULL THAT THEY SHOULD BE FREE FROM ALL SIN. IN CONCLUSION, HE BRINGS FORWARD THE TESTIMONIES OF CYPRIAN
AND AMBROSE ON BEHALF OF THE CATHOLIC FAITH, SOME CONCERNING ORIGINAL SIN, OTHERS ABOUT THE ASSISTANCE OF GRACE, AND THE LAST OF THE IMPERFECTION OF PRESENT RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Chap. 1. â€” The subterfuges of the Pelagians are five.

AFTER the matters which I have considered, and to which I have answered, they repeat the same things as those contained in the letter which I have refuted, but in a different manner. For before, they put them forward as objecting to us things which we think as it were falsely; but afterwards, as explaining what they themselves think, they have retorted the same things from the opposite side, adding two certain points which they had not mentioned: that is, "that they say that baptism is necessary for all ages," and "that by Adam death passed upon us, not guilt," which things must also themselves be considered in their own place. Hence, because in the former Book which I have just finished I said that they alleged hindrances of five matters in which lurk their dogmas hostile to God's grace and to the Catholic faith, they, the praise, to wit, of the creature, the praise of marriage, the praise of the law, the praise of free-will, the praise of the saints, I think it is more convenient to make special discrimination of all that they maintain, the contrary of which they object to us, and to show which of those things pertain to any of those five, that so my answer may be by that very distinction clearer and briefer.

CHAP. 2.] POINTS OF PELAGIAN DOCTRINE. 329

Chap. 2. The praise of the creature.

They describe the praise of the creature, inasmuch as it pertains to the human race of which the question now is, in three sentences: 'That God is the Creator of all those that are born, and that the sons of men are God's work, and that all sin descends not from nature, but from the will." To this praise of the creature they add, "that they say that baptism is necessary for every age, that," namely, "that creature may be adopted among the children of God, not because it derives anything from its parents which must be purified in the laver of regeneration." To this praise they associate also, "that they say that Christ the Lord was sprinkled with no stain of sin as far as pertains to His infancy;" because they assert that His flesh was most pure from all contagion of sin, not by His own excellence and singular grace, but by the fellowship of the nature which is shared by all infants. It also belongs to that subject that they introduce the question "of the origin of the soul," thus endeavouring to make all the souls of infants equal to the soul of Christ, maintaining that they likewise are sprinkled with no stain of sin. On this account, also, they say, "that nothing of evil passed from Adam upon the rest of humanity except death, which," they say, "is not always an evil, since even to the martyrs it is a cause of reward; and it is not the dissolution of the bodies, which in every kind of men shall be raised up, that can make death to be called either good or evil, but the diversity of merits which arises from human liberty." These things they write in this letter concerning the praise of the creature.

They praise marriage truly according to the Scriptures, "because the Lord saith in the gospel. He who made men from the beginning made them male and female, and said, Increase and multiply, and replenish the earth." Although this is not written in that passage of the gospel, yet it is written in the law. They add, moreover, "What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." ^ And these we acknowledge to be gospel words.

In the praise of the law they say, "that the old law was, according to the apostle, holy and just and good; that on those who keep its commandments, and live righteously by faith, such as the prophets and patriarchs, and all the saints, life eternal could be conferred."

In the praise of free-will they say, "that free-will has not perished, since the Lord says by the prophets, 'If ye be willing and will hear me, ye shall eat the good things of the land: if ye are unwilling, and will not hear, the sword shall devour you.' " ^ And thus, also, "that grace assists the good purpose of any person, but does not infuse a desire of virtue into the reluctant heart, because there is no acceptance of persons with God."

In the praise of the saints they conceal themselves, saying "that baptism perfectly renews men, inasmuch as the apostle is a witness who testifies that, by the washing of water, the Church is made out of the heathen holy and spotless; ^ that the Holy Spirit also assisted pious souls in ancient times, even as the prophet says to God, 'Thy good Spirit shall lead me into the right way; ' ^ that all the prophets, moreover, and apostles or saints, as well of the New as of the Old Testament, to whom God gives witness, were righteous, not in comparison of the wicked, but by the standard of virtue; and that in future time there is a reward as well of good works as of ^ Matt. xix. L 2 isa. j. ig. 3 Epii_ y_ 26. â– Â» Ps. cxliii. 10.

CHAP. 3.] CATHOLIC VIEW OF THESE TEACHINGS, 331

evil, but that no one could then perform the commandment which here he may have contemned, because the apostle said, "'We must be manifested before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things belonging to the body, according to what he has done, whether good or evil.' " *

In all these points, whatever they say of the praise of the creature and of marriage they endeavour to refer to this, that there is no original sin; whatever of the praise of law and of free-will, to this, that grace does not assist without merit, and that thus grace is no more grace; whatever of the praise of the saints, to this, that mortal life in the saints appears not to have any sin, and that it is not necessary for them to pray God for the remitting of their debts or sins.

Chap. 3. â€” The Catholics praise nature, marriage, law, free-will, and the saints, in such wise as to condemn as well Pelagians as Manichceans.

Let every one who, with a Catholic mind, shudders at these impious doctrines and damnable, as in this tripartite division, shun the lurking-places and snares of this fivefold error, and so be careful between one and another as in such wise to decline from Manichaeans as not to incline to Pelagians; and again, so to separate himself from the Pelagians as, not to associate himself with the Manichaeans; or, if he should already be taken hold of in one or the other bondage, that he should not so pluck liimself out of the hands of either as to rush into those of the other. Because they seem to be contrary to one another, since the Manichaeans manifest themselves by vituperating these five points, the Pelagians conceal themselves by praising them. Wherefore he condemns and shuns both, whoever he may be, that according to the rule of the Catholic faith so glorifies the Creator in men, who are born of the good creation in flesh and soul (for this the Manichsean will not have), as that he yet confesses that on account of the sin which has passed over into them by the sin of the first man, even infants need a Saviour (for this the Pelagian will not have): he so distinguishes the evil of a shameful lust from the excellence of marriage, as neither, like the Manichseans, to reproach the source of our birth, nor, like the Pelagians, to praise our confusion. He in such wise maintains the law to have been given holy and just and good through. Moses by a holy and just and good God (which Manichseus, in opposition to the apostle, denies), as to say that it both shows forth sin and yet does not take it away; and commands righteousness which yet it does not give (which, again, in opposition to the apostle, Pelagius denies). He so asserts free-will as to say that the evil of both angel and man began, not from I know not what nature always evil, which is no nature, but from the will itself, which overturns Manichsean heresy; and that even thus the captive will nevertheless cannot breathe into a wholesome liberty save by God's grace, which overturns the Pelagian heresy.

He so praises the holy men of God in God, not only of Christ manifested in the flesh and subsequently, but even those of the former times, whom the Manichseans dare to blaspheme; as yet to believe their own confessions concerning themselves, more than the lies of the Pelagians. For the word of the saints is, " If we should say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." ^

Chap, 4. ã€’ Pelagians and Manicheans on the praise of the creature.

These things being so, what advantage is it to incipient heretics, enemies of the cross of Christ and opposers of divine grace, that they seem sound from the error of the Manichseans, if they are dying by another pestilence of their own ? What advantage is it to them, that in the praise of the creature they say " that the good God is the creator of every one that is born, that by Him all things were made, and that the children of men are His work," whom the Manichseans say are the work of the prince of darkness; when between them both, or among them both, God's creation, which is in infants, is perishing ? For both of them refuse to have it delivered by Christ's flesh and blood, ã€” the former, because they destroy that very flesh and blood, as if He did not take upon Him these at all in man or of man; and the latter, because they assert that there is no evil in infants from which they should be delivered by the sacrament of this flesh and blood. Between them, in the case of infants, lies the human creature with a good creation, with a vitiated propagation, confessing for its benefits a most excellent Creator, seeking for its evils a most merciful Redeemer, having the Manicháeans as disparagers of its benefits, having the Pelagians as deniers of its evils, and both persecutors. And although in infancy there is no power to speak, yet with its silent look and its hidden weakness it addresses the impious vanity of both, saying to the former,

" Believe that I am created by Him who creates good; " and saying to the latter, " Suffer me to be healed by Him who created me." The Manicháeans say. There is nothing of this infant save the good soul to be delivered; the rest, which belongs not to the good God, but to the prince of darkness, is to be rejected. The Pelagians say. Certainly there is nothing of this infant to be delivered, because we have shown the whole to be safe. Both lie; but now the accuser of the flesh alone is more bearable than the praiser, who is convicted of raging against everything. But neither does the Manichaean help the human soul by blasphemying God, the Author of the entire man; nor does the Pelagian permit the divine grace to come to the help of human infancy by denying original sin. Therefore by the Catholic faith God has mercy, seeing that by condemning both mischievous doctrines it comes to the help of the infant for salvation. It says to the Manicháeans, Hear the apostle crying, " Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost in you ? " ^ and believe that the good God is the Creator of bodies, because the temple of the Holy Ghost cannot be the work of the prince of darkness. It says to the Pelagians, The infant that you look upon "was conceived in iniquity, and in sin its mother nourished it in the womb." ^ Why, as if in defending it as free from all mischief, do you not permit it to be delivered by mercy? No one is pure from uncleanness, not even the infant whose life is of one day upon the earth. ^ Allow the wretched creatures to receive remission of sins, through Him who alone neither as small nor great could have any sin.

Chap. 5. "What is the special advantage in the Pelagian opinions?"

What advantage, then, is it to them that they say "that all sin descends not from nature, but from the will," and resist 1 1 Cor. vi. 19. 2 ps. li. 5. 3 j+i^ ^j^, a 5. gee LXX.

by the truth of this judgment the Manichseans, who say that evil nature is the cause of sin; when they are unwilling to admit original sin, although itself also descends from the will of the first man, and make infants to depart in guilt from the body? What advantage is it to them "that they confess that baptism is necessary for all ages," while the Manichseans say that in every age it is superfluous, when these say that in infants it is false so far as it pertains to the forgiveness of sins? What advantage is it to them that they maintain "the flesh of Christ" (which the Manichseans contend was either no flesh at all, or a feigned flesh) to have been not only the true flesh, but "that even the soul itself was stained by no spot of sin," when other infants are by them so put on the same level with His infancy, with not unequal purity, as that both that flesh does not appear to keep its own holiness in comparison of those, and these obtain no salvation from this?

Chap. 6. "Not death alone, but sin also, has passed into us by means of Adam.

In that particular, indeed, wherein they say "that death passed to us by Adam's means, not guilt," they have not the Manichasans as their adversaries: since even they do not feign that original sin from the first man, at first of pure and upright body and spirit, and afterwards depraved by free-will, subsequently passed and passes as sin into all with death; but they say that the flesh was evil from the beginning, and created by an evil spirit and with an evil spirit; but that a good soul "a portion, to wit, of God "for the deserts of its defilement by food and drink, in which it was before bound up, came into man, and thus by means of copulation was bound in the chain of the flesh. And thus the Manichaeans agree with the Pelagians that it was not the guilt of the first man that passed into the human race "neither by the flesh, which they say was never good; nor by the soul, which they assert comes into the flesh of man with the merits of its own defilements, with which it was polluted before the flesh. But how do the Pelagians say "that only death passed upon us by Adam's means "? For if we die because he died, and he died because he sinned, they say that the punishment

CHAr. 7.] CHEIST SUFFERED DEATH WITHOUT DESERVING. 335

passed without the guilt, and that innocent infants are unjustly punished with a penalty by bearing death without the deserts of death. Which the Catholic faith has known of the one and only mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus, who condescended to undergo death "that is, the penalty of sin "without sin, for us. As He alone became the Son of man, in order that we might become through Him sons of God, so He alone, on our behalf, undertook punishment without ill deservings, that we through Him might obtain grace without good deservings. Because as to us nothing good was due, so to Him nothing bad was due. Therefore, commending His love to them to whom He was about to give undeserved life. He was willing to suffer for them an undeserved death. This special prerogative of the Mediator the Pelagians endeavour to make void, so that this should no longer be special in the Lord, if Adam in such wise suffered a death due to him on account of his guilt, as that infants, drawing from him no guilt, should suffer undeserved death. For although very much good is conferred on the good by means of death, whence some have fitly argued even of the benefit of death, yet even from this what can be declared but the mercy of God, that the punishment of sin is converted into beneficent uses?

Chap. 7. â€” What is the meaning of " In whom all have sinned " ?

But these speak thus who wish to wrest men from the apostle's words into their own thought. For where the apostle says, " By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so passed upon all men," ^ they will have it there understood not that sin passed over, but death. What, then, is the meaning of what foUows, " Wherein all have sinned " ? For either the apostle says that in that one man all have sinned of whom he had said. By one man sin entered into the world, or " in that sin," or certainly " in death." For it need not disturb us that he said not " in which " [fem.], but " in whom " [masc] all have sinned; because death [ddvaro<r] in the Greek language is of the masculine gender. Let them, then, choose which they will, â€” for either in that man all have sinned, and it is said because when lie sinned all were in him; or in that sin all have sinned, because, in c[e]neral, it was the doing of all, which all those who were born would have to bear; or it remains for them to say that in that death all sinned. But in what way this can be understood, I do not clearly see. For all die in the sin, they do not sin in the death; for when sin precedes, death follows â€” not when death precedes, sin follows. Because sin is the sting of death â€” that is, the sting by whose wound death occurs, not the sting with which death strikes. As poison, if it is drunk, is called the cup of death, because by that cup death is caused, not because the cup is caused by the death, or is given by death. But if sin cannot be understood by those words of the apostle as being that in which all have sinned, because in Greek, from which the Epistle is translated, sin is expressed in the feminine gender [dfjuaprla], it remains that all men are understood to have sinned in that first man, because in him all men were when he sinned; whence sin is derived by being born, and is not remitted save by being born again. For thus also the sainted Hilary understood what is written. In whom all have sinned; for he says, " In whom, that is, in Adam, all have sinned." Then he adds, " It is manifest that in Adam all have sinned, as it were in the mass; for he himself was corrupted by sin, and all whom he begot were born under sin." When he wrote this, Hilary, without any ambiguity, indicated how we should understand the words, " in whom all have sinned."

1 Rom. V. 12.

Chap. 8. â€” Death passed upon all by sin.
But for what reason does the same apostle say that we are reconciled to God by Christ, except for the reason that we had become enemies? And what is this but sin? Whence also the prophet says, "Your sins separate between you and God." On account of this separation, therefore, the Mediator was sent, that He might take away the sin of the world, by which we were separated as enemies, and being reconciled were made from enemies children. About this, certainly, the apostle was speaking; hence it happened that he interpolated

* Isa. lix. 2.

CHAP. 9.] SUBTLETY OF THE PELAGIAN VIEW. 337

what he says, "That sin entered by one man." For these are his former words. He says, "But God commendeth His love towards us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Much more, then, being now justified in His blood, we shall be saved from wrath through Him. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved in His life. And not only so, but glorying also in God through Jesus Christ our Lord, by whom also we have now received reconciliation." Then he subjoins, "Therefore, as by one man sin entered into this world, and death by sin, and so passed upon all men, in whom all have sinned." Why do the Pelagians evade this matter? If reconciliation through Christ is necessary to all men, on all men has passed sin by which we have become enemies, in order that we should have need of reconciliation. This reconciliation is in the laver of regeneration and in the flesh and blood of Christ, without which not even infants can have life in themselves. "For as one man was for death on account of sin, so there is one man for life on account of righteousness; because as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive;" And as by the sin of one [judgment came] upon all men to condemnation, so also by the righteousness of one [the free gift came] upon all men unto justification of life." Who is there that has turned a deaf ear to these apostolical words with such hardness of wicked impiety, as, having heard them, to contend that death passed upon us through Adam without sin, unless, indeed, they are opposers of the grace of God and enemies of the cross of Christ? whose end is destruction if they continue in this obstinacy. But let it suffice to have said thus much for the sake of that serpentine subtlety of theirs, by which they wish to corrupt simple minds, and to turn them away from the simplicity of the faith, as if by the praise of the creature.

Chap. 9. [v.] "Of the praise of marriage.

But further, concerning the praise of marriage, what advantage is it to them that, in opposition to the Manichseans, who

1 Rom. V. 8 ff. "I Cor. xv. 22. 3 Kom. v. 18.

XV, Y
assign marriage not to the true and good God, but to the prince of darkness, these [scil. the Pelagians] withstand the words of true piety, and say, "That the Lord speaks in the "ospel, saying. Who from the beginning made them male and female, and said, Increase and multiply and replenish the earth. What therefore God hath joined together, let no man put asunder " ? ^ What does this profit them, by means of the truth to seduce to a falsehood ? For they say this in order that infants may be thought to be born free from all fault, and thus that there is no need of their being reconciled to God through Christ, not having any original sin, on account of which reconciliation is necessary to all by means of one who came into the world without sin, as the enmities of all were caused by means of one through whom sin entered into the world. And this is believed by Catholics for the sake of the salvation of the nature of men, without detracting from the praise of marriage, because the praise of marriage is a righteous intercourse of the sexes, not a wicked defence of vices. And thus, when, by their praise of marriage, these persons wish to draw over men from the Manichaeans to themselves, they desire merely to change their disease, not to heal it.

Chap. 10. â€” Of the praise of the law.

Once more, in the praise of the law, what advantage is it to them that, in opposition to the Manichaeans, they say the truth when they wish to bring men from that view to this which they hold falsely against the Catholics ? For they say, "We confess that even the old law, according to the apostle, is holy and just and good, which could confer eternal life on those that kept its commandments, and lived righteously by faith, as the prophets and patriarchs, and all the saints." By which words, very craftily expressed, they praise the law in opposition to grace; for not even that law, although just and holy and good, could confer eternal life on all those men of God, but the faith which is in Christ. For this faith worketh by love, not according to the letter which killeth, but according to the Spirit which maketh alive, to which ^ ilatt. xix, i, etc.

CHAP. 10.] OBEDIENCE TO LAW BY FAITH. 339

grace of God the law, as it were a sciolomaster, leads bydetering from transgression, that so that might be conferred upon man which it could not itself confer. For to those words of theirs in which they say " that the law was able to confer eternal life on the prophets and patriarchs, and all saints who kept its commandments," the apostle replies, "If righteousness be by the law, then has Christ died in vain." ^
" If the inheritance be by the law, then is it no more of promise." ^ " If they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise is made of none effect." ^ " But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, is evident: for. The just by faith liveth." * " But the law is not of faith: but. The man that doeth them shall live in them," ^ Which testimony, mentioned by the apostle from the law, is understood in respect of temporal life, in respect of the fear of losing which, men were in the habit of doing the works of the law, â€” not of faith, because the transgressors of the law by the same were commanded to be put to death by the people. Or, if it must be understood on higher ground, that it was written in reference to eternal life, " He who doeth these things shall live in them;" the power of the law is so expressed that the weakness of man in himself, itself failing to do what the law commands, might seek help from the grace of God rather of faith, seeing that by His mercy even faith itself is bestowed. Because faith is thus possessed, according as God has given to every one the measure of faith. For if men have it not of themselves, but they receive the Spirit of power and of love and of continence, â€” whence that very same teacher of the Gentiles says, " For we have not received the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of continence," Â® â€” assuredly also the Spirit of faith is received, of which he says, " Having also the same Spirit of faith." ^ Truly, then, says the law, " He who doeth these things shall live in them."
But in order to do these things, and live in them, there is necessary not the law which commands this, but the faith which obtains this. Which faith, however, that it may deserve to receive these things, is itself given freely.

340 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS, [CHAP. 11,
; Chajp. 11. â€” The Pelagians understand that the law itself is God's grace.

But those enemies of grace never endeavour to lay more secret snares for the more vehement opposition of that same "â€œrace than when they praise the law, which, without doubt, is worthy to be praised. Because, by their different modes of speaking, and by variety of words in all their arguments, they wish the law to be understood as grace â€” that, to wit, we may have from the Lord God the help of knowledge, whereby we may know those things which have to be done, not the inspiration of love, that, when known, we may do them with a holy love, which is specially grace. For the knowledge of the law without love puffeth up, does not edify, according to the same apostle, who most openly says, " Knowledge puffeth up, but love edifieth," ^ Which saying is like to that in which it is said, " The letter killeth, the spirit maketh alive." "" For such as is, " Knowledge puffeth up," such is, " The letter killeth; " and such as is, " Love edifieth," such is, " The spirit maketh alive; " because " the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit who is given unto us."^ Therefore the knowledge of the law makes a proud transgressor; but, by the gift of charity, it delights him to be a doer of the law. We do not then make void the law through faith, but we establish the law,* which by terrifying leads to faith. Thus certainly the law worketh wrath, that the mercy of God may bestow grace on the sinner, frightened and turned to the fulfilment of the righteousness of the law through Jesus Christ our Lord, who is the wisdom of God, of which it is written, "She carries law and mercy on her tongue,"^ â€” law whereby she frightens, mercy by which she may help; law by His servant, mercy by Himself, â€” the law, as it were, in the staff which Elisha sent to raise up the son of the widow, and it failed to raise him up, "For if a law had been given which could have given life, righteousness would altogether have been by the law;" but mercy, as it were, in Elisha himself, who, wearing the figure of Christ, by giving life to the dead was joined in the signification of the great sacrament, as it were, of the New Testament.

CHAP. 13. PELAGIAN DOCTRINE OF FREE-WILL. 341

Chap. 12. [vi.] â€” Of the praise of free-will.

Moreover, that, in opposition to the Manichseans, they praise free-will, making use of the prophetic testimony, "If ye shall be willing and will hear me, ye shall eat what is good in the land; but if ye shall be unwilling and will not hear me, the sword shall consume you:"^ what advantage is this to them, when, indeed, it is not so much against the Manichaeans that they are maintaining, as against the Catholics that they are extolling, free-w^ill? For they wish what is said, "If ye be willing and will hear me," to be thus understood, as if in the will itself preceding were the merit of the grace that follows; and thus grace were no more grace, seeing that it is not free when it is rendered as a debt. But if they should so understand what is written, "If ye be willing," as to confess that He prepares even that good will itself of whom it is written, "The will is prepared by the Lord,"^ they would use this testimony as Catholics, and not only would overcome the ancient heresy of the Manichseans, but would not found the new one of the Pelagians.

Chap. 13. â€” GoiVs purposes are effects of grace.

What does it profit them, that in the praise of that same free-will "they say that grace assists the good purpose of every one"? This would be received without scruple as being said in a Catholic spirit, if they did not attribute merit to the good purpose, to which merit it is now a wage that is paid of debt, not of grace; but would understand and confess that even that very good purpose, which the grace which follows assists, could not have been in the man if grace had not preceded it. For how is there a good purpose in a man without the mercy of God first, since it is that very good will which is prepared by the Lord? But when they had said this, "that grace also assists every one's good purpose," and presently added, " but that it does not introduce the love of virtue into a resisting heart," it might be fitly understood if it were not said by those whose meaning is known. For to the resisting heart the hearing of the divine

â€œ Isa. i. 19, 20. ~ * Prov. viii. 35 [LXX.]

call is first procured by the grace of God itself, and then in that heart, now no more resisting, the desire of virtue is kindled.
Nevertheless, in all things which any one does according to God, His mercy comes before him. And this they will not have, because they choose to be not Catholics, but Pelagians. For it much delights a proud impiety, that even that which a man is forced to confess to be given by the Lord should seem to be not bestowed on himself, but repaid; so that, to wit, the children of perdition, not of the promise, may be thought themselves to have made themselves good, and God to have repaid to those who are now good, having been made so by themselves, the due reward for that their work.

Chap. 14. â€” The testimonies of Scripture in favour of grace.

For that very pride has so obstructed the ears of their heart that they do not hear, " For what hast thou that thou liest not received ? " ^ They do not hear, " Without me ye can do nothing; " ^ they do not hear, " Love is of God; " ^ they do not hear, " God hath dealt the measure of faith; " ^* they do not hear, " The Spirit breatheth where it will," * and, " They who are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God; " Â® they do not hear, " No one can come unto me, unless it were given him of my Father; " ^ they do not hear what Esdras writes, " Blessed is the Lord of our fathers, who hath put into the heart of the king to glorify His house which is in Jerusalem; " ^ they do not hear what the Lord says by Jeremiah, " And I will put my fear into their heart, that they depart not from me; and I will visit them to make them good";Â® and especially that word by Ezekiel the prophet, where God absolutely shows that He is induced by no good deservings of men to make them good, that is, obedient to His commands, but rather that He repays to them good for evil, by doing this on His own account, and not on their account.
For He says, " These things saith the Lord God: I do not this for your sakes, house of Israel, but for mine own holy name's sake, which has been profaned among the nations,

Â» 1 Cor. iv. 7. 2 John xv. 5. ' 1 John iv. 7.

CHAP. 15.] TESTIMONY OF EZEKIEL. 343

whither ye have gone in there; and I will sanctify my great name, which has been profaned among the nations, and which ye have profaned in the midst of them; and the nations shall know that I am the Lord, saith Adonai the Lord, when I shall be sanctified among you before their eyes. And I will take you from among the nations, and gather you together out of all lands, and will bring you into your own land. And I will sprinkle upon you clean water, and ye shall be cleansed from all your filthiness, and I will cleanse you. And I will give unto you a new heart, and a new spirit will I put within you: and the stony heart shall be taken away out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and will cause you to walk in my righteousness, and to observe my judgments, and do them."

And after a few words by the same prophet, He says, "Not for your sakes do I do this, saith the Lord God; it shall be known unto you: be ye confounded and blush for your ways, house of Israel. These things saith the Lord God: In the day in which I shall cleanse you from all your iniquities, and shall ordain cities, and the wilderness shall be built. And the desolated land shall be tilled, whereas it was desolated before the eyes of every passer by. And they shall say, This land that was desolated has become as a garden of pleasure; and the wasted and desolated and ruined cities have settled down fortified. And whatever nations have been left round about you shall know that I the Lord have built the ruined places,

I have planted the desolated places: I the Lord have spoken, and have done it. Thus saith the Lord: I will yet for this inquire of the house of Israel, that I may do it for them; I will multiply them men like sheep, as holy sheep, as the sheep of Jerusalem in the days of her feast; so shall be those desolated cities full of men as sheep: and they shall know that I am the Lord."

Chap. 15. â€” From those words of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, grace is proved to be gratuitous and effectual.

What remained to the carrion skin whence it might be puffed up, and could disdain when it glories to glory in the Lord? What remained to it when it could say that it had done anything; that when that preceding merit of man originated from man, God would subsequently do that of which the man is deserving; it shall be answered, it shall be exclaimed against, it shall be contradicted, "I do it; but for my own holy name's sake, not for your sakes, do I do it, saith the Lord God?" Nothing so overturns the Pelagians when they say that the grace of God is given in respect of our merits. Which, indeed, Pelagius himself condemned, and if not by correcting it, yet by being afraid of the Eastern judges. Nothing so overturns the presumption of men who say. We do it, that we may deserve those things with which God may do it. It is not Pelagius that answers you, but the Lord Himself, "I do it, and not for your sakes, but for my own holy name's sake." For what good can ye do out of a heart which is not good? But that you may have a good heart. He says, "I will give you a new heart, and I will put a new Spirit within you." Can you say. We will first walk in His righteousness, and will observe His judgment, and will do so that we may be worthy as to those to whom He should give His grace? But what good would ye evil men do, and how should you do those good things, unless you were yourselves good? But who causes that men should be good save Him who said, "And I will visit them to make them good"? and who said, I will put my Spirit within you, and will cause you to walk in my righteousness, and to observe my judgments, and do them? Are ye thus not yet awake? Do ye not yet hear, I will cause you to walk, I will make you to observe, lastly, I will make you to do? What! are you still puffing yourselves up? We indeed walk, it is true, we observe, we do; but He makes us to walk, to observe, to do. This is the grace of God making us good, this is His mercy preventing us. What do waste and desolated and dug-up places deserve, which yet shall be built and tilled and fortified? Are these things for the merits of their wasteness, their desolation, their uprooting? Far from it. For such things as these are evil servings, while those gifts are good. Therefore good things are given for evil ones æ’ gratuitous, therefore; not of debt, and therefore grace. I, saith the Lord; I, the Lord. Does not such a word as that restrain you, human pride, when you say, I do such things as to deserve from the Lord to be built and planted? Do you not hear, "I do it not on your account; I the Lord have built up the destroyed cities, and I have planted the desolated lands; I the Lord have spoken, and I have done it, yet not for your sakes, but for my own holy name's sake"? Who multiplies men as sheep, as holy sheep, as the sheep of Jerusalem? Who causes those desolated cities to be full of men as sheep, save He who goes on, and says, "And they shall know that I am the Lord"? But with what men as sheep does He fill the cities as He promised? those which He finds, or those which He makes?

* Ezek. xxxvi. 22 S. 2 Ezek. xxxvi. 32 ff.
Let us interrogate the Psalm; lo, it answers; let us hear:
"O come, let us worship and fall down before Him: and let us weep before the Lord who made us; because He is our God, and we are the people of His pasture, and the sheep of His hand."^ He therefore makes the sheep, with which He may fill the desolated cities. What wonder, when, indeed, to that single sheep, that is, the Church whose members are all the human sheep, it is said. Because I am the Lord who make thee? What do you pretend to me of free-will, which will not be free to do righteousness, unless you should be a sheep?

He then who makes men His sheep, He frees the wills of men for the obedience of piety.

Cii.vr. 16. â€” Why God inalces of some sheep, others not.

But wherefore does God make these men sheep, and not those, since with Him there is no acceptance of persons? This is the very question which the blessed apostle thus answers to those who propose it with more curiosity than propriety, "man, who art thou that repliest against God? Does the thing formed say to him that formed it, Wherefore hast thou made me thus?"^ This is the very question which pertains to that depth which the same apostle desiring to look into, was in a certain measure terrified, and exclaimed,
"Oh the depth of the riches of the wisdom and the knowledge of God! how unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out! For who has known the mind of the Lord?
or who has been His counsellor? Or who has first given to J Ps. xcv. 6, 7. 2 Rom. ix. 20.

346 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. 16.

Him, that it should be recompensed to Him again? Because of Him, and through Him, and in Him, are all things: to Him be glory for ages of ages."^ Let them not, then, dare to pry into that unsearchable question who defend merit before grace, and therefore even against grace, and wish first to give unto God, that it may be given to them again, â€” first, in any case, to give something of free-will, that grace may be given them again as a reward; and let them wisely understand or faithfully believe that even what they think that they have first given, they have received from Him, from whom are all things, by whom are all things, in whom are all things. But why this man should receive, and that should not receive, when neither of them deserve to receive, and whichever of them receives, receives undeservingly, let them measure their own strength, and not search into things too strong for them. Let it suffice them to know that there is no unrighteousness with God. For when the apostle could find no merits for which Jacob should take precedence of his twin-brother with God, he said, "What, then, shall we say? Is there unrighteousness with God? Away with the thought!
For He says to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will show compassion on whom I will show compassion. Therefore it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy."^ Let, therefore. His free compassion be grateful to us, even although this profound question be still unsolved; which, nevertheless, is so far solved as the same apostle solves it, saying, "But if God, willing to show His wrath, and to demonstrate His power, endured in much patience the vessels of wrath which are fitted to destruction; and that He might make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy, which He has prepared for glory." ^Certainly wrath is not repaid unless it is due, lest there be unrighteousness with God; but mercy, even when it is bestowed, and not due, is not unrighteousness with God. And hence, let the vessels of mercy understand how freely mercy is afforded to them, because to the vessels of wrath with whom they have common cause and measure of perdition, is repaid wrath, righteous and due.

CHAP. 18.] THE CHURCH HERE NOT WITHOUT SPOT. 347

This is now enough in opposition to those who, by freedom of will, desire to destroy the liberality of grace.

Chap. 17. [vii.] â€” Of the praise of the saints.

That, indeed, in the praise of the saints, they will not drive us with the zeal of that publican to hunger and thirst after righteousness, but with the vanity of the Pharisees, as it were, to overflow with sufficiency and fulness; what does it profit them that â€” in opposition to the Manichseans, who do away with baptism â€” "they say "that men are perfectly renewed by baptism," and apply the apostle's testimony for this, â€” who testifies that, by the washing of water, the Church is made holy and spotless from the Gentiles," â€” when, with a proud and perverse meaning, they avail themselves of their arguments in opposition to the prayers of the Church itself For they say this in order that the Church may be believed after holy baptism â€” in which is accomplished the forgiveness of all sins â€” to have no further sin; when, in opposition to them, from the rising of the sun even to its setting, in all its members it cries to God, "Forgive us our debts." But if they are interrogated regarding themselves in this matter, they find not what to answer. For if they should say that they have no sin, John answers them, that they deceive themselves, and the truth is not in them. But if they confess their sins, since they wish themselves to be members of Christ's body, how will that body, that is, the Church, 'be even in this time perfectly, as they think, without spot or wrinkle, if its members without falsehood confess themselves to have sins? Wherefore in baptism all sins are forgiven, and, by that very washing of water in the word, the Church is set forth in Christ without spot or wrinkle; and unless it were baptized, it would fruitlessly say. Forgive us our debts, until it be brought to glory, when there is in it absolutely no spot or wrinkle.

Chap. 18. â€” The opinion of the saints themselves about themselves.
It is to be confessed that "the Holy Spirit, even in the old times," not only "aided good dispositions," which even they allow, but that it even made them good, which they will not have; "that all, also, of the prophets and apostles or saints, both evangelical and ancient, to whom God gives His witness, were righteous, not in comparison of the wicked, but by the standard of virtue," is not doubtful. And this is opposed to the Manichseans, who blaspheme the patriarchs and prophets; but what is opposed to the Pelagians is, that all of these, when interrogated concerning themselves while they lived in the body, with one most accordant voice would answer, "If we should say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." "But in the future time," it is not to be denied "that there will be a reward as well of good works as of evil, and that no one will be commanded to do the commandments there which here he has contemned," but that a sufficiency of perfect righteousness where sin cannot be, a righteousness which is here hungered and thirsted after by the saints, is here hoped for in precept, is there received as a reward by the entreaty of alms and prayers; so that what here may have been wanting in fulfilment of the commandments may become unpunished by the forgiveness of sin.

And if these things be so, let the Pelagians cease by their most insidious praises of these five things "that is, the praise of the creature, the praise of marriage, the praise of the law, the praise of free-will, the praise of the saints" from feigning that they desire to pluck men, as it were, from the little snares of the Manichseans, in order that they may entangle them in their own nets "that is, to deny original sin; to begrudge to infants the aid of Christ the physician; to say that the grace of God is given in respect of our merits, and thus that grace is no more grace; and to say that the saints in this life had not sin, and that thus the prayer should be made of no effect which He gave to the saints who had no sin, and by whom all sin is pardoned to the saints that pray unto Him. To these three evil doctrines, they by their deceitful praise of these five good things seduce careless and unlearned men.

Concerning all which things, I think I have sufficiently censured their most cruel and wicked and proud vanity.

1 1 John i. 8.

Chap. 20. [viii.] "The testimonies of the ancients against the Pelagians.
But since they say " that their enemies have taken up our words for hatred of the truth, and complained that throughout nearly the whole of the West a dogma not less foolish than impious is taken up, and from simple bishops sitting in their places without the Synodal congregation a subscription is extorted to confirm this dogma," although the Church of Christ, both Western and Eastern, shuddered at the profane novelties of their words; I think it pertains to my case not only to avail myself of the sacred canonical Scriptures as witnesses against them, which I have already sufficiently done, but, moreover, to bring forward some proofs from the writings of the holy men who before us have treated upon those Scriptures with the most widespread reputation and great glory. Not that I would put the authority of any controversialist on a level with the canonical books, as if there were nothing which is better or more truly thought by one Catholic than by another who likewise is a Catholic; but that those may be admonished who think that these men say anything as it used to be said, long before their empty talk on these subjects, by Catholic teachers following the divine oracles, and may know that the true and anciently established Catholic faith is by us defended against the receding presumption and mischief of the Pelagian heretics.

Chap. 21. â€” Pelagius, in imitation of Cyprian, lorote a hook of testimonies.

Even that heresiarch of these men, Pelagius himself, mentions with honour that is certainly due the most blessed Cyprian, most glorious also with the crown of martyrdom not only in the African and the Western, but also in the Eastern Churches, well known by the report of fame, and by the diffusion far and wide of his writings, â€” he, I say, mentions him when writing a book of testimonies; he asserts that he is imitating him, saying that " he was doing to Eomanus what Cyprian had done to Quirinus." Let us, then, see what Cyprian thought concerning original sin, which entered by one man into the world. In the epistle about works and alms he thus speaks: " Wlien the Lord at His advent had cured these wounds which Adam had introduced, and had healed the old poisons of the serpent. He gave a law to the sound man, and bade him sin no more, lest a worse thing should happen to him if he did. We had been limited and shut up into a narrow space by the commandment of innocence, nor would the infirmity and weakness of human frailty have any resource unless the divine mercy coming once more in aid should open some way of securing salvation by pointing out works of justice and mercy, so that by almsgiving we may wash away whatever foulness we subsequently contract." ' By this testimony this witness refutes two falsehoods of theirs, â€” the one, wherein they say that the human race draws no sin from Adam which needs cure and healing through Christ; the other, in which they say that the saints have no sin after baptism. Again, in the same epistle he says, " Let each one place before his eyes the devil with his servants, that is, with the people of perdition, and death springing forth into the midst and provoking the people of Christ with the trial of comparison, Christ Himself being present and judging in these words: 'I, on behalf of those whom thou seest with me, neither received buffets, nor bore scourgings, nor endured the cross, nor shed my blood, nor redeemed my family at the price of my suffering and blood; but neither do I promise them a celestial kingdom, nor do I recall them to Paradise, having again restored to them immortality.' "^ Let the Pelagians answer and say when we could have been in the immortality of Paradise, and how we could have been expelled thence so as to be recalled thither by the grace of Christ. And, although they may be unable to find what they can answer in this case on behalf of their own perversity, let them observe in what manner Cyprian understood what the apostle says, " In whom all have sinned." And let not the Pelagian heretics, freed from the old Manichæan heretics, dare to suggest any calumny against a Catholic, lest they should be convicted of doing so wicked a wrong even to the ancient martyr Cyprian.

* Ibid. voL ii. p. 16.

CHAP. 22.]

For he says also this in the epistle whose title is inscribed, " On the Mortality": " The kingdom of God, beloved brethren, is beginning to be at hand; the reward of life, and the rejoicing of eternal salvation and perpetual gladness, and the possession formerly lost of Paradise, are now coming with the passing away of the world." ^ This again, in the same epistle, he says: " Let us greet the day which assigns each of us to his own home, which snatches us hence and sets us free from the snares of the world, and restores us to Paradise and the kingdom."^ Moreover, he says in the epistle concerning Patience: " Let the judgment of God be pondered, which, even in the beginning of the world and of the human race, Adam, forgetful of the commandment and a transgressor of the law that had been given, received. Then we shall know how patient in this life we ought to be, who are born in such a state that we labour here with afflictions and contests. Because, says He, ' thou hast hearkened to the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree of which alone I had charged thee that thou shouldst not eat, cursed shall be the ground in all thy works: in sorrow and in groaning shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. Thorns and thistles shall it give forth to thee, and thou shalt eat the food of the field. In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat thy bread, till thou return unto the ground from which thou wast taken: for earth thou art, and unto earth shalt thou go.' We are all tied and bound with the chain of this sentence until, death being expunged, we depart from this life." ^ And, moreover, in the same epistle he says: " For, since in that first transgression of the commandment strength of body departed with immortality, and weakness came on with death, and strength cannot be received unless when immortality also has been received, it behoves us in this bodily frailty and weakness always to struggle and fight; and this struggle and encounter cannot be sustained but by the strength of patience." *
And in the epistle which he wrote with sixty-six of his joint-bishops to Bishop Fidus, having been consulted by him in respect of the law of circumcision, whether an infant might be baptized before the eighth day, this matter is treated in such a way as if by a divine foresight the Catholic Church would already confute the Pelagian heretics who would appear so long afterwards. For he who had consulted had no doubt on the subject whether children being born inherited original sin, which they might wash away by being born again. For be it far from the Christian faith to have at any time doubted on this matter. But he was in doubt whether the washing of regeneration, by which he made no question but that original sin was put away, ought to be given before the eighth day. To which consultation the most blessed Cyprian in reply said: "But in respect of the case of infants, which you say ought not to be baptized within the second or third day after their birth, and that the law of the ancient circumcision should be regarded, so that you think that one who is just born should not be baptized and sanctified within the eighth day, we all thought very differently in our council. For in this course which you thought was to be taken no one agreed, but we all rather judged that the grace of a merciful God was not to be denied to any one born of men; for, as the Lord says in His gospel, 'the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them.' As far as we can, we must strive that, if possible, no soul be lost." And a little afterwards he says: "Nor ought any of us to shudder at what God hath condescended to make. For although the infant is still fresh from its birth, yet it is not such that any one should shudder at kissing it in giving grace and in making peace, since in the kiss of an infant every one of us ought for his very religion's sake to consider the still recent hands of God themselves, which in some sort we are kissing in the man just formed and newly born, when we are embracing that which God has made." A little after, also, he says: "But if any-remission of sins is granted, and nobody is hindered from baptism and from grace; how much rather ought we to shrink from hindering an infant, who, being lately born, has not sinned, except that, being born after the flesh according to Adam, he has contracted the contagion of the ancient death at his earliest birth; who approaches more easily on this very account to the reception of the forgiveness of sins, in that to him are remitted not his own sins, but the sins of another! "

Chap. 24. â€” The dilemma proposed to the Pelagians.

What will they say to such things as these, who are not only the forsakers, but also the persecutors of God's grace? What will they say to such things as these? On what ground is the possession of Paradise restored to us? How are we restored to Paradise if we have never been there? Or how have we been there, except because we were there in Adam? And how have we to do with that judgment which was spoken against the transgressor, if we do not inherit the mischief from the transgressor? Finally, he thinks that infants are to be baptized, even before the eighth day; lest by the contagion of the ancient death, contracted in the first birth, the souls of the infants should perish. How do they perish if they who are born even of believing men are not held by the devil until they are born again in Christ, and plucked out from the power of darkness, and transferred into His kingdom? And who says that the souls of those who are born will perish unless they are born again? Absolutely he who so praises the Creator and the creature, the workman and the work, as to restrain and correct the horror of human feeling with which men refuse to kiss infants fresh from the womb, interposing the veneration of the Creator Himself, saying that in the kiss of infants of that age the recent hands of God were to be considered. Did he, then, who confesses original sin, either condemn nature or marriage? Because he applied to the infant born of Adam, as guilty, the cleansing of regeneration, did he therefore deny God as the Creator of those that were born? Because, in his dread that souls of any age whatever should perish, he, with his council of colleagues, decided that even before the eighth day they were to be delivered by the sacrament of baptism, did he therefore accuse marriage, when, indeed, in the case of an infant, â€” whether born of marriage or of adultery, yet because it was born a man, â€” he declared that the recent hands of God were worthy even of the kiss of peace?

If, then, the holy bishop and most glorious martyr Cyprian could think that original sin in infants must be healed by the medicine of Christ, without denying the praise of the creature, without denying the praise of marriage, why does a novel pestilence, although it does not dare to call such an one as him a Manichaean, think that another person's fault is to be objected against Catholics who maintain these things, in order to conceal its own? So the most well-known commentator on the divine declarations, before even the slightest taint of the Manichaean plague had touched our hands, without any reproach of the divine work and of marriage, confesses original sin, â€” not saying that Christ was stained with any spot of sin, nor yet comparing with Him the flesh of sin in others that were born, to whom by means of the likeness of sinful flesh He might afford the aid of cleansing; neither is he deterred by the obscure question of the origin of souls, from confessing that those who are not free by the grace of Christ return into Paradise. Does he say that the condition of death passed upon men from Adam without the contagion of sin?

For it is not on account of avoiding the death of the body, but on account of the sin which entered by one man into the world, that he says that help is to be afforded by baptism to infants, however fresh they may be from the womb.

Chap. 25. [ix.] â€” Cyprian's testimonies concerning God's grace.

But now it plainly appears in what way Cyprian declares the grace of God against such as these, when he is arguing about the Lord's Prayer. Por he says: "We say, 'Hallowed be Thy name,' not that we wish for God that He may be

CII.VP. 25.] CYPRIAN'S TESTIMONY ON GRACE. 355

hallowed by our prayers, but that we beseech of Him that His name may be hallowed in us. By whom is God sanctified, since He Himself sanctifies? "Well, because He says, 'Be ye holy, because I also am holy,' we ask and entreat this, that we who were sanctified in baptism may continue in that which we have begun to be." ^ And in another place in the same epistle he says: "We add also, and say, 'Thy will be done as in heaven, so in earth,' not that God may do what He wills, but that we may be able to do what God wills. For who resists God that He may not do what He wills? But, since we are hindered by the devil from obeying God with our thought and deed in all things, we pray and ask that God's will may be done in us. And that it may be done in us, we have need of God's good will, that is, of His help and protection; since no one is strong in his own strength, but he is safe by the indulgence and mercy of God." ^ In another place also: "Moreover, we ask that the will of God may be done both in heaven and in earth, each of which things pertains to the fulfilment of our safety and salvation. For since we possess the body from the earth, and the spirit from heaven, we are ourselves earth and heaven; and ill both, that is, both in body and in spirit, we pray that God's will may be done. For between the flesh and the spirit there is a struggle, and there is a daily strife as they disagree one with the other; so that we cannot do those very things that we would, in that the spirit seeks heavenly and divine things, while the flesh lusts after earthly and temporal things. And, therefore, we ask that, by the help and assistance of God, agreement may be made between these two natures; so that while the will of God is done both in the spirit and in the flesh, the soul which is new-born by Him may be preserved. And this the Apostle Paul openly and manifestly declares by his words. 'The flesh,'} says he, ' lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; for these are contrary the one to the other, so that ye cannot do the things that ye will.' " ^ And a little after he says: " And it may be thus understood, most beloved brethren, that since the Lord commands and teaches us even to love our enemies, and to pray even for those who persecute us, we should ask even for those who are still earth, and have not yet begun to be heavenly, that even in respect of these God's will may be done, which Christ accomplished in preserving and renewing humanity." ^ And again, in another place he says: " Hence also we ask that this bread should be given to us daily, that we who are in Christ, and daily receive the Eucharist for the food of salvation, may not, by the interposition of some heinous sin, â€” " by being prevented, as withheld and not communicating, from partaking of the heavenly bread, â€” be separated from Christ's body." ^ And a little afterwards, in the same treatise he says: "

But when we ask that we may not come into temptation, we are reminded of our infirmity and weakness, in that we thus ask lest any should insolently vaunt himself; lest any should proudly and arrogantly assume anything to himself; lest any should take to himself the glory either of confession or of suffering as his own, when the Lord Himself teaching humility said, ' Watch and pray, that ye come not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak; ' " so that while a humble and submissive confession comes first, and all is attributed to God, whatever is sought for suppliantly, with fear and honour of God, may be granted by His own loving-kindness."*
Moreover, in his treatise addressed to Quirinus, in which work Pelagius wishes himself to appear as his imitator, he says in the Third Book " that we must boast in nothing, since nothing is our own." ^ To which proposition subjoining the divine testimonies, he added among others that apostolical word with which especially the mouths of such as these must be closed: " For what hast thou, which thou hast not received ? But if thou hast received it, why boastest thou as if thou hadst not received it ? " Also in the epistle concerning Patience he says: " For we have this virtue in common with God. From Him patience begins; from Him its glory and its dignity take their rise. The origin and greatness of patience proceed from God as its Author." ^

CHAP. 2C.] TEACHING OF CYPRIAN ON GRACE. 357

Does that holy and so memorable instructor of the Churches in the word of truth deny that there is free-will in men, because he attributes to God the whole of your righteous living? Does he reproach God's law, because he intimates that from that, man is not justified, when indeed he declares that what that law commands must be obtained from the Lord God by prayers? Does he assert fate under the name of grace, although he says that we must boast in nothing, since nothing is our own? Does he, as these do, believe that the Holy Spirit is in such wise the aider of virtue, as if that very virtue which it assists sprang from ourselves, when, asserting that nothing is our own, he mentions on this behalf that the apostle said, "For what hast thou that thou hast not received?" and says that the most excellent virtue, that is, patience, does not begin from us, and is afterwards aided by the Spirit of God, but takes its source from God Himself, from Him takes its origin? Finally, he confesses that neither good purpose, nor desire of virtue, nor good dispositions, begin to be in men without God's grace, when he says that we must boast in nothing, since nothing is our own. What is so established in free-will as what the law says, that we must not worship an idol, must not commit adultery, must do no murder? Nay, these crimes, and such like, are of such a kind that, if any one should commit them, he is removed from the communion of the body of Christ. And yet, if the blessed Cyprian thought that our own will was sufficient for not committing these crimes, he would not in such wise understand what we say in the Lord's Prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," as that he should assert that we ask that we may not by the interposition of some heinous sin â“ by being prevented as withheld, and not communicating, from partaking of the heavenly bread â“ be separated from Christ's body. Let these new heretics answer of a surety what good merit precedes, in men who are enemies of the name of Christ? For not only have they no good merit, but have, moreover, the very worst merit. And yet, moreover, Cyprian thus understands what we say in the prayer, "Thy will be done in heaven, and in earth," as being a prayer also for those very persons who in this respect are called earth. We pray, therefore, not only for the unwilling, but also for the objecting and resisting. What, then, do we ask, but that from unwilling they may be made willing; from objecting, consenting; from resisting, loving? And by whom, but by Him of whom it is written, "The will is prepared by God"? Let them, then, who disdain, if they do not do any evil and if they do any good, to glory, not in themselves, but in the Lord, learn to be Catholics.

Chap. 27. [x.] â“ Cyprian's testimonies concerning the imperfection of our own righteousness.
Let us, then, see that third point, which in these men is not less shocking to every member of Christ and to His whole body, that they contend that there are in this life, or that there have been, righteous men having absolutely no sin. In which presumption they most manifestly contradict the Lord's Prayer, wherein, with truthful heart and with daily words, all the members of Christ cry aloud, "Forgive us our debts." Let us see, then, what Cyprian, most glorious in the Lord, thought of this, â€” what he not only said for the instruction of the Churches, not certainly of the Manichseans, but of the Catholics, but also committed to letters and to memory. In the epistle on Works and Alms, he says: "Let us then acknowledge, beloved brethren, the wholesome gift of the divine mercy, and let us who cannot be without some wound of conscience heal our wounds by the spiritual remedies for the cleansing and purging of our sins. Nor let any one so flatter himself with the notion of a pure and immaculate heart, as, in dependence on his own innocence, to think that the medicine needs not to be applied to his wounds; since it is written, 'Who shall boast that he hath a clean heart, or who shall boast that he is pure from sins?' And again, in his epistle, John lays it down and says, 'If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.' But if no one can be without sin, and whoever should say that he is without fault is either proud or foolish, how needful, how kind is the divine mercy,
'Vvov. viii. 36 [LXX.J. 'Prov. xx. 9. ^ 1 John i. 8.

CHAP. 27.] FURTHER EXTRACTS FROM CYPRIAN. 330

which, knowing that there are still found some wounds in those that have been healed, has given even after their healing wholesome remedies for the curing and healing of their wounds anew!" Again, in the same treatise he says: "And since there cannot fail daily to be sins committed in the sight of God, there wanted not daily sacrifices wherewith the sins might be cleansed away." Also, in the treatise on the Mortality, he says: "Our warfare is with avarice, with immodesty, with anger, with ambition; our diligent and toilsome will'style with carnal vices, with the enticements of the world. The mind of man besieged, and on every hand invested with the onsets of the devil, scarcely in each point meets the attack, scarcely resists it. If avarice is prostrated, lust springs up. If lust is overcome, ambition takes its place. If ambition is despised, anger exasperates, pride puffs up, wiaebibbing entices; envy breaks concord; jealousy cuts friendship; you are constrained to curse, which the divine law forbids; you are compelled to swear, which is not lawful. So many persecutions the soul suffers daily, with so many risks is the heart wearied; and yet it delights to abide here long among the devil's weapons, although it should rather be our craving and wish to hasten to Christ by the aid of a quicker death." * Again, in the same treatise he says: "The blessed Apostle Paul in his epistle lays it down, saying, 'To me to live is Christ'; and to die is gain;" * 'coiming it the greatest gain no longer to be held by the snares of this world, no longer to be liable to the sins and vices of the flesh.' ^ Moreover, on the Lord's Prayer, explaining what it is we ask when we say,
"Hallowed be thy name," he says, among other matters:
"For we have need of daily sanctification, that we, who daily fall away, may wash out our sins by continual sanctification."^ Again, in the same treatise, when he would explain our saying,
"Forgive us our debts," he says: "And how necessarily, how providently and salutarily, are we admonished that we are sinners, since we are compelled to entreat for our sins; and while pardon is asked for from God, the soul recalls its own consciousness of guilt. Lest any one should flatter himself as being innocent, and by exalting himself should more deeply perish, he is instructed and taught that he sins daily, in that he is bidden to entreat daily for his sins."^ Thus, moreover, John also in his epistle warns us, and says: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. But if we confess our sins. He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." Eighty, also, he proposed in his letter to Quirinus his own most absolute judgment on this subject, to which he subjoined the divine testimonies, "That no one is without filth and without sin."^ Where also he set down those testimonies by which original sin is confirmed, which these men endeavour to twist into I know not what new and evil meanings, whether what the holy Job says, "For who is pure from filth? not one even if his life be of one day upon the earth,"^ or what is read in the Psalm, "Behold, I was conceived in iniquity; and in sins hath my mother nourished me in the womb." *To which testimonies, on account of those also who are already holy in mature age, since even they are not without filth and sin, he added also that word of the most blessed John, which he often mentions in many other places besides, "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves;" * and other passages of the same tendency, which are not withheld by any Catholics, by way of opposing those who^ deceive themselves, and the truth is not in them.

3 Ibid. vol. i. p. 455. *Phil. i. 21.

Chap. 26. â€” Cyprian's orthodoxy undoubted.

Let the Pelagians say, if they dare, that this man of God was perverted by the error of the Manichseans, in so praising the saints as yet to confess that no one in this life had attained to such a perfection of righteousness as to have no sin at all, confirming his judgment by the clear truth and divine authority of the canonical testimonies. For does he deny that in baptism all sins are forgiven, because he confesses that there remains frailty and infirmity, whence he says that we sin after baptism, and even to the end of this life have unceasing conflict with the vices of the flesh? Or had 3 Job xiv. 4, 5. â–¬ â€¢ Ps. li. 5. * 1 John i. 8.

CHAP. 28.] CYPRIAN'S VIEW OF APOSTOLIC RIGHTEOUSNESS. 361

he not remembered what the apostle had said about the Church without spot, that he prescribed that no one ought so to flatter himself in respect of a pure and spotless heart as to trust in his own innocence, and think that no medicine needed to be applied to his wounds? I think that these new heretics may concede to this Catholic man that he knew "that the Holy Spirit even in the old times aided good dispositions;" nay, even what they themselves will not allow, that they could not have even possessed good dispositions except through the Holy Spirit. I think that Cyprian had known that all the prophets and apostles or saints of any kind soever who pleased the Lord at any time were righteous â€” "not in comparison of the wicked," as they falsely assert that we say, "but by the standard of virtue," as they boast that they say; although Cyprian says, nevertheless, no one can be without sin, and whoever should assert that he is blameless is either proud or a fool. Nor is it with reference to anything else that he understands the Scripture, "Who shall boast that he has a pure heart? or who shall boast that he is pure from sins?" ^

I think that Cyprian would not have needed to be taught by such as these, what he very well knew, "that, in the time to come, there would be a reward of good works and a punishment of evil works, but that no one could then perform the commands which here he might have despised;" and yet he does not understand and assert that even the Apostle Paul, not assuredly a contemner of the divine commands, said on any other account, "To me to live is Christ, and to die is sain;" ^

nor that he reckoned it the greatest gain after this life no longer to be held in worldly entanglements, no longer to be obnoxious to the sins and vices of the flesh. Therefore the most blessed Cyprian felt, and in the truth of the divine Scriptures saw, that even the life of the apostles themselves, however good, holy, and righteous, suffered some involvements of worldly entanglements, was obnoxious to some sins and vices of the flesh; and that they desired death that they might be free from those evils, and that they might attain to that perfect righteousness which would not suffer such things, and which would no more have to be achieved in the way of obedience

' Prov. xjc. 9. Â« PMl. ii. 21.

362 AGAINST TWO LETTERS OF THE PELAGIANS. [CHAP. 29.
to] a command, but to be received in the way of reward. For not even when that shall have come for which we pray when we say, "Thy kingdom come," will there be in that kingdom no righteousness; although the apostle says, "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." ^ Certainly those three things are commanded among other divine precepts. Here righteousness is prescribed to us when it is said, "Do righteousness;" ^ peace is prescribed when it is said, "Have peace among yourselves;" ^ joy is prescribed when it is said, "Rejoice in the Lord always."* Let, then, the Pelagians deny that these things shall be in the kingdom of God, where we shall live without end; or let them be so mad, if it appears so, as to contend that righteousness, peace, and joy, such as they are here to the righteous, will be such there also. But if they both shall be, and shall not be such [as they were here], assuredly here, in respect of the commandment of them, the doing is to be cared for; there the perfection is to be hoped for in the way of reward, when, not being withheld by any entanglements, and being obnoxious to no sins and vices of the flesh (on account of which the apostle, as Cyprian received this testimony, said that to die would be to him gain), we may perfectly love God, the contemplation of whom will be face to face; we may also perfectly love our neighbour, since, when the thoughts of the heart are made manifest, no suspicion of any evil can disturb any one concerning any one.

Chap. 29. [xi.] â€” The testimonies of Ambrose against the Pelagians, and first of all concerning original sin.

But now also to the most glorious martyr Cyprian, let me add, for the sake of more amply confuting these men, the most blessed Ambrose; because even Pelagius in such wise praised him as to say that in his writings could be found nothing to be blamed even by his enemies. Since, then, the Pelagians say that there is no original sin with which infants are born, and object to the Catholics who withstand them on behalf of the most ancient faith of the Church, the guilt of the Manichsean heresy, let this Catholic man of God, Ambrose, praised even by Pelagius himself in the truth of the faith, answer them concerning this matter, seeing that he, when he was expounding the prophet Isaiah, says: "Christ was, therefore, without spot, because not even in the usual condition itself of being born was He stained." ^ And in another place in the same work, speaking of the Apostle Peter, he says: "He offered himself, which he thought before to be sin, asking for himself that not only his feet but his head also should be washed, because he had directly understood that by the washing of the feet, which lapsed in the first man, the filth of the obnoxious succession was abolished." ^ Also in the same work he says: "It was observed, therefore, that of a man and woman, that is, by that mingling of bodies, no one could seem to be free from sin; but He who is free from sin is free also from this kind of conception." ^ Also writing against the Xovatians he says: "All of us men are born under sin. Whose very origin is in sin, as you have it read in the words of David, 'For lo, I was conceived in sins; and in sin hath my mother brought me forth.' Also in the apology of the prophet David, he says: "Before we are born we are spotted with contagion, and before the use of light we receive the mischief of that very origin. We are conceived in iniquity." Also speaking of the Lord, he says: "It was certainly fitting that He who was not to have the sin of a bodily fall, should feel no natural contagion of generation.

Eighthly, therefore, David with weeping deplored in himself the very defilements of nature, and the fact that the stain had begun in man before his life." Again, of the ark of Noah he says: "Therefore by one Lord Jesus the coming salvation is declared to the nations; for He only could be righteous, although every generation should go astray, nor for any other reason than that, being born of a virgin. He was not at all bound by the specialty of a guilty generation. 'Behold,' he says, 'I was conceived in iniquities; and in sins has my mother brought me forth,' who was esteemed righteous beyond others. "Whom, then, should I now call righteous unless Him who is free from those chains, whom the bonds of our common nature do not hold fast? " Behold, this holy man, most approved, even by the witness of Pelagius, in the Catholic faith, condemned the Pelagians who deny original sin with such evidence as this; and yet does not with the Manichseans deny either God to be the Creator of those who are born, or condemn marriage, which God ordained and blessed.

CuAP. 30. â€” The testimonies of Atiibrose concerning God's grace.

The Pelagians say that merit began from man with freewill, to which God repays the subsequent aid of grace.

Let the venerable Ambrose here also refute them, when he says, in his exposition of the prophet Isaiah, " that human care without divine help is powerless for healing, and needs a divine helper." Also, in the treatise which is inscribed, "On the Avoidance of the World," he says: " Our discourse is frequent on the avoidance of this world; and I wish that our disposition were as cautious and careful as our discourse is easy. But what is worse, the enticement of earthly lusts frequently creeps in, and the flowing forth of vanities takes hold of the mind, so that the very thing that you desire to avoid you think upon, and turn over in your mind; and this it is difficult for a man to beware of, but to get rid of, it is impossible.
Finally, that that is rather a matter to be wished than to be accomplished the prophet testifies when he says, ' Incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and not to avarice.' ^ For our heart and our thoughts are not in our power, seeing that they are suddenly forced forth and confuse the mind and the soul, and draw them in other directions from those which you have proposed for them; â€” they recall to things of time, they suggest worldly things, they obtrude voluptuous thoughts, they inweave seducing thoughts, and, in the very season in which we are proposing to lift up our mind, vain thoughts are intruded upon us, and we are cast down for the most part to things of earth; and who is so happy as always to rise upwards in his heart? And how can this be done without the divine help? Absolutely in no manner. Finally, of old Scripture says the same thing, 'Blessed is the man whose help is of Thee, Lord; in his heart is going up.' " ^ What can be said more openly and more sufficiently? But lest the Pelagians perchance should answer that, in that very point in which divine help is asked for, man's merit precedes, saying that that very thing is merit, that by his prayer he is desiring that divine grace should come to his assistance, let them give heed to what the same holy man says in his exposition of Isaiah. He says: " And to pray God is a spiritual grace; for no man says that Jesus is the Lord, except in the Holy Spirit." ^ Whence also, expounding the Gospel according to Luke,^ he says: " You see certainly that everywhere the power of the Lord co-operates with human desires, so that no man can build without the Lord, no man can undertake anything without the Lord." Because such a man as Ambrose says this, and commends God's grace, as it is fitting for a son of promise to do, with grateful piety, does he therefore destroy free-will? Or does he mean such a grace to be understood as the Pelagians in their different discourses will have to appear nothing but law â€” so that, for instance, God may be believed to help us not to do what we shall know, but to acknowledge what we may do? If they think that such a man of God as this is of this mind, let them hear what he has said about the law itself. In the book " On the Avoidance of the World," he says: " The law could stop the mouth of all men; it could not convert their mind." In another place also, in the same treatise, he says: " The law condemns the deed; it does not take away its wickedness." Let them see that this faithful and Catholic man agrees with the apostle who says, "Now we know that what things soever the law says, it says to those who are under the law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God. Because by the law no flesh shall be justified in His sight." *

For from that apostolic view Ambrose took and wrote these things.
Against Two Letters of the Pelagians. [Chap. 31.

Chap. 3L â€” The testimonies of Ambrose on the imperfection of present righteousness.

But now, since the Pelagians say that there either are or have been righteous men in this life who have lived without any sin, to such an extent that the future life which is to be hoped for as a reward cannot be more advanced or more perfect, let Ambrose here also answer them and refute them. For, expounding Isaiah the Prophet in reference to what is written, "I have begotten and brought up children, and they have despised me," he undertook to dispute concerning the generations which are of God, and in that very argument he mentioned the testimony of John when he says, "He that is born of God sinneth not." And, treating the same very difficult question, he says: "As in this world there is none who is free from sin; since John himself says, 'If we say that we have not sinned, we make Him a liar.' But if they that are born of God sin not, and if these words refer to those of them who are in the world, it is necessary that we should regard those numberless people who have obtained God's grace by the regeneration of the laver. But yet, when the prophet says, 'All things are waiting upon Thee, that Thou mayest give them meat in season. That Thou givest them they gather for themselves; when Thou openest Thine hand, all things shall be filled with goodness. But when Thou turnest away Thy face, they shall be troubled: Thou shalt take away their breath, and they shall fail, and shall be turned into their dust. Thou shalt send forth Thy Spirit, and they shall be created: and Thou shalt renew the face of the earth,' such things as these cannot seem to have been said of any time whatever but of the future time, in which there shall be a new earth and a new heaven. Therefore they shall be disturbed that they may take their beginning. 'And when Thou openest Thy hand all things shall be filled with goodness,' which is not easily characteristic of this age. For concerning this age what does Scripture say? 'There is none that doeth good, no not one.' If, therefore, there are different generations, â€” and here the very entrance into this

Chap. 31.] Testimonies of Ambrose. 3G7

Life is the receiver of sins to such an extent that even he who begot should be despised, while another generation does not receive sins, â€” let us consider whether by any means there may not be any regeneration for us after the course of this life; of which regeneration it is said, ' In the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of His glory.' ^
For as that is called the regeneration of washing whereby we are renewed from the filth of sins washed away, so that seems to be called a regeneration by which we are purified from every stain of bodily concretion, and are regenerated in the pure feeling of the soul to life eternal by such means that every quality of regeneration is purer than of that washing; so that not any suspicion of sins can fall either on a man's doings, or even on his very thoughts themselves." Moreover, in another place in the same work, he says: " We see it to be impossible that any person created in a body can be absolutely spotless, since even Paul says that he is imperfect.
Eor thus he has it: ' Not that I have already received, or am already perfect; ' ^ and yet after a little he says, ' As many of us, therefore, as are perfect.' ^ Unless, perchance, there is one perfection in this world, another after this is completed, of which he says to the Corinthians, 'When that which is perfect is come; ' * and elsewhere, ' Till we all come into the unity of the faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God, into the perfect man, to the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ.' ^ As, then, the apostle says that many are placed in this world perfect with him, who, if you have regard to true perfection, could not be perfect, since he says, 'We see now through a mirror, enigmatically; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then I shall know even as also I am known,' Â® so also there are those who are spotless in this world; and there will be those who are spotless in the kingdom of God, although certainly, if you consider it accurately, no person can be spotless, because no person is without sin."
Also in the same he says: " We see that, while we live in this life, we ought to purify ourselves and to seek God; and to begin from the purification of our soul, and as it were to establish the foundations of virtue, so that we may deserve to attain the perfection of our purgation after this life." And again, in the same he says: " But laden and groaning, who does not say, ' wretched man that I am ! who shall deliver me from the body of this death

? ' ^ So with the same teacher we give all varieties of interpretation. For if he is unhappy who recognises himself as involved in the mischiefs of the body, certainly everybody is unhappy; for I should not call that man happy who, being confused with any darkness of his mind, does not know his own condition.
That, moreover, has not absurdly come to be understood; for if a man who knows himself is unhappy, assuredly all are wretched, because every one either recognises his weakness by wisdom, or by folly is ignorant of it." Moreover, in the treatise " On the Benefit of Death," he says: " Let death work in us, that life also, a good life after death, â€” that is, a good life after victory, a good life after the contest is finished, " may work, that now no longer the law of the flesh may know how to resist the law of the mind, that no longer we may have any contention with the body of death." Again, in the same treatise he says: "Therefore, because the righteous have this reward, that they see the face of God, and that light which lightens every man, let us henceforth put on the desire of this kind of reward, that our soul may draw near to God, our prayer may draw near to Him, our desire may cleave to Him, that we be not separated from Him. And placed here as we are, let us by meditating, by reading, by seeking, be united with God. Let us know Him as we can. For we know Him partly here; because here all things are imperfect, there all are perfect; here we are infants, there we shall be strong men. ' We see,' says he, ' now through a mirror in an enigma, but then face to face.' Then, His face being revealed, we shall be allowed to look upon the glory of God, which now our souls, involved in the compacted dregs of this body, and shadowed by some stains and filth of this flesh, cannot clearly see. ' For who,' He says, * shall see my face and live ? ' and rightly. For if our eyes cannot bear the rays of the sun, â€” and if any one should gaze too long on the region of the sun he is said to be blinded, â€” if a creature cannot look upon a creature without deceit and offence, how can he without his own peril look upon the glittering face of the eternal Creator, covered as he is with the clothing of this body ? Tor who is justified in God's sight, when even the infant of one day cannot be pure from sin, and no one can boast of his integrity and pureness of heart ? "

Chap. 32. [xii.] â€” The Pelagian's heresy arose long after Ambrose.

It would be too long a business if I were to seek to mention everything which the holy Ambrose said and wrote against this heresy of the Pelagians, which was to arise so long afterwards; not indeed with a view to answer them, but with a view to declare the Catholic faith, and to build up men in it. Moreover, I neither could, nor ought to mention all those things which Cyprian, most glorious in the Lord, wrote in his letters, whereby it is shown how this which we hold is the true and truly Christian and Catholic faith, as it was delivered of old by the Holy Scriptures, and so retained and kept by our fathers and even to this time, in which these heretics have attempted to destroy it, and as it will hereafter by God's good will be retained and kept. For that these things and things of this kind were thus delivered to Cyprian, and by Cyprian, is testified by the testimonies produced from his letters; and that thus they were maintained up to our times is shown by these things which Ambrose wrote about these matters before these heretics had begun to rage, and that Catholic ears had shuddered at their profane novelties which are everywhere; and that thus, moreover, they shall be maintained hereafter, was declared with sufficient vigour partly by the condemnation of such opinions as these, partly by their correction. For whatever they may dare to mutter against the sound faith of Cyprian and Ambrose, I do not think that they will break out into such a madness as to dare to call those noted and memorable men of God, Manichseans.

Chap. 33. "Opposition of the Manichcean and Catholic dogmas.

What is it, then, which in their raging blindness of mind they are now spreading about, "that almost throughout the entire West a dogma not less foolish than impious is taken up "? When, indeed, by the mercy of God and by His merciful governance of His Church, the Catholic faith has been so watchful that the dogma, not less foolish than wicked, as of the Manichseans, so also of these heretics, should not be taken up. So holy and learned Catholic men, such as are attested to be so by the report of the whole Church, praise both God's creation, and marriage as ordained by Him, and the law given by Him by means of the holy Moses, and the freewill implanted into man's nature, and the holy patriarchs and prophets, with due and fitting announcement; all which five things the Manichseans condemn, partly by denying, and partly also by abominating. Whence it appears that these Catholic doctors were far removed from the notions of the Manichseans, and yet they assert original sin; they assert God's grace above freewill, as antecedent to all merit, so as truly to afford a gratuitous divine assistance; they assert that the saints lived righteously in this flesh, in such wise that the help of prayer was necessary to them, by which their daily sins might be forgiven; and that a perfected righteousness which could not have sin would be in another life the reward of those who should live righteously here.

Chap. 34. "The calling together of the Synod not always necessary to the condemnation of heresies.

What is it, then, that they say, that "subscription was extorted from simple bishops sitting in their places without any Synodal congregation"? Was subscription extorted against such heretics as these from the most blessed and excellent men in the faith, Cyprian and Ambrose, before such heretics as these were in existence; seeing that they overthrow their impious dogmas with such clearness that we can scarcely find anything more manifest to say against them? Or, indeed, was there any need of the congregation of a Synod to condemn this open pest, as if no heresy could at any time be condemned except by the Synod congregations; when, on the contrary, very few heresies can be found for the sake of condemning which any such necessity could have arisen? And they were much and incomparably more which deserved to be accused and condemned in the place where they arose, and thence could be known and avoided over the rest of the lands. But

CHAP. 34.] CONCLUSION. 371

the pride of such as these, which lifts itself up so much against God as not to be willing to glory in Him but rather in freewill, is understood as grasping also at this glory, that a Synod of the East and "West should be gathered together on their account. In fact, they endeavour, forsooth, to disturb the Catholic world, because, the Lord being against them, they are unable to pervert it, when rather they ought to have been trodden out wherever those wolves might have appeared, by watchfulness and pastoral diligence, after a competent and sufficient judgment made concerning them; whether with a view of their being healed and changed, or with a view of their being shunned by the safety and soundness of others, by the help of the Shepherd of the sheep, who seeks the lost sheep also among the little ones, who makes the sheep holy and righteous freely; who both providently instructs them, although sanctified and justified, yet in their frailty and infirmity to seek a daily remission for their daily sins, without which no one lives in this world, even although he may live well; and mercifully listens to their prayers.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF

C. J. HFELE, D.D., Bishop of Eottenbu;k.

VOL. I. (Second Edition), TO A.D. 325.
By Rev. PREBENDARY CLARK.

VOL. II., A.D. 326 TO 429.
By H. N. OXENHAM, M.A.

'The second volume strikes us as scarcely if at all inferior in importance to the first. The translation reads as if it were an original wort.' â€” Church Quarterly Review.

'Of the thoroughness of Bishop Hefele's learning and eminent fairness as a historian it is needless to speak. He is acknowledged to be unrivalled in his own country as a scholar and a profound theologian.' â€” Pilot.

'This careful translation of Hefele's Councils.' â€” Dr. Pusey.

'A thorough and fair compendium, put in the most accessible and intelligent form.' â€” Gvrdian.

'A work of profound erudition, and written in a most candid spirit. The book will be a standard work on the subject.' â€” Spectator.

'The most learned historian of the Councils.' â€” Pere Gratry.

'We cordially commend Hefele's Councils to the English student.' â€” John Bull.

A CHRONOLOGICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL INTRODUCTION TO THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

By C. E. CAS PAR I.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN, WITH ADDITIONAL NOTES, BY M. J. EVANS, B.A.
'The work is handy and well suited for the use of the student. It gives him, in very reasonable compass and in well digested forms, a great deal of information respecting the dates and outward circumstances of our Lord's life, and materials for forming a judgment upon the various disputed points arising out of ih.Qva.."â€”Guardian.

'In this work the Author affords us the results of many-sided study on one of the most important objects of theological inquiry, and on a knot of problems which have been so often treated and which are of so complex a nature. The Author is unquestionably right in supposing that the so-called outworks of the life of Jesus have their value, by no means to be lightly esteemed. Their examination must be returned to ever afresh, until the historic or unhistoric character of the substance of the gospel narrative has been brought out as the result of scientific examination. ... In conclusion, we believe we can with full conviction characterize the whole work as a real gain to the scientific literature of the question, and a great advance on previous investigations; not doubting that the most important positions maintained by the Author will in all essential points win the approbation of the student.' â€”Jahrbucherfiir Deutsche Theologie.

'An excellent and devout work. We can strongly recommend it.' â€”Church Quarterly Review.

AIDS TO THE STUDY

GERMAN THEOLOGY.

By Rev. GEORGE MATHESON, M.A., B.D.

' The Author has done his work well, and has given us a real help to the understanding of German theology.' â€”Princeton Review.

' A work of much labour and learning, giving in a small compass an intelligent review of a very large subject.' â€”Spectator.

' An excellent and modest book, which may be heartily recommended.' â€”Academy.

' A helpful little volume: helpful to the student of German theology, and not less so to the careful observer of the tendencies of English religious thought.' â€”Freeman.

' The writer or compiler deserves high praise for the clear manner in which ho has in a brief compass stated these opinions.' â€”Christian Observer.

DAVID, THE KING OF ISRAEL:

A PORTRAIT DRAWN FROM BIBLE HISTORY AND THE BOOK OF PSALMS.

By F. W. KRUMMACHER, D.D.,

Author of 'Elijah the Tishbite.'

'This volume has all the characteristics of the Author's earlier productions: strict orthodoxy, and earnest piety and a lively figurative style.'—Rock.

At the close of two articles reviewing this work, the Christian Observer says: 'Our space will not permit us to consider more at large this very interesting work, but we cannot do less than cordially commend it to the attention of our readers. It affords such an insight into King David's character as is nowhere else to be met with; it is therefore most instructive.'

'This will be a pleasant household reading-book for many people.'—Literary Church-

THE SUFFERING SAVIOUR;

OR, MEDITATIONS ON THE LAST DAYS OF THE SUFFERINGS OF CHRIST.

'A book which has reached its eighth edition needs no introduction to the reading public. And yet the very circumstance of its repeated publication entitles it to popularity. There is a richness in these meditations which wins and warms the heart.'—Nonconformist.

'The reflections are of a pointed and practical character, and are eminently calculated to inform the mind and improve the heart. To the devout and earnest Christian the volume will be a treasure indeed.' — Wesleyan Times.

THE FOOTSTEPS OF CHRIST.

Translated from the German of A. GASPERS.

'A very interesting and instructive book. Its style is quaint and antithetic; it abounds in bright thoughts, presents striking views of Scripture facts and doctrines, and is altogether eminently fitted to refresh and edify believers.' — Family Treasury.

'I there is much deeply experimental truth and precious spiritual love in Gaspers' book. I do not always agree with his theology, but I own myself much profited by his devout utterances.' — Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

AN INTRODUCTORY HEBREW GRAMMAR;

By a. B. DAVIDSON, M.A., LL.D.,

Professor of Hebrew, etc., in the New College, Edinburgh.

'Well adapted for the instruction of College classes. The author has a firm grasp of the principles of Hebrew Grammar, and his mode of treatment is, on the whole, clear and correct.' — Guardian.
'This excellent little book supplies a want of which all who are interested in the cultivation of Hebrew studies by our students and ministers have long been painfully conscious. As a system of Hebrew accidence, within the proper limits of the subject, the book is characterized by great completeness as well as simplicity.' — British and Foreign Evangelical Review.

PRINCIPLES OF NEW TESTAMENT QUOTATION

Established and Applied to Biblical Science.
BY REV. JAMES SCOTT, M.A., B.D.

'Mr. Scott's very exhaustive essay is quite a masterpiece of pithy compression. Theological students will find the book to be one of great value, not only for its direct help, but for its lucid example of method. It does not contain a specific criticism of every Old Testament citation found in the New Testament, but deals with the whole question of quotation in general, and thus exhibits the principles of the Biblical quotation, and vindicates them with a masterly force.' — English Churchman.

'In terse and well ordered style the Author deals with a subject too little studied and less understood. He shows himself to be, in the best sense of the word, rational in his method and conclusions. . . . Strength, acuteness, sound judgment, and reason, chastened by reverence, pervade this book, which, with pleasure, we commend to all students of Holy Scripture.' — Record.

CALVINI INSTITUTIO CHRISTIANÆ RELIGIONIS.
CURavit A. THOLUCK.

Tholuck's edition of Calvin has been long very scarce, and the Publishers have, with the Editor's consent, reprinted it carefully and elegantly. It contains Dr. Tholuck's chapter headings and very complete indices, and the text has been carefully printed from the very accurate edition contained in the Corpus Reformatorum; so that, in point of completeness and accuracy, it excels any previous edition, and it is also exceedingly cheap.

'Printed from the most accurate edition of Calvin's great work, we are thankful to welcome it in a shape so accessible to students, and so handy for use.' — British and Foreign Evangelical Review.

THE YEAR OF SALVATION.
WORDS OF LIFE FOR EVERY DAY.
A BOOK OF HOUSEHOLD DEVOTION.
By J. J. VAN OOSTERZEE, D.D.

'A work of great value and interest. To the clergy these readings will be found full of suggestive hints for sermons and lectures; while for family reading or for private meditation they are most excellent. The whole tone of the work is thoroughly practical, and never becomes controversial.' — Church Bells.

'The very best religious exposition for everyday use that has ever fallen in our way.' — BelPs Weekly Messenger.

'This charming and practical book of household devotion will be welcomed on account of its rare intrinsic value, as one of the most practical devotional books ever published.' — Standard.

'Massive of thought, persuasive, earnest, and eloquent.' — Literary Churchman.

'As might have been expected from so clear and vigorous a thinker, every passage is valuable either as an exposition or a suggestion.' — Henry Ward Beecher in Christian Union.

INTRODUCTION

TO

THE PAULINE EPISTLES.

By PATON J. GLOAG, D.D.,

Author of a 'Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles.'

'Those acquainted with the Author's previous works will be prepared for something valuable in his present work; and it will not disappoint expectation, but rather exceed it. The most recent literature of his subject is before him, and he handles it with ease and skill. ... It will be found a trustworthy guide, and raise its Author's reputation in this important branch of biblical study.' â€” British and Foreign Evangelical Review.

'A work of uncommon merit. He must be a singularly accomplished divine to whose library this book is not a welcome and valuable addition.' â€” Watchman.

'It will be found of considerable value as a handbook to St. Paul's Epistles. The dissertations display great thought as well as research. The Author is fair, learned, and calm, and his book is one of worth.' â€” Church Bells.
